With the clarifying addition of the word "diocesan," the first paragraph is taken verbatim from Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §1. The first clause, vindicating the right of the Church to regulate the liturgy, is a matter of public ecclesiastical law and appeared in canon 1260 of the 1917 code in a different form but with a similar purpose: "In the exercise of worship the ministers of the Church must depend exclusively on ecclesiastical superiors." This language was directed against attempts at civil intervention in the governance of the liturgy, especially during the nineteenth century. Thus it denies any regulatory competence in matters of liturgy to those outside the church community.

Other than in countries where church freedom of worship is suppressed or diminished, the final, relative clause of this paragraph is now more important. The language serves to name the specific places within the Church where canonical power over the liturgy is found, namely, in the Bishop of Rome and in the other bishops who preside over local churches or dioceses—as well as in the respective conferences of bishops in which the diocesan and other bishops of a region act together, as Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §2 added immediately.

The determination is based upon, but radically derogates from, canon 1257 of the 1917 code, which attributed the regulation or ordering of the liturgy exclusively to the Apostolic See. Although the parallel might have been more precise had "Roman Pontiff' and "diocesan bishop" (or even "Apostolic See" and "episcopal see") been used, the conciliar intent is clear: to remove the ultimate reservation of the regulation of the liturgy to the Apostolic See as a "major cause" and to acknowledge that the regulation of the liturgy pertains also to the diocesan bishop "in accord with the [liturgical] law," which may be the written law or, as so important in the evolution of the liturgy and its norms, custom.

That some elements in the governance of the liturgy are removed from the authority of the diocesan church is indicated by the expression ad normam iuris (according to the norm of law), in relation to the individual bishop. The liturgical law will therefore determine whether the bishop may act or is limited, for example, by the common liturgical law of the Latin church or the particular law of the conference of bishops or even of a provincial or plenary council.

The principle of Christus Dominus 8a (and of c. 381, §1) is applicable: there is a presumption that the bishop has all the power over the governance of the liturgy that is required for the exercise of his pastoral office, always excepting cases reserved to the supreme authority or to another ecclesiastical authority. (The responsibility of the diocesan bishop is further described in paragraph four of the canon.)

Apostolic See

§2. It is for the Apostolic See to order the sacred liturgy of the universal Church, publish liturgical books and review their translations in vernacular languages, and exercise vigilance that liturgical regulations are observed faithfully everywhere.

While this paragraph recognizes the basic modification in the law required by Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §1 (namely, by suppressing the adverb "exclusively" in the description of the Apostolic See's authority), it reserves to the Apostolic

Roman See the right to publish the liturgical books of the universal (Latin) Church. These are the liturgical books in Latin, now revised by decree of Vatican II and promulgated by papal authority. It is in harmony with these that the particular liturgical books, now in the vernacular languages, are prepared and issued by the respective territorial authorities, the conferences of bishops.[59]

As explained at the beginning of this commentary on Book IV, the principal liturgical books of the Roman rite were issued in official form during the decades following the Council of Trent, which in 1563 had entrusted their revision to the Roman See. The Roman Breviary, Roman Missal, Roman Pontifical, and Roman Ritual, along with ancillary volumes such as the Roman Martyrology and Ceremonial of Bishops, were re-edited and somewhat augmented but remained substantially unchanged until the present century. Increasingly they displaced the liturgical usages of particular churches within the Latin church.

The canon refers directly to the new Roman liturgical books issued in sections beginning in 1968 with the ordination rites (a part of the Roman Pontifical) and completed for the most part in the 1970s. These official books, issued in Latin, are published in a basic and exemplary edition, called the editio typica, by the Apostolic See itself (that is, by decree of the appropriate dicastery, now the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments). The republication of such Latin editions in whole or part requires an attestation of the ordinary of the place of publication (the language used is concordat cum originali), in accord with canon 826, §2; the same norm is applicable to republication of vernacular liturgical books.

The canon next speaks of the power of the Apostolic See with respect to such parallel vernacular versions of official liturgical books, which are primarily the responsibility of the respective conferences of bishops. This is explained below under the next paragraph of the canon. The Apostolic See reviews such editions and accords them confirmation or recognitio (review or recognition).[60] Finally, paragraph two speaks of the broad power and responsibility of the Roman See to see to the observance of the liturgical law throughout the Church.

Conferences of Bishops

§3. It pertains to the conferences of bishops to prepare and publish, after the prior review of the Holy See, translations of liturgical books in vernacular languages, adapted appropriately within the limits defined in the liturgical books themselves.

The third paragraph of the canon represents a succinct conflation of several norms of Sacrosanctum Concilium, which all retain their force. To begin with, the power of the conferences is stated in general terms in article 22, §2, not repeated in the canons: "In virtue of power conceded by law, the regulation of the liturgy within certain defined limits belongs also" to the conferences.

More specifically, it is the responsibility of the conferences of bishops (or other territorial bodies such as plenary councils) to determine the use and extent of the introduction of the vernacular into liturgical celebrations, the decisions being subject to approval, that is, confirmation, by the Apostolic See.[61] It is also the responsibility of the conferences to approve the translations (nothing being said in the constitution about confirmation by the Apostolic See);[62] potential adaptations of the revised Roman liturgy are to be indicated in the rubrics of the (Latin) liturgical books themselves,[63] and the conferences are to determine such potential or anticipated adaptations (again, nothing being said in the constitution about confirmation by the Apostolic See).[64] Finally, the con-

[59] SC 63, b.

[60] SC 36, §3 speaks only of the confirmation of the acta of the episcopal conferences concerning the vernacular; SC 63, b speaks of confirmation (recognitio) of the rituals.

[61] SC 36, §3.

[62] SC 36, §4.

[63] SC 38.

[64] SC 39.

ferences are to prepare particular rituals adapted to the needs of their territories and to introduce them after prior review (recognitio or confirmation) by the Apostolic See.[65]

The summary of these norms of the conciliar constitution in paragraph three of the canon leaves intact the several elements. In any event, these retain their force as part of the liturgical law and are to be understood in the same sense as before.[66] In particular, the canon preserves the relationship of the canonical action of the conferences of bishops in the publication of vernacular liturgical books to the canonical action of the Apostolic See. The former is described as the preparation and publication of the books; Sacrosanctum Concilium speaks to the same effect but, in clearer harmony with the decree on the pastoral office of bishops in the Church, Christus Dominus 37, §4, the liturgical constitution allocates to the conferences of bishops the canonical approbation of texts and the preparation and introduction of the ritual books themselves. The canonical action of the Apostolic See, on the other hand, is described alternatively as approving (in the sense of confirming)[67] and as reviewing or recognizing (recognitio) prior to promulgation.[68] The language of the canon is an application of what is stated in canon 455, §2, itself based upon Christus Dominus 38, §4: the approval of particular liturgical books is an instance of the cases, referred to in canon 455, §1, where the conference of bishops has primary competence.

In explaining this relationship more precisely, the conciliar commission on the liturgy stated that a law enacted by the conference of bishops is subsequently acknowledged and completed by the Apostolic See; while this subsequent action, called recognitio in the canon, adds juridic and moral weight, it does not change the nature of the law.[69] The latter proceeds from the legislative power of the conference rather than from that of the Apostolic See. During the recodification process an effort was made to reserve, in effect, the approbation of particular liturgical books to the Roman See; after protest the conciliar language was introduced.

This third paragraph of canon 838 appears to limit, but does not limit, the power of the conferences of bishops to the approval of vernacular liturgical books and to adaptations foreseen in the Latin books. Despite its omission at this point, Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §2 remains in effect, as already noted. Canon 841 also refers to the responsibility of conferences of bishops and may be seen as an oblique inclusion of the intent of the conciliar decision about the power called moderatio. Primarily the acknowledgment of the location of (legislative) power in the present paragraph pertains to the conferences, in accord with canons 447–459; a fortiori it is applicable to other bodies of particular churches such as councils, in accord with canons 439–446. The conciliar constitution deliberately avoided deciding whether this right belongs to the conferences of bishops by divine or human law,[70] but it is an expression of the collegiality (affectus collegialis) of the bishops of a given territory or region, a relationship traditionally described as conciliarity.[71]

The revised liturgical books list in their introductions (praenotanda) the liturgical adaptations that are foreseen as falling within the competence of the respective conferences of bishops, depending upon the culture and traditions of various peoples (as well as other variations or accommodations which lie within the competence of the diocesan bishop or even of the presiding minister); both Sacrosanctum Concilium and postconciliar liturgical legislation not found in the liturgical books indicate further areas of competence of the conferences. It is to adaptations of this sort or at this level alone that paragraph three refers.

Over and above such matters, the possibility of the conferences initiating "more profound liturgical adaptations" (i.e., those not anticipated in the Latin liturgical books) is also within their competence, in accord with the conciliar constitution:

[65] SC 63, b.
[66] See c. 6, §2.
[67] SC 36, §3.
[68] SC 63, b.
[69] AcSynVat I, 4:288.
[70] Ibid.
[71] LG 23.

1. The competent, territorial ecclesiastical authority mentioned in art. 22 §2 [of SC] must, in this matter, carefully and prudently weigh what elements from the traditions and culture of individual peoples may be appropriately admitted into divine worship. They are to propose to the Apostolic See adaptations which are considered useful or necessary that will be introduced with its consent.

2. To ensure that adaptations are made with all the circumspection they demand, the Apostolic See will grant power to this same territorial ecclesiastical authority to permit and to direct, as the case requires, the necessary preliminary experiments within certain groups suited for the purpose and for a fixed time.

3. Because liturgical laws often involve special difficulties with respect to adaptation, particularly in mission lands, experts in these matters must be employed to formulate them.[72]

The two levels of such developments, lesser or ordinary adaptations (SC 38–39) and more profound adaptations (SC 40), demand respectively the recognition of the Roman See or its consent. The distinction was considered to involve a "very diverse process" by the conciliar liturgical commission when it submitted the matter to the conciliar fathers for vote.

In 1994 the competent Roman congregation issued a lengthy instruction on the Roman liturgy and inculturation, enlarging upon these norms and offering a somewhat more discursive treatment of the reasoning behind such continuing liturgical progress and development.[73]

The canon (like the 1994 instruction) does not refer to a final possibility, namely, the role of the conferences of bishops or other bodies in the development of a new rite, i.e., a new non-Roman rite of the Latin church, which may be acknowledged in the future as being of equal right and dignity with the Roman liturgy. This possibility of a new non-Roman rite and the other conciliar decisions mentioned in Sacrosanctum Concilium 40 retain their force despite the fact that they have not been incorporated into the revised code.[74]

Diocesan Bishop

§4. Within the limits of his competence, it pertains to the diocesan bishop in the church entrusted to him to issue liturgical norms which bind everyone.

This final paragraph enlarges the simple reference to the diocesan bishop in paragraph one of this canon and is a specification of the legislative and other power of the diocesan bishop as this is described doctrinally in canon 835, §1.

It belongs to the bishop to enact liturgical norms within the limits of his competence, that is, unless it is circumscribed or restricted in some way.[75] A similar norm was found in canon 1261, §2, of the 1917 code; there, however, the enactment of diocesan laws was in terms of enforcing the observance of the existing (and common) prescriptions of the canons on worship, the avoidance of superstitious practice in the daily life of the faithful, and the exclusion of anything alien to the faith, out of harmony with ecclesiastical tradition, or commercialization.[76] The acknowledgment in Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §1, repeated in this paragraph of canon 838, radically changes the norm of canon 1257 of the 1917 code: the regulation of the liturgy pertains to the bishop and is no longer exclusively or uniquely the responsibility of the Apostolic See.

[72] SC 40.

[73] CDWDS, instr Varietates legitimae, January 25, 1994, AAS 87 (1994) 288–314. This was the fourth instruction on implementation of Sacrosanctum Concilium.

[74] SC 4; see AcSynVat I, 3:121.

[75] See "ad normam iuris" of §1 of this canon; also CD 8a and c. 381, §1.

[76] CIC 1261, §1.

The final clause of paragraph four, stating that all are bound by diocesan liturgical law, is an inclusive statement. It avoids the possibility of exceptions to or exemptions from the binding force of such laws. This is in harmony with the conciliar decree that religious exemption from diocesan authority is not applicable to "the public exercise of divine worship," unless the religious are of a different liturgical rite.[77] Since the code applies only to the Latin church, however, the diocesan bishop of a particular church cannot issue norms for the celebration of liturgical rites of the Eastern Catholic churches, even if, in the absence of an Eastern eparchy or exarchy in the territory, Eastern members of the faithful may be otherwise subject to his authority.

The canons of the Eastern churches differ greatly from canon 838 and its four paragraphs. Canon 668, §2 of the Eastern code refers the question of the locus of regulatory power over the liturgy to that code's canon 657 on official liturgical books. In that canon the approbation of liturgical texts is reserved to the patriarch with the consent of the synod of bishops or, in metropolitan churches sui iuris, to the metropolitan with the consent of the council of hierarchs; in both cases prior review (recognitio) by the Apostolic Roman See is required. In other Eastern churches the approbation itself is reserved to the Apostolic See, which may establish limits within which bishops and their assemblies may grant that approbation (§1).

Next, canon 657, §2 of the Eastern code again differs from the law of the Latin church, permitting the enumerated authorities to issue the requisite canonical approbation of translations of liturgical books into vernacular languages, but with only an obligation to report to the Apostolic See, that is, without requesting any Roman recognitio; this norm of a simple report or notification, however, is applicable only in the patriarchal churches and the metropolitan churches sui iuris.

In the different context of "eparchies and bishops," the liturgical responsibility of the eparchial or local bishop is determined in language corresponding somewhat to Latin canons 835, §1 and 838, §4. The bishop is described as "moderator, promoter, and guardian of the entire liturgical life of the eparchy" with the duty to be "vigilant that it [the liturgical life] be fostered as much as possible and ordered according to the prescriptions and legitimate customs of his own Church sui iuris." The basic conciliar norm found in Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §1 and now in Latin canon 838, §1 on the liturgical regulatory power of the Bishop of Rome and of the diocesan (eparchial) bishop does not appear in the Eastern code.

With regard to liturgical reforms or development, all Eastern hierarchs are constrained by canon 40, §1 of the Eastern code, not only to see to the preservation of their own rite, but also "not [to] admit changes in it except by reasons of its organic progress, keeping in mind, however, mutual goodwill and the unity of Christians." This shows direct concern for the liturgical rite possessed in common with other Christian churches of the East and clearly flows from Orientalium Ecclesiarum 6.

Other Prayers and Devotional Services

Canon 839 — §1. The Church carries out the function of sanctifying also by other means, both by prayers in which it asks God to sanctify the Christian faithful in truth, and by works of penance and charity which greatly help to root and strengthen the kingdom of Christ in souls and contribute to the salvation of the world.

§2. Local ordinaries are to take care that the prayers and pious and sacred exercises of the Christian people are fully in keeping with the norms of the Church.

The first paragraph of this canon, which is doctrinal rather than normative, was added in the final stages of the revision process. It describes the breadth of the (non- or extra-liturgical) sanctifying function of the Church and is an application of the meaning of canon 834, §1. The Church exercises that function or office "in a particular way" in the liturgy, which is the source and summit of church life, but the sanctifying function also embraces all the dimensions listed in canon 839, §1. So far as regulation or governance is concerned, these actions of the church community are likewise subject to the canonical power of church authorities, as already determined in canon 838.

[77] CD 35.

In turn paragraph one introduces paragraph two, which is directly derived from the liturgical constitution of Vatican II and governs the Church's diverse acts and services of prayer and piety that are not considered liturgical in the strict sense. Thus paragraph two replaces canons 1259 (prohibiting prayers and exercises of piety in churches or oratories without the express permission of the local ordinary) and 1261 (requiring local ordinaries to exclude abuses from public and private divine cult and from the daily life of the faithful) of the 1917 code, and does so with more positive language. It is concerned with prayers and devotional exercises or services which are not strictly liturgical in the sense of canon 834.

"Pious" exercises, mentioned first, are communal celebrations (or even individual practices) which lack authoritative recognition as liturgical—but which may be highly endorsed and even ordered by the Apostolic See. "Sacred" exercises are proper to particular churches and have "special dignity if they are undertaken by mandate of the bishops according to customs or books lawfully approved."[78] These latter, while not formally admitted into the liturgy of the Roman or non-Roman rites of the Latin church, are officially recognized by particular (diocesan) churches or groups of churches; thus they are closely analogous to the liturgy as it is understood in the strict and usual sense but differ from pious devotions in general, which receive a more general, sometimes universal, approval or encouragement. The theoretical question of whether so-called sacred services at some point become a kind of diocesan liturgy is not resolved either by Sacrosanctum Concilium 13 or by paragraph two of the canon.[79]

[78] SC 13.

[79] See Vorgrimler 1:16–17.

For the publication of prayer books that contain pious and sacred exercises, see canon 826, §3.

The norms of the Church, with which the prayers and practices in question must be in harmony, are basically the following: "These devotions should be so fashioned that they harmonize with the liturgical seasons, accord with the sacred liturgy, are in some way derived from it, and lead the people to it, since, in fact, the liturgy by its very nature far surpasses any of them."[80] The conformity of contemporary services of the word of God commanded by these norms is evident;[81] it is the responsibility of local ordinaries to see that all other services be reappraised in the light of the conciliar norm.

It is no longer necessary, however, that prayers and exercises of piety be reviewed and expressly approved by the local ordinary for use in churches or oratories,[82] and local ordinaries are no longer prohibited from approving new litanies for public recitation.[83]

Part I
THE SACRAMENTS
[cc. 840–1165]

The canons on the seven sacraments of the Church constitute well over three-quarters of Book IV. The number of canons is large, partly because the sacraments are the principal elements of the liturgy, partly because the discipline of the sacraments, in varying degrees, has given rise to special needs for order and regulation in the Church. After nine preliminary canons of an introductory or general character, this first part of Book IV is divided straightforwardly into seven titles corresponding to the seven sacraments. In this it differs from the

[80] SC 13.

[81] SC 35, 4.

[82] CIC 1259, §1.

[83] CIC 1259, §2.

arrangement of the constitution on the liturgy, which has one chapter devoted to the Eucharist alone and another chapter on the other sacraments and the sacramentals. (The latter are treated in Sacrosanctum Concilium, chapter 3, as lesser signs or sacraments; in the canons they are treated among other actions of divine worship, in part two of Book IV—cc. 1166–1204.) The arrangement of the titles in the codification gives primary emphasis to the sequence of the initiatory sacraments: baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist, in accord with the basic statement in canon 842, §2.

Aside from the very first canon of part one and single introductory canons for each title, no formal doctrinal or theological statements about the sacraments are given. There is no need from a disciplinary viewpoint to enter into theological questions about the greater or lesser significance of individual sacraments, e.g., the primacy of baptism and Eucharist or the complementary and subordinate nature of confirmation in relation to baptism and total Christian initiation.

Matter and Form

The canons of Book IV assume the Scholastic doctrine of matter and form, especially in relation to the seven sacraments, even though these distinctions are not readily accommodated to penance and matrimony. At times they are concerned, at least for canonical purposes, with what is minimally necessary for validity in the Latin church, without touching on such questions directly for the other churches. This minimal demand, however, is never to be taken to be what is usual or desirable, and such an understanding of the canons (and of the liturgical books in cases like celebrations in circumstances of emergency) must be avoided. On the contrary, the liturgical books are at great pains to support the fullness of celebration, insisting upon the offices and ministries of the entire community and seeking always the authenticity of signs—not only the signs that are central and considered operative and essential but all signs and elements.

Neither do the canons enter into theological discussions of the divine determination or institution of those elements without which these would not be Christian sacraments in the understanding and acceptance of the Church. They take for granted that the central form of words must indeed be the words (in whatever language) prescribed in the liturgical books of the Latin church but that these are not only different in other churches, including those in full communion with the Catholic Church, but are subject to change and determination by ecclesiastical authority. This has been amply demonstrated by the postconciliar reform of Paul VI, who introduced a new consecratory prayer for episcopal ordination, new forms for confirmation and anointing of the sick, etc. Moreover, he authorized new eucharistic prayers with a variety of epicleses, albeit a single (but revised) form of institutional narrative or consecration.

In this area the teaching of Pius XII in 1947 has been followed,[84] namely, that the (verbal) form of a sacrament is not the minimal formula that is essential; as reiterated by Paul VI in the reform of the rites of ordination: "The form consists in the words of the consecratory prayer, of which the following belong to the essence and are consequently required for validity: [there follow the short formulas for the respective orders of deacons, presbyters, and bishops]."[85] The same principle is observed in the rite of penance, when again a distinction is made between the integral form of sacramental absolution ("God the Father of mercies . . .") and the essential words, traditional in the Latin church since the sixteenth century ("I absolve you . . .").[86] This question is not unrelated to ecumenical considerations, because of long-standing disputes between East and West about the central and minimal form required in the anaphora or eucharistic prayer. An initial attempt to speak of this in a joint statement of delegates of the Orthodox and Catholic Churches reads:

[84] Apconst Sacramentum ordinis, November 30, 1947, AAS 40 (1948) 6; DOL 2608.

[85] Apconst Pontificalis Romani, July 18, 1968, AAS 60 (1968) 372–373, DOL 2609–2611.

[86] RPenance 19, DOL 3084; 40, DOL 3105. Declarative or indicative formulas of absolution were gradually introduced in the Middle Ages under the influence of the Scholastics.

> The eucharistic mystery is accomplished in the prayer which joins together the words by which the Word made flesh instituted the sacrament and the epiclesis in which the Church, moved by faith, entreats the Father, through the Son, to send the Spirit so that in the unique offering of the incarnate Son, everything may be consummated in unity.[87]

A similar recognition of a changed ecclesiastical discipline underlies the canons in respect to the central and essential matter or action of the sacraments. The minimal requirement for validity is specified by the canons, but without entering into past disputes. This position too derives from Pius XII who, in relation to the matter of the sacrament of orders, declared that, regardless of what had been required or had been taught to be required in the past (at least within the Latin church) as essential for validity, henceforward the ritual laying on of hands would suffice.[88] The possibility of change is likewise illustrated in the ritual of Paul VI, for example, in the case of confirmation, where the essential matter is described, for the Latin church, as "anointing with chrism on the forehead, which is done by the laying on of the hand"—but not to the denigration of the full laying on of hands which takes place before the anointing, "even if it is not of the essence of the sacramental rite."[89]

[87] Joint Roman Catholic-Orthodox Commission for Theological Dialogue, "The Mystery of the Church and of the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity," July 6, 1982, Origins 12 (1982) 157–160.

[88] See above, notes 84 and 85.

[89] Apconst Divinae consortium naturae, August 15, 1971, AAS 63 (1971) 663–664, DOL 2507.

In summary, the canons are careful to determine, generally in the language already used in papal documents or the liturgical books, the matter and form minimally essential but do not (1) enter into theological or other questions more deeply, (2) overstate the laws, which may affect the Latin church only, or (3) propose that the celebration is in any way integral or complete merely by the satisfaction of the minimal requirement.

For the responsible authority in the determination of what is necessary for valid sacraments, see canon 841.

INTRODUCTORY CANONS [cc. 840–848]

The preliminary canons on the sacraments (cc. 840–848) are general in character, affecting all the titles and canons of part one of Book IV. The more notable changes introduced in the revision of the preliminary canons are the following: (1) the definition of sacraments in general (c. 840); (2) an explicit norm on the initiatory sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist (c. 842, §2); and (3) the new discipline on certain sharing in sacraments (communicatio in sacris) with other Christians (c. 844).

Definition of the Sacraments

Canon 840 — The sacraments of the New Testament were instituted by Christ the Lord and entrusted to the Church. As actions of Christ and the Church, they are signs and means which express and strengthen the faith, render worship to God, and effect the sanctification of humanity and thus contribute in the greatest way to establish, strengthen, and manifest ecclesiastical communion. Accordingly, in the celebration of the sacraments the sacred ministers and the other members of the Christian faithful must use the greatest veneration and necessary diligence.

Although the giving or administering of a sacrament by a Christian minister and the receiving of a sacrament by another Christian remain correct expressions, preference is given here and elsewhere in the canons (as in the revised liturgical books) to "celebration" of sacraments by the whole Christian community. For the same reason, the formulation of the canon is explicit in speaking of both the ordained ministers and the rest of the faithful as engaged in common celebration.

The most significant part of the canon is its explanation of the nature of sacraments (which were described merely as "the principal means of sanctification and salvation" in CIC 731, §1). This is in accord with Sacrosanctum Concilium 59:

> The purpose of the sacraments is to make people holy, to build up the Body of Christ, and, finally, to give worship to God; but being signs they also have a teaching function. They not only presuppose faith, but by words and objects they also nourish, strengthen, and express it; that is why they are called "sacraments of faith." They do indeed impart grace, but, in addition, the very act of celebrating them disposes the faithful most effectively to receive this grace in a fruitful manner, to worship God rightly, and to practice charity.[90]

The influence of the conciliar statement on the canon is seen in the understanding of sacraments (1) as signs and means of expressing and strengthening faith, (2) as actions (of Christ and the Church) of worship as well as of sanctification,[91] and (3) as constitutive of the Church. The first two of these elements were entirely missing from early drafts of the new canon. As explained at the beginning of the commentary on Book IV, the inclusion of references to faith and to worship reflects a major development in the canonical (and doctrinal) understanding of the sacramental signs of faith, which are both ecclesial celebrations of worship and means of grace.

[90] DOL 59.
[91] SC 7.

Requisites for the Validity of Sacraments

Canon 841 — Since the sacraments are the same for the whole Church and belong to the divine deposit, it is only for the supreme authority of the Church to approve or define the requirements for their validity; it is for the same or another competent authority according to the norm of can. 838 §§3 and 4 to decide what pertains to their licit celebration, administration, and reception and to the order to be observed in their celebration.

This canon was derived from the draft of the proposed Fundamental Law of the Church[92] (1980) and was added at this point only in the final stages of the recodification. It locates the ecclesial authority responsible for (1) the determination of what is requisite for the validity of sacraments and (2) the determination of all other matters relating to the celebration of sacraments.

With regard to the first element, see the commentary above on matter and form as determined by the Church. One point needs repetition: the concern lest, because the minimal requisites need to be determined, these should be thought to suffice doctrinally, liturgically, or pastorally. The present canon reserves the approval or definition of what is necessary for validity, genuineness, or reality of sacraments to "the supreme authority of the Church." This terminology is used in the code to refer to the body or order of bishops as "the subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church, together with the Roman Pontiff and never without this head, a power which it cannot exercise without the consent of the Roman Pontiff."[93]

The expression is likewise used of the Bishop of Rome himself acting as head of the college or order of bishops; he is said to have "a full, supreme, and universal power, which he is always able to exercise freely."[94] The exercise of this power by Pius XII and Paul VI in altering the requisites for validity of matter and form has already been mentioned above at the beginning of the commentary on part one of Book IV. The supreme authority of the college of bishops, that is, of the Bishop of Rome and the other bishops in hierarchic communion, is stated in canonical terms in canons 330, 331, and 336. Canon 669 of the Eastern code includes the first part of Latin canon 841, but not the second part (treated below).

[92] LEF 68, §2.
[93] LG 22.
[94] Ibid.

The second part of the canon treats all else which may be decreed for the lawful celebration, ministration, and reception of sacraments as well as the order of their celebration. This may be decreed by either the supreme authority already mentioned or by the other authorities named in canon 838, §§3 and 4, namely, the conferences of bishops and the individual diocesan bishop, as the canon law of the liturgy may determine.

Canon 841 thus has the effect, with regard to the seven sacraments, of clarifying and reinforcing canon 838. What remains in the final clause, however, is a very general and possibly ambiguous norm: it determines neither the borders or limits of the respective powers nor their interaction and potential.

Sacraments of Initiation

Canon 842 — §1. A person who has not received baptism cannot be admitted validly to the other sacraments.

§2. The sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and the Most Holy Eucharist are interrelated in such a way that they are required for full Christian initiation.

No exception is made to the norm of paragraph one. The sacraments may be received only by Christian believers, those who have and profess the Christian faith. But the believer, before he or she may be admitted to any other sacrament, must first be baptized. As canon 1170 indicates, this norm does not hold true of other rites of the Church, such as sacramentals, which may be given to catechumens and also to those who are not Catholics.

In early drafts of paragraph one, the canon was explicitly related to the prescriptions on sacraments to be received by Christian believers who are not Catholics (see c. 844); here it stands as a basic norm. On the question of valid baptism, see canon 849.

Without any direct precedent in the 1917 code, paragraph two summarizes the doctrine that the three sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist are so closely related as to be necessary for full Christian initiation. As is evident, the completion of initiation through full participation in the eucharistic celebration continues throughout the Christian life, unlike baptism and confirmation, which may be celebrated by and for an individual only once.[95]

The sequence of the initiatory sacraments had to be stated at this point, in accord with tradition and the conciliar efforts at restoration of that tradition, because pastoral circumstances and other causes in very many places disrupt the order in which the initiatory sacraments are celebrated for Catholics of the Latin church. In the Latin church the interrelation of the initiatory sacraments is most clearly seen only when the sacraments are celebrated as the climax of the catechumenal formation of new believers, i.e., persons who become Christians after reaching the use of reason, in accord with canon 852, §1. Then complete Christian initiation—baptism with confirmation followed by first eucharistic communion—is celebrated on a single occasion.

The widespread practice of postponing the sacrament of confirmation beyond the age of reason, despite canon 891, coupled with the practice (since the beginning of the twentieth century) of first receiving the Eucharist at about the age of reason, has given rise to an entirely different sequence in the case of those baptized in infancy: baptism, Eucharist, confirmation. If, in addition, the baptized child receives the sacrament of penance before the Eucharist, a still further alteration in the theological, liturgical, and canonical sequence occurs: baptism, penance, Eucharist, confirmation.

In those parts of the Latin church where baptized children are confirmed either as infants or at least before their first admission to eucharistic communion, the question does not arise in the same way, although the relation of the three sacraments to which the canon refers may not be so evident because of the great interval between baptism/confirmation and Eucharist. Nor does the question arise at all in the practice of the Eastern churches where, according to a more venerable tradition, the children of Christian families are fully initiated in infancy, receiving the initiatory sacraments in a single rite just as does an adult neophyte in the Latin church (c. 866)—"adult" in this instance referring to anyone who has reached the use of reason, as just mentioned.

[95] See c. 845, §1.

Both the 1917 code and the present codification respect the traditional sequence of the initiatory sacraments by the order of the titles on these sacraments. The same is true of the conciliar documents and the revised liturgical books, in which the following explanation is given:

> Through baptism men and women are incorporated into Christ. They are formed into God's people and they obtain forgiveness of all their sins. They are rescued from the power of darkness and brought to the dignity of adopted children.... Signed with the gift of the Spirit in confirmation, Christians more perfectly become the image of their Lord and are filled with the Holy Spirit. ... Finally, they come to the table of the eucharist to eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of Man so that they may have eternal life and show forth the unity of God's people.... Thus the three sacraments of initiation closely combine to bring the faithful to the full stature of Christ and to enable them to carry out the mission of the entire people of God in the Church and in the world.[96]

The documents of Vatican II and the revised liturgical books are realistic about achieving a complete or immediate restoration of the tradition of the initiatory sacraments celebrated together or at least in sequence. Even if the sequence is upset in practice, Sacrosanctum Concilium 71 provides that at least during the celebration of confirmation the relationship and sequence of the sacraments should be clearly manifested:

> The rite of confirmation is also to be revised so that the intimate connection of this sacrament with the whole of Christian initiation may stand out more clearly; for this reason it is fitting for candidates to renew their baptismal promises just before they are confirmed.
>
> Confirmation may be conferred within Mass when convenient...

The revised rites make the point even more effectively than the constitution, and canon 842, §2 states the norm which has application to the first three titles of part one. Nevertheless the norm may appear to be only an ideal wherever the sequence of sacraments indicated by the canons is not observed, as is permitted by canon 891.

Although in complete harmony with the Eastern liturgical and canonical tradition, as already noted, the text of canon 842, §2 does not appear in the Eastern code. On the one hand, the norms of interrelatedness of the three sacraments of initiation and their sequence are held by both East and West, and thus paragraph two can almost be taken for granted in the Eastern code. On the other hand, the Eastern tradition of full Christian initiation of infants in a single celebration (baptism, chrismation with holy myron, and eucharistic communion) is not observed in the Latin church. (See CCEO 695, §1 and 710.)

Duties of Ministers and Others

Canon 843 — §1. Sacred ministers cannot deny the sacraments to those who seek them at appropriate times, are properly disposed, and are not prohibited by law from receiving them.

§2. Pastors of souls and other members of the Christian faithful, according to their respective ecclesiastical function, have the duty to take care that those who seek the sacraments are prepared to receive them by proper evangelization and catechetical instruction, attentive to the norms issued by competent authority.

[96] IGIC, n. 2, DOL 2251.

Canon 213 asserts the right of the faithful to receive spiritual goods, especially the word of God and the sacraments. These are elements of the full liturgical participation by the Christian people that is "their right and duty by reason of their baptism."[97] From this right flows the norm of paragraph one of the present canon, which prohibits any denial of the sacraments by the ordained ministers of the Church without cause.

The disqualifications for which people may be denied the sacraments are clear enough when specified in the law, e.g., irregularities for orders in canon 1041 and possible denial of the Eucharist in canon 915. It is less clear when a request for sacramental ministrations is to be judged opportune or inopportune, reasonable or unreasonable, appropriate or inappropriate; a question might arise, for example, in connection with auricular confession in canon 986, §1. Ordinarily the minister may make a judgment about the timing of a request for sacramental ministries, but the nature of his ministry suggests that he should err on the side of willingness to serve.

Similarly, almost always the proper disposition of faith and devotion can be judged adequately only by the person who seeks the sacrament. Although a judgment of this kind can and sometimes must be made by the minister, the canon establishes a presumption in favor of the Christian person.

There is a parallel to paragraph two of this canon in canon 836, which speaks of the obligation of ordained ministers to arouse and strengthen the faith of others for their exercise of the common priesthood in liturgical celebrations. Here, however, the evangelizing and catechizing responsibility is, first, that of those who exercise a pastoral office and, second, that of all members of the Church, lay and ordained, depending upon their ecclesial office or function of whatever kind. The duty, moreover, is specifically in relation to preparation for the sacraments.

The intent of paragraph two of canon 843 is best illustrated in the repeated admonitions of the liturgical books. They describe the appropriate preparation for those who are to receive sacraments and the means to provide it. Such explanations are generally contained in sections entitled "Offices and Ministries" in the praenotanda of the respective books. These sections speak in detail of pastors, other ordained ministers, catechists, parents, families, and indeed the Christian community at large as having a role in the preparation of others for the sacraments. Such praenotanda are examples of norms issued by competent authority; other examples include diocesan, regional, or national norms (i.e., laws) and guidelines, pastoral directories, and the like.

While the canon as a whole applies directly, because of its placement at the head of the canons on the sacraments (part one), to the seven sacraments alone, it can be applied analogously to other elements of the liturgy such as the ecclesial prayer or liturgy of the hours and the sacramentals. In the case of such celebrations or ministrations, similar responsibilities—ministerial response to requests and the appropriate preparation of recipients—may be indicated in the liturgical books.

Sharing in Sacraments

The next canon treats sacramental or liturgical sharing (communicatio) in the reception of three of the seven sacraments—penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick—in distinct and carefully defined circumstances: (1) in the case of Catholics who may receive the sacraments from ministers not in full communion with the Catholic Church and (2) in the case of Christians who are not themselves in full communion with the Catholic Church but who may seek the sacraments from its ministers. It does not treat other kinds of sharing in worship or spiritual things, i.e., those not involving the reception of sacraments. Neither does it treat the other sacraments, including the sacrament of marriage, which has its own discipline (see cc. 1124–1129). For Catholic responsibility in the promotion of ecumenical dialogue and activity with other Christian believers, see canon 755 (and cc. 902–908 of the Eastern code).

[97] SC 14.

As a whole, the canon is the fruit of Vatican II's deliberations on ecumenism and replaces canon 731, §2 of the former code. The latter contained an absolute prohibition of sacramental ministrations to "heretics or schismatics, even those erring in good faith and asking for the sacraments," without prior reconciliation. (Even under that canon, which admitted no exceptions in the text, it was understood that in danger of death, penance and anointing might be given conditionally in certain circumstances.) In addition, canon 1258 of the 1917 code is abrogated by omission: it prohibited all active participation by Catholics in non-Catholic sacred rites; it tolerated passive or merely material presence under specified and limited conditions.

Although the canon provides rather specific norms, the underlying principles remain those of Vatican II's decree on ecumenism, Unitatis redintegratio. Sharing in sacred things (communicatio in sacris) > may not be regarded as a means to be used indiscriminately toward restoring Christian unity. Such sharing is dependent mainly on two principles: the unity of the Church, of which it is a sign, and the sharing in the means of grace. Its function as a sign often rules out communicatio in sacris. Its being a source of grace sometimes favors it. Unless the conference of bishops, following the norm of its own statutes, or the Holy See has ruled otherwise, the local bishop is the authority competent to decide with prudence what the right course of action should be in view of all the circumstances of time, place, and people.[98]

[98] UR 8.

Canon 844 — §1. Catholic ministers administer the sacraments licitly to Catholic members of the Christian faithful alone, who likewise receive them licitly from Catholic ministers alone, without prejudice to the prescripts of §§2, 3, and 4 of this canon, and can. 861, §2.

§2. Whenever necessity requires it or true spiritual advantage suggests it, and provided that danger of error or of indifferentism is avoided, the Christian faithful for whom it is physically or morally impossible to approach a Catholic minister are permitted to receive the sacraments of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick from non-Catholic ministers in whose Churches these sacraments are valid.

§3. Catholic ministers administer the sacraments of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick licitly to members of Eastern Churches which do not have full communion with the Catholic Church if they seek such on their own accord and are properly disposed. This is also valid for members of other Churches which in the judgment of the Apostolic See are in the same condition in regard to the sacraments as these Eastern Churches.

§4. If the danger of death is present or if, in the judgment of the diocesan bishop or conference of bishops, some other grave necessity urges it, Catholic ministers administer these same sacraments licitly also to other Christians not having full communion with the Catholic Church, who cannot approach a minister of their own community and who seek such on their own accord, provided that they manifest Catholic faith in respect to these sacraments and are properly disposed.

§5. For the cases mentioned in §§2, 3, and 4, the diocesan bishop or conference of bishops is not to issue general norms except after consultation at least with the local competent authority of the interested non-Catholic Church or community.

In paragraph one of the canon, the intent is clear, namely, to define the outer limits of permissible sharing in sacraments, aside from any questions of validity or invalidity. (Canon 861, §2 is treated as an exception because it contemplates the giving of baptism in case of necessity by "any person with the right intention.") It is concerned only with licit or lawful giving and receiving of sacraments, the basic question of validity having been determined in principle by canon 842, §1, namely, that only a baptized Christian may receive any other sacrament validly. The exceptions to the first paragraph's general norm are in the three succeeding paragraphs.

These three succeeding paragraphs are concerned, moreover, with exceptions in the cases of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick only. The sacraments received but once, as determined in canon 845, §1 (baptism, confirmation, orders), are not at issue since these may be received only within one's own communion—aside from the case of baptism just mentioned. In an earlier and more severe redaction of the canon the introduction of an explicit prohibition with regard to the other sacraments was proposed.

As noted already, the sacrament of marriage is treated elsewhere in the canons in chapter 4 of title VII on mixed marriages. This is done in part because of the common teaching in the Latin church (but not in the Eastern churches) that the spouses are the ministers of this sacrament. Thus there are distinct considerations of giving and receiving the sacrament of marriage when one of the persons is a baptized non-Catholic.

The second paragraph makes an initial concession, for the three sacraments only, so that Catholics may request and receive one or other of these sacraments from a minister of a non-Catholic church. The conditions are explicit and clear: (1) either necessity or genuine spiritual advantage; (2) physical or moral impossibility (such as serious inconvenience) of receiving the sacrament from a Catholic minister; (3) the absence of the danger of error or indifferentism; and (4) provided the sacrament is validly celebrated in the other church.

Thus paragraph two stands as an exception to paragraph one, applying only to Catholics as recipients of sacraments. The presence or absence of the requisite conditions must be determined in individual cases by the Catholic subject to the canon law. The law does not mention, but the Catholic should take into account, the discipline of the other church or ecclesial community in which he or she seeks to receive one or more of these sacraments.

Next, paragraph three of canon 844 gives a norm for the Catholic minister and his ministration of one of the three sacraments to persons not in the full communion of the Catholic Church. Again the conditions for the exception permitting the ministration are explicit: (1) in favor of members of the Eastern churches with which the Catholic Church is not in full communion, provided (2) such individuals act voluntarily (when asking for the sacraments), and (3) are properly disposed.

The same exception or concession is then extended in careful language by paragraph three to members of other (non-Catholic) churches, but with an additional requirement: the Apostolic Roman See must have judged that such churches are "in the same condition" as the Eastern churches "in regard to the sacraments." A comparison of paragraph three with paragraphs two and four of the canon helps to interpret the expression, "in the same condition": the Eastern churches do indeed possess valid sacraments of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick and their members share "Catholic faith" in these sacraments.

No determination is made by the canon concerning what churches are meant, that is, what churches may be considered by the Apostolic See to be "in the same condition" as the Eastern churches with regard to the sacraments in question. Postconciliar directives from the Secretariat, now Pontifical Council, for Promoting Christian Unity explain that the problem or hesitation arises because of the failure of some Western churches and ecclesial communities to share "the same ecclesiological and sacramental bases that particularly unite us to the Churches of the East."[99] More specifically, the expectation, spelled out in greater detail in the ecumenical dialogue, is that a church is to "have kept the substance of eucharistic teaching, the sacrament of orders, and apostolic succession"[100] in order to be judged as having valid sacraments of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick.

[99] SPCU, decl, January 7, 1970, n. 6, AAS 62 (1970) 184–188, DOL 1029.

Some guidance in this matter is provided by Vatican II's Decree on Ecumenism, which singles out the Anglican communion among Western churches and ecclesial communities as one occupying "a special place among those communions in which Catholic traditions and institutions in part continue to exist."[101] There has been, however, no formal judgment published by the Apostolic See concerning the Anglican or other Reformation communions as churches in the same condition or situation as the Eastern churches.

One affirmative Roman judgment has been reached with regard to the Polish National Catholic Church in the United States and Canada, namely, that this church is in the same condition as the Eastern churches, as just described, in regard to these three sacraments.[102]

The source of the developments in paragraphs two and three, as described above, to be found in the conciliar decree, Orientalium Ecclesiarum, affecting the Catholic Eastern churches and here made applicable to the Latin church as well. The text reads:

> When Eastern Christians separated in good faith from the Catholic Church request it of their own accord and are rightly disposed, they may be admitted to the sacraments of penance, eucharist, and anointing. Moreover, Catholics may request these same sacraments of ministers of other Eastern Churches having valid sacraments on any occasion of need or genuine spiritual benefit when access to a Catholic priest is physically or morally impossible.[103]

In effect the canon, besides applying the Eastern norms to Catholics of the Latin church and to Catholic ministers, extends the concession to other non-Eastern churches, but only after the Apostolic See has made the favorable judgment referred to above.

Next, canon 844 makes a clear distinction between those covered by paragraph three and those covered by paragraph four. In that paragraph, a more limited exception is applied to other Christians not within full Catholic communion. With regard to the latter, who are neither Eastern Christians nor in the same situation as the East, the requirements are several: (1) a serious need (whether danger of death or, in the judgment of the diocesan bishop or of the conference of bishops, other grave necessity); (2) inability to approach their own minister; (3) a voluntary request by the recipient; (4) manifestation of Catholic faith concerning the sacrament in question; and (5) a proper disposition to receive the sacrament.

With regard to the serious need, the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity has given as examples the situation of persons in prison or under persecution or, aside from such cases of suffering and danger, the situation of persons who live at some distance from their own communion. This is of course not an exhaustive list of such cases, and the judgment belongs to the diocesan bishop or, if it should have issued norms or guidelines for such cases, the conference of bishops.[104]

Since, if possible, the principle of reciprocity should be respected in ecumenical relationships, paragraph five has been added to canon 844 so that no general norms will be issued on the matters in the three preceding paragraphs without consultation with at least a local authority of the respective church or community and preferably

[100] SPCU, communication, Oct. 17, 1973, n. 9, AAS 65 (1973) 616–619, DOL 1061.

[101] UR 13.

[102] Guidelines issued by the NCCB Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, March 13, 1996, after receiving a favorable decision from the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

[103] OE 27.

[104] SPCU, instr, June 1, 1972, n. 6, AAS 64 (1972) 518–525, DOL 1050.

with some superior authority. It is easy to see the underlying purpose: not to act unilaterally in possible opposition to the discipline of another church or ecclesial community.

Nevertheless, the language of paragraph five is carefully constructed to leave the diocesan bishop (and the conference of bishops, which has preemptive power in accord with Vatican II's Decree on Ecumenism)[105] free to act in individual cases or in issuing general norms even if the consultation with the competent authority of the other communion is not favorable.

Neither the canon as a whole nor the extensive elaborations of the problem address such particular questions as the seriousness of the need, all other conditions being verified, in cases of proposed sacramental sharing on occasions of legitimate and desirable presence and other participation in the eucharistic celebration of other communions, e.g., in connection with a marriage or an ecumenical dialogue. The language of the conciliar decree itself remains somewhat negative: such sharing "may not be regarded as a means to be used indiscriminately toward restoring Christian unity."[106]

In resolving individual cases and in the issuance of norms of a more general nature, both diocesan bishops and conferences of bishops should take into account the successive statements of the Secretariat, now Pontifical Council, for Promoting Christian Unity. The Ecumenical Directory[107] in particular is to be considered "not as a collection of advisory principles which one can freely accept or ignore but as an authentic instruction, an exposition of the discipline to which all who wish to serve ecumenism truly should submit themselves."[108]

Canon 671 of the Eastern code corresponds closely and almost verbatim to Latin canon 844, which itself is in effect a development of Orientalium Ecclesiarum 27, as mentioned above. An additional Eastern code canon, 670, is much more expansive with regard to other kinds of liturgical sharing with other Christians: paragraph one affirms positively the legitimacy of Catholic presence and participation in worship for a just cause, while observing particular norms of the eparchial bishop or superior authority "by reason of the degree of communion [of the other church] with the Catholic Church"; paragraph two affirms the right of the eparchial bishop to permit other Christians to use a Catholic building or cemetery or church when needed. While treated positively in the Ecumenical Directory, these provisions of canon 670 of the Eastern code are omitted in the code of the Latin church.

More important, instead of Latin canon 745 and its limited if general requirements for the promotion of Christian unity, the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches has two titles on ecumenical matters, thirteen canons in all. Title XVII (CCEO 896–901) deals with "Baptized Non-Catholics Coming into Full Communion with the Catholic Church." Title XVIII (CCEO 902–908) strongly insists upon the specifics of ecumenical activity and promotion: "Ecumenism or Fostering the Union of Christians."

For the special question of concelebration by priests under the presidency of a bishop or presbyter of another church, see canon 908 (and corresponding CCEO 702).

Repetition of Sacraments

Canon 845 — §1. Since the sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and orders imprint a character, they cannot be repeated.

§2. If after completing a diligent inquiry a prudent doubt still exists whether the sacraments mentioned in §1 were actually or validly conferred, they are to be conferred conditionally.

The canon does not enter into a doctrinal or theological exposition of the "character" of the

[105] UR 8.
[106] Quoted above from UR 8.
[107] Issued by SPCU in two parts in 1967 and 1970, and in a second, revised edition on March 25, 1993, "Directory for the Application of the Principles and Norms of Ecumenism." See especially nn. 116–136.
[108] SPCU, decl, January 7, 1970, n. 8, DOL 1031.

three sacraments,[109] which explains their permanent effect (membership in the Church in the case of baptism and confirmation, the pastoral office in the case of orders), but paragraph one states both the tradition and the discipline that these sacraments cannot be repeated.

The language of paragraph two has been carefully phrased to avoid even suggesting a "repetition" of these sacraments, which would be null and sacrilegious. It avoids saying "again" for the sake of precision, since a conditional celebration or ministration of one of these sacraments ("if you were not baptized..." etc.) by definition is not a second conferral of the sacrament. More important, the introduction of a requirement for a diligent investigation stresses that conditional conferral of these sacraments must not be indiscriminate.

Perhaps the principal instance of this possibility is in the reception of Christians into full communion with the Catholic Church. In reference to this, the Roman Ritual is explicit:

> The sacrament of baptism may not be repeated and conditional baptism is not permitted unless there is a prudent doubt about the fact or validity of the baptism already received. If after serious investigation it seems necessary—because of such prudent doubt—to confer baptism again conditionally, the minister should explain beforehand the reasons why baptism is conferred conditionally in this instance and he should administer it in the private form.[110]

This norm is in harmony with the careful exposition in the Ecumenical Directory on the subject.[111] The matter is also taken up in canon 869.

[109] Trent, sess. VII, de sac. in genere, can. 9; sess. XXIII, de ordine, c. 4, can. 4.

[110] RCIA, appendix, "Rite of Receiving Baptized Christians into the Full Communion of the Catholic Church," n. 7, DOL 2482.

[111] See the lengthy treatment of baptism in nn. 92–101, especially 99–101.

Observance of the Liturgical Laws

Canon 846 — §1. In celebrating the sacraments the liturgical books approved by competent authority are to be observed faithfully; accordingly, no one is to add, omit, or alter anything in them on one's own authority.

§2. The minister is to celebrate the sacraments according to the minister's own rite.

This canon has a complex history, at least for paragraph one. On the one hand, paragraph one appears to be unequivocal in requiring that the approved liturgical books be followed in the celebration of the seven sacraments; on the other hand, the reprobation of contrary customs in the 1917 code[112] has been suppressed. The substance of this norm remains unchanged from the old law, and it thus leaves open the traditional possibility of distinguishing the binding (preceptive) norms of the liturgical books affecting sacraments from those which are merely directive or even descriptive.

The second clause of paragraph one is derived literally from Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §3 and, remotely, from the teaching of Pius XII. In 1947 the latter denied the right to moderate the liturgy to anyone other than the Roman Pontiff or to introduce change "at the decision of private persons, even if they belong to the orders of the clergy [including bishops]."[113] Having recognized that the regulation of the liturgy pertains to the Apostolic See and the diocesan bishop, and indeed also to the conferences of bishops of particular churches, Sacrosanctum Concilium 22, §3 reads: "No other person, not even if he is a priest, may on his own add, remove, or change anything in the liturgy."

The prohibition, which refers to the liturgy as a whole, is here applied to the seven sacraments only. This apparent mislocation of the canon is partially compensated for by canons which require the observance of the liturgical laws in the case of sacramentals (c. 1167, §2) and funerals (c. 1176, §2).

[112] CIC 818, with reference to the eucharistic celebration.

[113] Mediator Dei, AAS 39 (1947) 544.

The prohibition of additions, omissions, and changes in the celebrations of the sacraments is made without qualification, but it must be qualified by the fact that the revised liturgical books themselves incorporate very numerous instances of accommodation (regularly at the discretion of the minister), i.e., permitted substitutions and choices, alternative texts, etc. The norm, moreover, does not speak to the possibility of contrary liturgical customs or pastoral situations in which the liturgical laws may not bind.[114]

The other paragraph of canon 846 is directed to the ministers of sacraments. The practical determination of the rite to be followed (Roman, Ambrosian, Byzantine, etc.) is made in accord with the proper rite of the (presiding) minister. In this case the text speaks of sacraments only, not of other liturgical services, to which it may logically be applied. The authentic ritual traditions of the different churches are to be respected;[115] if a minister has or may have the care of a community which is of a rite different from his own, he may be permitted by indult to preside according to that rite—the so-called bi-ritual faculty. In concelebration, the rite to be followed is that of the presiding celebrant.

One important difference from canon 733, §2 of the 1917 code is that the former law applied the norm to everyone (unusquisque), not merely to the minister. In the 1983 code it is an unrestricted matter for persons other than the minister of a sacrament; all Latin church Catholics may participate in other Catholic rites. But conciliar injunctions about the preservation of the rites of the several churches, especially those of the Eastern churches, which are in every way equal to the Roman and other rites of the Latin church, remain in full force.[116]

[114] See the treatment of the nature of liturgical law at the beginning of the commentary on Book IV.

[115] SC 3–4; OE 6. See also the instruction of January 6, 1996 for the Eastern liturgies, cited above.

[116] Ibid.; also OE 3.

Holy Oils

Canon 847 — §1. In administering the sacraments in which holy oils must be used, the minister must use oils pressed from olives or other plants and, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 999, n. 2, consecrated or blessed recently by a bishop; he is not to use old oils unless it is necessary.

§2. The pastor is to obtain the holy oils from his own bishop and is to preserve them diligently with proper care.

This canon introduces the possibility of using plant oils other than olive oil in the celebration of the sacraments. The former requirement, to use olive oil or, in the case of chrism, olive oil and balsam, was altered in the revision of the pertinent part of the Roman Pontifical: "The matter suitable for a sacrament is olive oil or, according to local conditions, another oil extracted from plants.... Chrism is made of [olive or other plant] oil and some aromatic substance,"[117] that is, perfume or other sweet-smelling matter.

The same change was affirmed formally by Paul VI, in reference to the sacrament of anointing of the sick:

> Since olive oil, which has been prescribed until now for the valid celebration of the sacrament, is unobtainable or difficult to obtain in some parts of the world, we have decreed, at the request of a number of bishops, that from now on, according to circumstances, another kind of oil can also be used, provided it is derived from plants and is thus similar to olive oil.[118]

Although the actual use of the oil of catechumens is much diminished in the revised Roman rite, its significance is described traditionally along with the more important chrism and oil of the sick:

[117] ROils 3–4, DOL 3863–3864.

[118] Apconst Sacram Unctionem infirmorum, November 30, 1972, AAS 65 (1973) 5–9, DOL 3317.

> The Christian liturgy has adopted the Old Testament usage of anointing kings, priests, and prophets with consecratory oil because they prefigured Christ, whose name means "the anointed of the Lord."
>
> Similarly, chrism is a sign that Christians, incorporated by baptism into the paschal mystery of Christ, dying, buried, and rising with him [see SC 6], are sharers in his kingly and prophetic priesthood and that by confirmation they receive the spiritual anointing of the Spirit who is given to them.
>
> The oil of catechumens extends the effect of the baptismal exorcisms: it strengthens the candidates with the power to renounce the devil and sin before they go to the font of life for rebirth.
>
> The oil of the sick, for the use of which James [see 5:14] is the witness, provides the sick with a remedy for both spiritual and bodily illness, so that they may have strength to bear up under evil and obtain pardon for their sins.[119]

The former requirement that the oil of the sick be blessed by the bishop is mitigated in canon 999. According to that canon, those who in law are equivalent to a diocesan bishop and, in case of necessity, any presbyter may bless this oil; the latter may do so only in the actual celebration of the sacrament (that is, not as a part of the Holy Thursday rite or on other occasions). A further exception, not mentioned in the present canon, is that "in the case of the baptism of adults, presbyters have the faculty to bless [the oil of catechumens] before the anointing at the designated stage of the catechumenate."[120] Moreover, the very use of the oil of catechumens in the baptism of children and in the Christian initiation of adults is dependent upon its continuance by decision of the conference of bishops; in the United States the pastoral need for and desirability of using the oil of catechumens is left to the judgment of the minister. It is no longer used in the ordination of priests, whose hands are now ritually anointed with chrism instead.

Canon 734, §1 of the 1917 code was somewhat more specific about the use of oils recently blessed, speaking of those blessed by the bishop on the preceding Holy Thursday, but the substance of this prescription remains unchanged: for the worthy signification of the oils, they should be fresh and free flowing. The recodification suppresses, by omission, the practice of adding unblessed oil to the blessed oils when the supply runs low.[121]

Canon 735 of the former law may be quoted to indicate how the worthy custody of the blessed oils has now been expressed only in general terms:

> The parish priest must seek the holy oils from his ordinary and keep them carefully in the church in a safe and becoming place under lock; nor should he keep them at home, unless with the ordinary's permission, because of necessity or other reasonable cause.

The requirement of obtaining the oils from one's own bishop is retained: it is a sign of communion of the local parishes and congregations with the bishop and with one another. The keeping of the oils in church in the traditional ambry remains appropriate but is no longer specified, the canon asking only for a diligent and becoming custody. For the carrying of the oil of the sick on one's person and the like, see canon 1003, §3.

In this connection the Roman Pontifical, after giving the rite for the blessing and consecration of the oils in the chrism Mass, concludes: "In the sacristy the bishop may instruct the priests about the reverent use and safe custody of the holy oils."[122]

[119] ROils 2, DOL 3862.
[120] ROils 7, DOL 3867.
[121] CIC 734, §2.
[122] ROils 28.

Offerings for Sacraments

Canon 848 — The minister is to seek nothing for the administration of the sacraments beyond the offerings defined by competent authority, always taking care that the needy are not deprived of the assistance of the sacraments because of poverty.

Although the canons on simony in the 1917 code[123] no longer precede the canons on the sacraments, the present canon indicates a concern for the reverence due to sacred things, and especially the reverence due to sacraments, and the need to avoid even the appearance of profit-seeking from sacramental ministrations. Any request (or, a fortiori, exaction) of payment for the giving of a sacrament over and above the established offerings is prohibited.

[123] CIC 727–730.

According to canon 1264, 2°, the offering should be determined by the meeting of bishops of each ecclesiastical province; this is understood to be a limit imposed by decision of the provincial meeting, not a tax which must be exacted on the occasion of the celebration of sacraments (and sacramentals). Canon 952, §§1 and 2 makes a similar rule for the determination of the offering for Mass, which is the responsibility of the provincial council or the meeting of bishops of the province; in the absence of such a decree, the offering is left to diocesan custom. The canon does not prohibit offerings or gifts that are entirely voluntary, but there may be particular law on this matter.

The clause proscribing abuses by which the poor may be deprived of the sacraments because of their lack of offerings is new. Although the canon does not apply the principle to sacramentals and other acts of worship, the obligation exists apart from positive ecclesiastical law.

For the application of this norm to funeral rites, see canon 1181.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Abbo, J., and J. Hannan. The Sacred Canons. 2nd ed. 2 vols. St. Louis: B. Herder, 1960.

BCL. Environment and Art in Catholic Worship. Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1978.

Bugnini, A., ed. Documenta Pontificia ad Instaurationem Liturgicam Spectantia (1903–1953). Rome: Edizioni Liturgiche, 1953. II (1953–1959). Rome, 1959.

———. La Riforma Liturgica (1948–1975). Rome: CLV–Edizioni Liturgiche, 1983. In English: The Reform of the Liturgy 1948–1975. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1990.

Callewaert, C. Liturgicae Institutiones. 2 vols. Bruges, 1925–1929.

Chupungco, A. Cultural Adaptation of the Liturgy. New York: Paulist, 1982.

———. Liturgies of the Future: The Process and Methods of Inculturation. New York: Paulist, 1985.

Gordon, I. "Constitutio de S. Liturgia et canones 1256–1257." P 54 (1964) 89–140.

Green, T. "The Revision of Sacramental Law: Perspectives on the Sacraments Other Than Marriage." Stud Can 11 (1977) 261–327.

Huels, J. "The Interpretation of Liturgical Law." W 55 (1981) 218–327.

———. The Interpretation of the Law on Communion under Both Kinds. CanLawStud 505. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1982.

———. Liturgical Law: An Introduction. American Essays in Liturgy, 4. Washington, D.C.: Pastoral Press, 1987.

ICEL. Documents on the Liturgy, 1963–1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1982.

———. The Rites of the Catholic Church. New York: Pueblo, 1976–.

Jones, C., G. Wainwright, and E. Yarnold, eds. The Study of Liturgy. New York: Oxford University, 1978.

Kaczynski, R., ed. Enchiridion Documentorum Instaurationis Liturgicae. I, Turin: Marietti, 1975; II, Rome, 1988.

Kelley, W. "The Authority of Liturgical Laws." J 28 (1968) 397–424.

The Liturgy Documents: A Parish Resource. 3rd ed. Chicago: Liturgy Training Pub., 1991.

McManus, F. "Liturgical Law." In Handbook for Liturgical Studies, ed. A. Chupungco, 1:399–420. Collegeville, Liturgical Press, 1997.

———. "Liturgical Law and Difficult Cases." W 48 (1974) 347–366.

———. Sacramental Liturgy. New York: Herder & Herder, 1967.

———. "The Juridical Power of the Bishop in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy." In The Church and the Liturgy (Con), 33–39. New York: Paulist, 1965.

———, ed. Thirty Years of Liturgical Renewal: Statements of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy. Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1987.

Manzanares Marijuan, J. Liturgia y Decentralización en Concilio Vaticano II. Rome, 1970.

Martimort, A. "Structures and Laws of Liturgical Celebration." In The Church at Prayer, 1: 85–225. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1987.

Oppenheim, P. Institutiones Systematico-historicae in Sacram Liturgiam. Tom. II–IV, Tractatus de Iure Liturgico. Turin: Marietti, 1939–1940.

Regatillo, E. Ius Sacramentarium. 3rd ed. Santander: Sal Terrae, 1960.

Richstatter, T. Liturgical Law: New Style, New Spirit. Chicago: Franciscan Herald, 1977.

———. "Changing Style of Liturgical Law." J 38 (1978) 415–425.

Ryan, G. T. The Sacristy Manual. Chicago: Liturgy Training Pub., 1993.

Seasoltz, R. K. The New Liturgy: A Documentation, 1903–1965. New York: Herder & Herder, 1966.

———. New Liturgy, New Laws. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1980.

TITLE I BAPTISM
[cc. 849–878]

By treating baptism before all the other sacraments in part one of Book IV, the code affirms this sacrament as the precondition for a valid reception of all the others[1] and as the first of the three sacraments necessary for full Christian initiation.[2] The thirty canons that comprise this title reflect the distinction between adult and infant baptism and the corresponding disciplines presented in the current rituals.[3]

An introductory canon summarizes the Church's faith in the sacrament and the fundamental canonical requirements for its validity. The remaining canons fall under the following five chapter headings: the celebration of the sacrament (cc. 850–860); the minister (cc. 861–863); those to be baptized (cc. 864–871); sponsors (cc. 872–874); and registration and proof of baptism (cc. 875–878). With necessary adaptations, the code's treatment of all the other sacraments, except marriage, follows this same structure.

The chief difference between the present legislation and that of the 1917 code is the current law's insistence on the importance of preparation for baptism, particularly for adult candidates, and, to a lesser extent, for parents of infants. This insistence on preparation is a corollary to canon 836 which sees all Christian worship as an action "which proceeds from faith and is based on it," and charges sacred ministers to "arouse and enlighten this faith diligently, especially through the ministry of the word, which gives birth to and nourishes the faith." So strong is the code's insistence on preparation for baptism that it calls for the deferral of the sacrament when the faith which preparation is meant to foster is totally lacking.

Since the promulgation of the revised code in 1983 there have been no substantial authoritative developments in the law governing or the rites for celebrating baptism or the other sacraments of initiation. However, the widespread use of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults has led to a variety of pastoral applications of the canons and increased implementation of options and adaptations permitted in the Roman Ritual.

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches has fewer canons on baptism (17 canons) than does the revised Latin code (30 canons). One reason for this difference is that the Latin code makes a more pronounced distinction between the remote preparation, the required catechesis, and the rite to be used for the baptism of adults and those for the baptism of infants than does the Eastern code. Other factors which account for fewer canons in the Eastern code are the absence in it of any explicit treatment of the blessing of the baptismal water (c. 853), the distinction between baptism by pouring and baptism by immersion (c. 854), the name taken or given at baptism (c. 855), the days on which baptism may be celebrated (c. 856), the baptismal font (c. 858), the referral of adults fourteen years of age or older to the bishop for baptism (c. 863), the conferral of confirmation on adults who are baptized and the celebration of baptism during the celebration of the Eucharist (c. 866), the cases of doubts about the reception of baptism and conditional baptism (c. 869), and the specification of the number of sponsors and their sex (c. 873). The ordering of the canons in the Eastern code is also markedly different from that in the Latin code.

There are also three rather substantive differences between the two codes. First, the Latin code prohibits the celebration of baptism in a private home except in cases of necessity (c. 860, §1) whereas the law for the Eastern churches allows it in less extreme situations (CCEO 687, §2). Second, the Eastern code does not restrict the celebration of baptism in hospitals as the Latin code does (c. 860, §2). Third, while the Latin code calls for the celebration of infant baptism within the first weeks after birth (c. 867, §1), the Eastern code calls for the baptism of infants as soon as possible after birth (CCEO 686, §1).

[1] Canons 842, §1 and 849.
[2] Canon 842, §2.
[3] RCIA, RBaptC.

Essential Theological and Canonical Elements

Canon 849 — Baptism, the gateway to the sacraments and necessary for salvation by actual reception or at least by desire, is validly conferred only by a washing of true water with the proper form of words. Through baptism men and women are freed from sin, are reborn as children of God, and, configured to Christ by an indelible character, are incorporated into the Church.

This introductory canon summarizes the most important dogmatic and theological elements of baptism, together with some of its juridical elements. The first of the dogmatic elements mentioned is the affirmation, drawn from a number of sources including the parallel canon of the 1917 code,[4] Lumen gentium 11,[5] and Introduction to the Rite of Christian Initiation 3,[6] that baptism is the gateway to the other sacraments. This notion of baptism as the gateway to all the other sacraments is also presented in more juridical terms in several canons already treated: canon 96, which deals with baptism as the means by which one is incorporated into the Church and constituted as a person in it; canon 204, §1, which treats baptism as the means by which one is incorporated into Christ and thereby participates in the threefold office of priest, prophet, and king; and canon 842, §1, which explicitly treats baptism as the first of the sacraments to be received. This primacy of baptism will also be repeated in numerous places in the code, particularly in the introductory canons to the other sacraments.[7]

A second dogmatic assertion of the canon is the necessity of baptism for salvation.[8] The fundamental necessity of baptism is the rationale underlying subsequent canons dealing with baptism in cases of necessity.[9] The doctrine of the necessity of baptism is also the key to interpreting correctly the whole discipline of baptism, in particular the canonical and liturgical regulations for the proper minister of the sacrament.[10]

The necessity of baptism explains the canon's reference to baptism of desire, even though such baptism carries with it no juridical consequences,[11] to qualify properly the principle that outside the Church there is no salvation, which is the dogmatic foundation of this canon. Without specific mention of baptism of desire, the canon would appear to state incorrectly that baptism with water is necessary for salvation.[12]

Lumen gentium reaffirmed the teaching of the Church regarding baptism of desire in a passage cited by the annotated Codex Iuris Canonici as a source for the present canon:

> Those who, through no fault of their own, do not know the Gospel of Christ or his Church,

[4] CIC 737, §1.

[5] LG 11: "The faithful are appointed by their baptismal character to Christian religious worship."

[6] IGIC 3: "Baptism, the door to life and to the kingdom of God, is the first sacrament of the new Law."

[7] Canons 879; 889, §1; 912; 959; 996; 998; 1004; 1024; 1055; 1061, §1.

[8] Trent, sess. VI, de iustificatione, c. 4; sess. VII, Decr. de sacramentis, de sacramento baptismi, c. 5. CCC 1129, 1157.

[9] See cc. 853, 857, 860–862, 871.

[10] E. Tejero, in Pamplona ComEng, 561.

[11] CCEO 675, §1, the parallel to the Latin code, does not refer explicitly to baptism of desire in connection with the necessity of baptism for salvation. Rather, it states in §2: "Only by the actual reception of baptism is a person made capable for the other sacraments."

[12] Ench 3866–3873. For a clarification of the relationship between baptism by water and by desire in interpreting the doctrine that "outside the Church there is no salvation," see CDF, Letter to the Archbishop of Boston, August 8, 1949, Ench 3866–3873; CLD 3, 525–530.

> but who nevertheless seek God with a sincere heart, and, moved by grace, try in their actions to do his will as they know it through the dictates of their conscience—those too may achieve eternal salvation. Nor shall divine providence deny the assistance necessary for salvation to those who, without any fault of theirs, have not yet arrived at an explicit knowledge of God, and who, not without grace, strive to lead a good life.[13]

During the final redaction of the 1980 schema of the code, it was suggested that the distinction between baptism with water and baptism of desire should be dropped since the latter produced no juridic effects. The suggestion was rejected because of the doctrinal importance of the distinction.[14] The canon makes no explicit reference to baptism of blood, which occurs when a catechumen suffers martyrdom, since it is a specific form of baptism of desire.[15]

The canon delineates four other theological consequences of baptism.[16] It frees one from sin, both original and personal,[17] a truth recapitulated in the Creed's formula: "one baptism for the forgiveness of sins." Baptism gives one a new birth as a child of God.[18] Lumen gentium 40 affirmed that the followers of Christ have been made "children of God in the baptism of faith and partakers of the divine nature." This baptismal regeneration in Christ also recalls that the baptized possess the "spirit of adoption" (Rom 8:15) and have become "sharers of the divine nature" (2 Pet 1:4).[19]

Baptism configures one to Christ[20] because through it one becomes a participant in the salvific mystery of Christ's death and resurrection. The indelible character of baptism mentioned in canon 849 stresses the permanence of this configuration. Configuration to Christ also has ecclesial effects: the baptized are made sharers in the priestly, prophetic, and royal functions of Christ and his mission (c. 204). Incorporation into the Church is an effect of configuration to Christ. Canon 849 does not explicitly mention the properly juridical effects of incorporation into Christ and the Church since they have already been articulated in canon 96 (constitution of juridical personality in the Church with the duties and rights proper to Christians in keeping with their status and condition).

Lumen gentium 11 is the source from which canon 849 draws these primarily theological elements of baptism:

> Incorporated into the Church by Baptism, the faithful are appointed by their baptismal character to Christian religious worship; reborn as children of God, they must profess before all the faith they have received from God through the Church.

The Rite of Baptism expands considerably on these theological elements.[21]

When all of these theological effects are considered together, it can be said that baptism confers three distinct kinds of "personality" on the baptized: a spiritual or mystical personality through their relationship to God begun in baptism; an ecclesial personality as members of the Christian faithful by their incorporation into the Church; and a juridical personality with canonical rights and obligations by their being placed in a relationship to the hierarchy and the rest of the Christian faithful. The weight or importance to be attributed to these three types of personality depends on the perspective from which they are viewed. From the perspective of the ultimate mission of the Church,

[13] LG 16.
[14] Comm 15 (1983) 177.
[15] CCC 1258.
[16] CCEO 675, §1 mentions the same four theological consequences.
[17] Trent, sess. VI, de iustificatione, c. 4; CCC 1213, 1226 and, with regard to infants who die without baptism, CCC 1261.
[18] CCC 1214.
[19] See also Roman Catechism II, 5 which describes baptism as a "sacrament of regeneration" by means of water and the word; Council of Florence, Bulla reunionis Armenorum, Ench 1314.
[20] 1 Cor 12:12–13; 27.
[21] IGIC 3–6.

the salvation of humankind, the mystical personality is clearly the most important. From the perspective of the Church as the people of God, united and distinguished by a network of mutual rights and duties, the juridical personality takes precedence over the others. Ecclesial personality functions as the bridge between the other two personalities since, on the one hand, it signifies a bond of love which exists among all the Christian faithful, and, on the other, it is clearly oriented toward the final end of the Church as the universal sacrament of salvation.[22]

The explicitly juridical elements of the canon are the requirements for a valid baptism: a washing with water accompanied by the proper verbal formula. "Washing" underscores the root meaning of the Greek baptizein, to "plunge" or "immerse,"[23] and anticipates the preference in canon 854 for immersion over pouring, a preference made more forcefully in the Rite.[24] Baptism by sprinkling, which was explicitly permitted by the 1917 code,[25] is not mentioned in the present code.[26]

The canon specifies only that the water used for baptism must be "true" water. The parallel canon of the 1917 code[27] had added the qualifier "natural," which has not been retained in the present canon. Concerning the words or form to be used in the sacrament, the canon stipulates only that they be the "proper" (debita) form, and that they accompany the immersion or pouring. The proper words in the Latin church are: "N., I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." The Rite adds that in the case of immersion, the person or the person's head is to be immersed three times, and, in the case of pouring, the water is to be poured three times over the head while the words of the form are being invoked.[28]

Earlier commentators noted other conditions that must be met for the words used in baptism to be "proper." The words must clearly indicate the one baptizing as well as the one being baptized and the fact that the baptism is indeed taking place at that moment. Thus, if one person pronounces the baptismal formula and another person immerses or pours the water, the baptism is invalid, since the separation of the two actions renders the words inaccurate. The one who pronounces the words, "I baptize you," is not the same person who actually baptizes by pouring the water. The words must also refer to the Trinity of persons both individually and in their unity.[29] Were one to refer to the Trinity by such terms as "creator, sustainer, and sanctifier," the baptism would also be invalid since these words do not refer to a Trinity of persons, even if it were the intention of the minister to do so. Some commentators also hold invalid the baptism in which the formula used is, "You are baptized . . . ," since it does not express the fact that the baptism is being conferred at the present moment. However, this formula is and has long been customary in the Eastern churches. Therefore, it would be difficult to argue that the use of this formula by a minister in the Western church results in the invalidity of the baptism. If the minister omits the person's name and says simply, "I baptize you . . . ," this omission would not invalidate the baptism. The word "you" clearly indicates the person being baptized, just as the pronoun "I" clearly indicates the one baptizing.[30]

Two requirements for validity not mentioned in the canon are the proper intention of the baptizing minister and, in the baptism of an adult, the proper intention of the one being baptized. It appears that the canon simply takes the presence of both of these intentions for granted.[31] However,

[22] D. Composta, in Urbaniana Com, 526–527.
[23] CCC 1214.
[24] IGIC 22.
[25] CIC 758.
[26] Canon 854.
[27] CIC 737, §1.
[28] RCIA 226 (USA). All references to the RCIA are given for the Latin editio typica, unless "USA" follows the reference, in which case the approved American translation is to be understood.
[29] E. Regatillo, Ius Sacramentarium, 3rd ed. (Santander: Sal Terrae, 1960) 33, n. 38.
[30] See J. Huels, "Canon 849: Defect of Form in Baptism," in CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993 (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 252–253.
[31] F. McManus, in CLSA Com, 615.

the necessity of the proper intention of both the minister and the adult recipient of baptism is alluded to in canon 869, §2, where an insoluble doubt about the sufficiency of either intention allows baptism to be celebrated conditionally.

CHAPTER I
THE CELEBRATION OF BAPTISM
[cc. 850–860]

All of the chapters in Book IV which treat the celebration of the various sacraments highlight only particular and rather diverse aspects of their celebration, and, in accord with canon 2, leave a much fuller presentation of the laws and rubrics governing the celebration of the sacraments to the various ritual books. The chapter on the celebration of baptism is no exception. Consequently, the following eleven canons present an organized, but also uneven, overview of the celebration: a summary treatment of the proper rite for the celebration (c. 850); preparation requirements for adult and infant baptism (c. 851); the use of reason as the criterion for determining whether the adult or infant rite is to be used (c. 852); two additional norms on the use of water (cc. 853–854); the name given at baptism (c. 855); and five canons—almost half the canons in the chapter—on the time and place of baptism (cc. 856–860).

Two features of this chapter should also be noted. First, the canons are consistently attentive to the distinctions between adult and infant baptism. They reflect the normative nature of the initiation of adults much more than do the canons on confirmation. Second, the canons exhibit an awareness, explicit or implicit, that, when baptism is celebrated in cases of urgency, the requirements of all of these canons may be omitted.

The Rites of Baptism

Canon 850 — Baptism is administered according to the order prescribed in the approved liturgical books, except in case of urgent necessity when only those things required for the validity of the sacrament must be observed.

The first of these canons deals with the question of the liturgical rite to be followed and directs the minister to "approved liturgical books" of the Roman Ritual, the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972),[32] and the Rite of Baptism for Children (rev. 1973),[33] together with the adaptations of these rites approved by the episcopal conference[34] and the diocesan bishop,[35] as well as the wide range of options and adaptations available to the minister.[36] Each of these rites is really a collection of different rites for baptism in varying circumstances.

The principal liturgical rite for the celebration of adult baptism is called "Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults," which envisions a rather lengthy process during which the candidate is led through successive periods of preparation which are punctuated by liturgical celebrations of the different stages that mark the adult's progress toward baptism. The Rite makes clear the normative quality of this first rite by presenting it as the first option to be used and by grouping all the other rites in part two as "Rites for Particular Circumstances." It is this first rite to which the following canon (c. 851) will explicitly refer when it describes the kind of baptismal preparation required for adults.

Part two of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults contains five other rites for adult baptism, which are secondary to the normative rite referred to above. The first of these derivative rites presented in the English translation of the editio typica[37] is "Christian Initiation of Children Who Have

[32] DOL 2328–2488.
[33] DOL 2285–2315.
[34] RCIA 64–66, DOL 2391–2392. National Statutes for the Catechumenate (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1986); RBaptC 30–33, DOL 2279–2282.
[35] RCIA 63, DOL 2393.
[36] RCIA 64, DOL 2394. RBaptC 34–35, DOL 2283–2284.
[37] It should be noted that the English translation of the Latin editio typica rearranges the order of the "Rites for Particular Circumstances." The rationale for the reordering of the rites is presented in the foreword to the English edition, viii–xi.

Reached Catechetical Age."[38] Although children of catechetical age are not usually considered to be adults, canon 852, §1 stipulates that the adult rite is to be used when the candidate for baptism has reached the use of reason. This rite, then, responds to the need for adaptations of the normative rite in the case of unbaptized children.

"Christian Initiation of Adults in Exceptional Circumstances"[39] is the second derivative rite. Exceptional circumstances include sickness, old age, change of residence, or a long absence for travel which may prevent a candidate from celebrating all the rites of the catechumenal process.[40] The extraordinary circumstances permitting the use of the abbreviated rite also are present when the candidate has already attained "a depth of Christian conversion and a degree of religious maturity that lead the local bishop to decide that the candidate may receive baptism without delay."[41] In both cases the permission of the bishop is needed to dispense with the use of the normative rite.

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults provides for an even more abbreviated celebration of baptism in the rite entitled "Christian Initiation of a Person in Danger of Death,"[42] which is designed particularly for use by catechists and other lay persons when priests or deacons are unavailable.[43] The present canon authorizes the minister to omit any merely liturgical rite in danger of death situations "when only those things required for the validity of the sacrament must be observed."[44] But, when there is still some time for a celebration slightly expanded beyond what is required for validity, the Rite directs the priest or deacon minister to use the rite for exceptional circumstances with appropriate adaptations for the case of a dying person.[45]

The two final rites of Christian initiation are not rites of baptism at all. "Preparation of Uncatechized Adults for Confirmation and Eucharist"[46] is designed for those who have already been baptized as Catholics, but who never completed the catechesis which would have led them to confirmation and Eucharist at the usual ages.

The final rite in the English edition, "Reception of Baptized Christians into the Full Communion of the Catholic Church,"[47] is, in the Latin edition, an appendix to the previously treated collection of rites. It is designed for those who were previously baptized in a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community and who now seek full communion with the Catholic Church. If there is an insoluble doubt about the validity of the previous baptism, conditional baptism can be celebrated "in the private form" (c. 869, §2).[48] Here, "private form" is to be understood in its usual sense: not public, or not in public view.[49]

All of these separate rites of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults call for the reception of confirmation and Eucharist in keeping with canon 842, §2 which requires the celebration of all three sacraments for full Christian initiation.

While adult baptism is recognized as normative because it most clearly demonstrates baptism as a sacrament of conversion and highlights the interrelationship among the three sacraments of initiation, the most frequently used form of celebration is the baptism of infants or of children who have not reached the age of reason.[50] The Rite of Baptism for Children is also a collection of rites for different circumstances. The "Rite of Baptism for Several Children"[51] is presented first since it demonstrates more clearly the communal nature of the celebration of the sacraments (c. 837, §2).[52] The "Rite of Baptism for

[38] RCIA 306–346, DOL 2458–2475.
[39] RCIA 331–369 (USA), DOL 2433–2441.
[40] RCIA 274, DOL 2438.
[41] RCIA 240, DOL 2433.
[42] RCIA 370–399 (USA), DOL 2442–2446.
[43] RCIA 280, DOL 2444.
[44] RCIA 281, DOL 2445.
[45] RCIA 280, DOL 2444.
[46] RCIA 400–474 (USA), DOL 2447–2457.
[47] RCIA 473–504 (USA), DOL 2476–2488.
[48] RCIA, Appendix, 7.
[49] McManus, in CSLA Com, 615.
[50] See c. 852.
[51] RBaptC 32–71.
[52] See McManus, in CLSA Com, 616.

One Child"[53] is identical with the communal rite, except for grammatical changes from the plural to the singular. The "Rite of Baptism for a Large Number of Children"[54] makes allowances for multiple ministers and for communal responses so as not to unduly prolong the celebration.

A shorter version of the rite, the "Rite of Baptism Administered by a Catechist When No Priest or Deacon is Available,"[55] is to be used when a priest or deacon is absent (c. 861, §2). It alters the formulas for the blessings and allows for multiple ministers and other adaptations in the case of a large number of children to be baptized. Shortest of all is the "Rite of Baptism for Children in Danger of Death When No Priest or Deacon Is Available."[56] If, however, a priest or deacon is readily available, the Rite allows him to use this shorter form; if a priest is present and has chrism, it also directs him to confer confirmation in place of the postbaptismal anointing.[57] The "Rite of Bringing a Baptized Child to the Church"[58] is designed to complete the baptisms of children who were previously baptized, usually in case of emergency or danger-of-death situations, by celebrating the other rites, blessings, and anointings which were omitted.

Thus, when canon 850 states that baptism is administered "according to the order prescribed in the approved liturgical books," it is referring to all these rites, with the understanding that the rite appropriate for the age of the candidate and circumstances attending the baptism will be used. As already noted, the rites themselves make provision for conferring baptism in cases of necessity or danger-of-death situations, but they permit the reduction of the celebration to what is required for validity alone only when there is absolutely no time for any additional ceremonies.[59]

[53] RBaptC 72–106.
[54] RBaptC 107–131.
[55] RBaptC 132–164.
[56] RBaptC 157–164.
[57] RBaptC 22.
[58] RBaptC 165–185.
[59] Canon 683 of the Eastern code determines the rite to be followed; the exception for danger of death is treated in CCEO 676.

Formation for Baptism

Canon 851 — The celebration of baptism must be prepared properly; consequently:

1° an adult who intends to receive baptism is to be admitted to the catechumenate and is to be led insofar as possible through the various stages to sacramental initiation, according to the order of initiation adapted by the conference of bishops and the special norms issued by it;

2° the parents of an infant to be baptized and those who are to undertake the function of sponsor are to be instructed properly on the meaning of this sacrament and the obligations attached to it. The pastor personally or through others is to take care that the parents are properly instructed through both pastoral advice and common prayer, bringing several families together and, where possible, visiting them.

The canon is an application to baptism of the norms of canon 836, which enjoins ordained ministers to nurture the faith and progressively enlighten it particularly through the ministry of the word, and of canon 843, §2, which charges all the Christian faithful to be diligent that "those who seek the sacraments are prepared to receive them by proper evangelization and catechetical instruction." First, the canon stipulates the preparation necessary for adults seeking baptism, and presents the restored catechumenate as the preferred context for this preparation. The Eastern code makes no reference to the preparation of adults for baptism through the various periods and stages of the catechumenate. Second, the canon treats the preparation of parents who have presented their children for baptism as the responsibility primarily of the pastor.[60]

The normative ordo for the Christian initiation of adults is the celebration of the rites of the cate-

[60] Canon 686, §2 of the Eastern code has a less specific treatment of the pastor's responsibilities regarding infant baptism.

chumenate in successive stages. The use of this ordo became mandatory in the United States on September 1, 1988. The canon identifies this rite as the preferred form of preparation for adults seeking baptism.[61]

The preparation called for is not limited to the "various stages" (varios gradus) which the canon mentions. The Rite uses the term "stages" to denote the principal liturgical celebrations[62] which mark the adult's transition from one period of formation to the next. The significance of these principal rites can be appreciated only when they are viewed in connection with the respective purposes of the four periods of formation.

The first period of formation is termed "precatechumenate," a time set aside for evangelization which leads the adult to an initial conversion "away from sin and into the mystery of God's love."[63] There is no fixed duration or structure for this period of inquiry and introduction to gospel values. During this period the Rite calls the adults inquirers. The initial conversion which this period strives for is celebrated by the first stage, the "Rite of Acceptance into the Order of Catechumens."[64]

Acceptance into the catechumenate has a double effect. First, the person receives a new title. The adult is no longer termed an "inquirer," but a "catechumen." Second, the adult acquires the first rudimentary elements of juridic status in the Church. According to conciliar teaching, catechumens who seek incorporation into the Church are by that very intention joined to it. "With love and solicitude Mother Church already embraces them as her own."[65] Ad gentes states that catechumens "are already joined to the Church, already part of Christ's household."[66]

The council's recognition of the status of catechumens in the Church is incorporated into the code in canon 206 which describes them as "joined to [the Church] in a special way" and entitles them to "various prerogatives which are proper to Christians," and which include blessings and sacramentals,[67] repeated anointings with the oil of catechumens,[68] marriage with a baptized Catholic[69] or with another catechumen,[70] and Christian burial.[71] Since their incorporation into the Church comes only with baptism,[72] catechumens are not yet persons in the Church and subjects of rights and duties.[73] However, in light of conciliar teaching and the revised canons, they cannot simply be equated with the rest of the unbaptized. One can say that, by their acceptance into the catechumenate, their baptism has already begun. While not yet unqualified members of the faithful, they can already be recognized as Catholic Christians by their initial conversion to Christ.

Acceptance into the catechumenate marks the transition to the second period of formation, the catechumenate properly speaking.[74] It is an extended period of formation in Christian living through catechesis, prayer, and witness to living the gospel. The Church sustains catechumens throughout this period by a variety of liturgical rites.[75] The period of the catechumenate is brought [61] For an overview of the development of the catechumenate in Vatican Council II and the genesis of its inclusion in this canon, see McManus, in CLSA Com, 616–617.

[62] The Rite calls for many kinds of liturgical celebrations in addition to the principal rites. Blessings, anointings, scrutinies, presentation of the Creed and of the Lord's Prayer, and exorcisms are celebrated primarily during the period of the catechumenate proper and the period of enlightenment.

[63] RCIA 9–13, DOL 2336–2340.

[64] RCIA 14–20, DOL 2341–2347.

[65] LG 14.

[66] AG 14.

[67] Canon 1170.

[68] RCIA 98–101 (USA).

[69] Rite of Marriage 55.

[70] RCIA 18, DOL 2345.

[71] Canon 1183.

[72] Canon 96.

[73] Ibid.

[74] In common parlance, "catechumenate" is often used to refer to the entire formation period for adult initiation. The Rite uses it in the strict sense as referring only to the second period of formation.

[75] RCIA 19–20, DOL 2346–2347. These rites include celebrations of the word, blessings, anointings, presentations of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, the rite of ephphetha and the rite of sending the catechumens to the Rite of to a close with the celebration of the second principal rite: election or enrollment of names.[76]

After the rite of election, the adults are called the "elect" and begin the third period of formation, that of enlightenment,[77] which is to coincide with the season of Lent. More than a continuation of catechetical instruction, the period of enlightenment is a time for spiritual reflection in order to "enlighten the minds and hearts of the elect with a deeper knowledge of Christ."[78] As was the case during the period of the catechumenate, the period of enlightenment is punctuated by numerous liturgical rites.[79] This period is brought to completion at the Easter Vigil with the celebration of baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist, after which the elect are called "neophytes."

Christian initiation does not end with the reception of these three sacraments. The fourth and final period of initiation is that of postbaptismal catechesis or mystagogy.[80] Its purpose is to afford the neophytes the opportunity to deepen their grasp of the paschal mystery by sharing in the Eucharist, meditating on the gospel, and doing works of charity.[81] Although this period ends in a formal sense on Pentecost,[82] ongoing postbaptismal catechesis and continuing conversion are the responsibility of all the baptized. In fact, this kind of ongoing formation is what the second half of the canon requires for parents who present their children for baptism.

It is apparent that the preparation of adults envisioned by the Rite is far more than the mere "instruction" called for in the 1917 code.[83] It is a process of immersion into the Christian life through catechesis, prayer, spiritual growth and direction, apostolic service, and commitment to Christ, all of which are sustained and deepened through liturgical celebration. It is this kind of formation that the canon sees as the norm of adult preparation for baptism. However, it does not require that all the elements of this normative process be celebrated in every case, but only "insofar as possible." This qualification is in harmony with the Rite which itself provides for abbreviated formation processes in various circumstances, as was noted above. The Rite's insistence on the normative character of the catechumenal process is stronger than the canon's, since it notes that any abbreviated form of adult initiation, except in danger-of-death situations, is allowed only in individual cases, and even then only with permission of the bishop.[84]

When Vatican Council II called for the restoration of the catechumenate,[85] it intended to leave this restoration to the discretion of each local ordinary, who would "set up the program of the catechumenate and lay down norms according to local needs."[86] However, the present code grants conferences of bishops authority in regulating the liturgy, an authority which preempts that of the local diocesan bishop.[87] The canon reflects this postconciliar development when it says that adult formation for baptism is to be carried out "according to the order of initiation adapted by the conference of bishops and the special norms issued by it."[88]

Election when it is celebrated by the bishop. See RCIA 81–117 (USA).

[76] "The step is called election because the acceptance made by the Church is founded on the election by God, in whose name the Church acts. The step is also called the enrollment of names because as a pledge of fidelity the candidates inscribe their names in the book that lists those who have been chosen for initiation." RCIA 22, DOL 2349.

[77] RCIA 138–205 (USA).

[78] RCIA 25, DOL 2352.

[79] These rites include the scrutinies, the presentations of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer if these were not celebrated during the catechumenal period, the recitation of the Creed, and the choosing of a baptismal name. See RCIA 140–205 (USA).

[80] RCIA 37–40, DOL 2364–2367. RCIA 235–239, DOL 2428–2432.

[81] RCIA 37, DOL 2364.

[82] RCIA 237, DOL 2430.

[83] CIC 752, §2.

[84] RCIA 240, DOL 2433. See also "National Statutes for the Catechumenate," in RCIA (USA), Appendix III, nn. 19–20.

[85] SC 64.

[86] Ibid.

[87] Canon 838, §§3–4.

[88] The special norms for the United States are the National Statutes for the Catechumenate.

The second half of canon 851 also treats the preparation of adults, not as candidates for baptism but as parents or sponsors presenting infants for the sacrament. The canon mentions summarily only two aspects of this preparation: instruction and formation. The parents and godparents are to be instructed about the meaning of the sacrament and the responsibilities proper to parents and godparents which arise from it. The Rite of Baptism for Children adds only that parents "should be provided with suitable means such as books, letters addressed to them, and catechisms designed for families."[89]

The canon also calls for the formation of parents and godparents through pastoral direction and common prayer. The text is taken almost verbatim from the Rite.[90] The true importance of preparation for parents presenting their children for baptism will be highlighted again in canon 868, §1, 2° which provides that, when the parents or those who care for a child in their place have received no preparation and there is no hope that they will participate in postbaptismal catechesis, the child's baptism may be postponed indefinitely.

The canon recognizes the role of the pastor in the preparation of parents, and notes that his responsibilities may be shared with other members of the community. The Rite also notes the role of the bishop in the preparation process by recalling his duty "to coordinate such pastoral efforts in the diocese, with the help also of deacons and lay people."[91]

Clarification of the Terms "Adult" and "Infant"

Canon 852 — §1. The prescripts of the canons on adult baptism are to be applied to all those who, no longer infants, have attained the use of reason.

§2. A person who is not responsible for oneself (non sui compos) is also regarded as an infant with respect to baptism.

Since the previous canon distinguished between the baptisms of adults and those of infants, the present canon defines the terms "adult" and "infant" for purposes of determining those subject to the prescriptions of the canons on adult baptism.[92] According to canon 97, §2, those who have not completed their seventh year are, for canonical purposes, "infants" and, therefore, not responsible for themselves (non sui compos). After the completion of their seventh year, they are presumed to have the use of reason (to be sui compos). The present canon does not make any explicit reference to chronological age, but applies these principles of age and use of reason to determine those subject to the prescriptions for adult baptism. For purposes of baptism, anyone who is not an infant is an adult, is presumed to have the use of reason, and is, therefore, subject to the requirements and rites for adult baptism.

Children over the age of seven are subject to the prescriptions of the canons regulating adult baptism because they "are capable of receiving and nurturing a personal faith and of recognizing an obligation in conscience"[93] and can undertake the personal preparation for baptism characteristic of an adult. From this perspective, the second paragraph of the canon is not an exception to the first, but rather an application of it. Should one not have the use of reason, then one is not an adult, and is, therefore, a subject for infant baptism, regardless of chronological age.

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults provides a rite for children and adolescents considered to be adults in virtue of canon 852, "Christian Initiation of Children Who Have Reached Catechetical Age."[94] Christian initiation of children and adolescents is to be extended over time and re-

[89] RBaptC 5, 1, DOL 2289.

[90] Ibid.

[91] RBaptC 7, 1, DOL 2291.

[92] Canon 682 of the Eastern code distinguishes between adult and infant candidates for baptism, but only in terms of the preparation required for the sacrament. No distinction between adults and infants is made in terms of the rite of baptism to be used in its celebration.

[93] RCIA 306, DOL 2458.

[94] RCIA 306–346, DOL 2458–2475.

quires their personal conversion, in proportion to their age, as well as catechesis and education.[95]

The extent to which pastoral practice follows these prescriptions for Christian initiation of children is difficult to assess. The National Statutes for the Catechumenate state that the formation of children considered to be adults by canon 851, §1 "should follow the general pattern of the ordinary catechumenate as far as possible" and that they are to receive all the sacraments of initiation at the Easter Vigil, together with the older catechumens.[96] Nevertheless, it appears that pastoral practice varies. Not infrequently, parishes have no process other than the religious education program or Catholic school by which unbaptized children of catechetical age can be prepared for Christian initiation. Younger children of catechetical age are often baptized in the infant rite in a ceremony that does not allow them to receive the Eucharist immediately following their baptisms. Often confirmation is delayed until the newly baptized children can receive this sacrament along with their classmates in the religious education program or Catholic school who were baptized as infants. By qualifying the mandatory character of the catechumenate for children with the phrase "as far as possible," the National Statutes provide room for exceptions. Nevertheless, exceptions should be made only when no program exists for catechumenal formation of children of catechetical age. The intention of the law is clearly that some structure for the catechumenal formation for children ought to exist. In order to comply with the law, parishes able to establish such a structure should not delay in doing so.

A further distinction regarding age will be introduced in canon 863: the baptisms of adults who are fourteen or older are to be referred to the bishop. The present canon does not deal with this distinction, since its primary concern is the determination of the rite to be used, not the proper minister of the sacrament.

[95] RCIA 307, DOL 2459.
[96] NSC 18.

Baptismal Water

Canon 853 — Apart from a case of necessity, the water to be used in conferring baptism must be blessed according to the prescripts of the liturgical books.

Water used for baptism should be blessed, normally during the celebration of the baptism itself.[97] Using unblessed water does not affect the validity of the sacrament since canon 849, which treats the requirements for validity, does not mention blessing the water. The rites for both adult and infant baptism provide for blessing the water during the course of the celebration.[98] In adult baptism, the water is normally blessed during the Easter Vigil. If water blessed during the Easter Vigil is available, it is to be used but not to be blessed again for any subsequent infant baptism during the Easter season.[99] When the minister of baptism is not a priest or deacon but a catechist or other person designated to baptize, the water cannot be blessed during the ceremony, but, if possible, water already blessed should be used.

The Rite notes some additional concerns about the water used at baptism. It should be clean, so that the baptism can express more fully its sacramental symbolism as a washing. Clean water is also required for hygienic reasons. In cold climates, the water should be heated prior to the celebration. The ritual also recognizes that the baptismal font may be equipped with running water. In this case, the water is blessed while flowing. Outside the Easter season, the water should be blessed at every celebration of the sacrament.[100]

Immersion and Pouring

Canon 854 — Baptism is to be conferred either by immersion or by pouring; the prescripts of the conference of bishops are to be observed.

[97] The Eastern code makes no reference to the blessing of baptismal water.
[98] RCIA 311 (USA); RBaptC 54.
[99] SC 70; IGIC 21, DOL 2270.
[100] IGIC 18, 20–21, DOL 2267, 2269–2270.

The canon mentions only two licit manners in which the water is to be used in the celebration of baptism: immersion of the person into the water, or pouring the water over the person.[101] The order in which these two manners of baptizing appear in the canon indicates a preference for immersion. Immersion was the common manner of baptizing from the earliest days of the Church until the end of the twelfth century when pouring became more common.[102] The Roman Ritual of Paul V (1614) allowed baptism by immersion to continue in those areas where this custom had been retained.[103] Immersion is still the ordinary practice of the Eastern churches. Immersion is a particularly appropriate symbol of the rebirth that comes with baptism by dying with Christ and rising with him to new life.[104] The preference for immersion over pouring (infusion) is also affirmed in the Rite.[105]

The 1917 code allowed baptism by immersion and pouring, and by a combination of both in which the candidates stood in a pool and water was poured over their heads. Neither the present canon nor the Rite explicitly allows for this combination. The Rite does allow partial immersion, in which only the head of the person is immersed.[106] While the ritual expresses a clear preference for baptism by immersion, it also cautions that local custom should be taken into account "so that in different traditions and circumstances there will be a clear understanding that this washing is not just a purification rite but the sacrament of being joined to Christ."[107]

[101] The Eastern code makes no distinction between pouring and immersion in the canons on baptism.

[102] Chiappetta Com, 3133.

[103] Rituale Romanum, tit. II, cap. II, 20: "Where there exists the custom of baptizing by immersion . . ."

[104] Rom 6:3–11; Col 2:12.

[105] IGIC 22, DOL 2271: "Either the rite of immersion, which is more suitable as a symbol of participation in the death and resurrection of Christ, or the rite of infusion may lawfully be used in the celebration of baptism."

[106] RCIA 220 (USA).

[107] RCIA 32, DOL 2359.

Although the 1917 code permitted sprinkling as a licit manner of baptizing, the revised code does not retain this option. During the revision of the code it was proposed that sprinkling be retained. However, it was suppressed on the ground that the use of water is meant symbolize a real washing, something that sprinkling fails to do.[108] The Rite notes that "either immersion or infusion should be chosen."[109] This use of "should" implies that while sprinkling would be illicit, it would nonetheless be valid.

Finally, the canon notes that, when baptizing either by immersion or by pouring, the prescriptions of the bishops' conference are to be followed. In the United States, such prescriptions are found in the National Statutes for the Catechumenate, which state a clear preference for immersion, even if only partial immersion.[110] The provision for more frequent use of immersion may require remodeling the baptistries in churches and should be a factor considered carefully when new churches are being planned.[111]

Baptismal Name

Canon 855 — Parents, sponsors, and the pastor are to take care that a name foreign to Christian sensibility is not given.

The 1917 code imposed restrictions on the choice of names given at baptism.[112] They had to be "Christian names," that is, names of saints or names derived from Christian virtues (Faith, Constance, Joy, etc.). At infant baptisms, the minister had to add Christian names if the parents themselves had not chosen them.

The first relaxation of these restrictions, intended particularly for areas where non-Christian

[108] Comm 13 (1981) 216–217.

[109] RCIA 32, DOL 2359. Emphasis added.

[110] NSC 17.

[111] BCL, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1978) 39, n. 76.

[112] CIC 761.

religions predominated, came with the restoration of the catechumenate in 1972. Although a Christian name was still preferred, a name more reflective of the culture could be chosen, provided that it had a Christian meaning.[113]

The canon allows even greater flexibility.[114] While the preference for a Christian name continues, any name can be given, as long as it is not offensive to Christian belief. Since what is offensive varies from culture to culture, the canon provides ample latitude to accommodate these cultural differences.[115] Moreover, the canon entrusts the responsibility of naming the child primarily to the parents, and only secondarily to the sponsor and pastor. Canon 761 of the 1917 code had entrusted this responsibility primarily to the pastor.

In the Rite of Infant Baptism, the conferral of the baptismal name takes place through a question posed to the parents by the minister at the very beginning of the celebration ("What name do you give your child?"). The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults has a distinct rite for the conferral of a name and allows for the possibility that catechumens may change their names as a result of their conversion to Christ.[116] The Rite grants conferences of bishops the authority to issue norms regarding the candidates' choosing new names "in regions where it is the practice of non-Christian religions to give a new name to initiates."[117] The National Conference of Catholic Bishops has determined that, in the United States, a new name is normally not to be given at the baptism of adults. However, it has given diocesan bishops the discretion to permit the giving of new names to persons from those cultures in which it is the practice of non-Christian religions to take or give a new name.

[113]RCIA 88. Note that the text now reflects the greater freedom in choosing a name as does c. 855.

[114]The Eastern code makes no reference at all to the name given at baptism.

[115]D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 471.

[116]RCIA 73, 200, 202 (USA).

[117]RCIA 33, DOL 2392, n. 4.

Time of Celebration

Canon 856 — Although baptism can be celebrated on any day, it is nevertheless recommended that it be celebrated ordinarily on Sunday or, if possible, at the Easter Vigil.

Baptism can be celebrated on any day. However, the canon singles out Sundays and the Easter Vigil as particularly appropriate times for the celebration of the sacrament.[118] The reasons for this preference are explained in the ritual:

> To bring out the paschal character of baptism, it is recommended that the sacrament be celebrated during the Easter Vigil or on Sunday, when the Church commemorates the Lord's resurrection.[119]

By citing the Easter Vigil first, the ritual implies that it takes precedence over Sundays, even in the case of children.

The canon, however, states an explicit preference for celebrating baptism on Sundays and adds that the Easter Vigil is appropriate "if possible." During the code revision process, it was suggested that, since adult baptism is the normative rite, the canon should indicate a marked preference for the Easter Vigil, rather than for "any Sunday."[120] The suggestion was rejected on the ground, that, while the Easter Vigil is the "privileged" time for baptism, it is not the time at which baptism is "usually" celebrated. Moreover, to delay baptism for several months, perhaps for as much as a year, until the Easter Vigil, would be contrary to the prescription of canon 867 which obliges parents to present their children for baptism within the first weeks after birth. Thus, the canon reflects the normal as opposed to the normative time for baptism, at least in the case of infant baptism. In the case of adults, the Rite continues to see the Easter Vigil as both the normal and normative time for celebrating baptism.[121] Only for serious pastoral reasons can the sacraments of initiation for adults be celebrated outside the Easter Vigil, and then preferably during the Easter season. In addition, the program of immediate preparation of adults for initiation during Lent must be retained.[122]

[118]The Eastern code mentions no preferences for or restrictions on the time of celebration of baptism.

[119]RBaptC 9, DOL 2293.

[120]Comm 15 (1983) 179.

The canon says nothing about celebrating infant baptism during a Sunday Mass. The ritual highlights the benefit of celebrating baptism during Sunday Mass, but cautions that "this should not be done too often."[123]

Place of Baptism

Canon 857 — §1. Apart from a case of necessity, the proper place of baptism is a church or oratory.

§2. As a rule an adult is to be baptized in his or her parish church and an infant in the parish church of the parents unless a just cause suggests otherwise.

Canons 857–860 deal with different aspects of the place where baptism can be celebrated. Canon 857 deals with the sacred building where the baptism is to take place. Canon 858 treats the baptismal font. Canons 859 and 860 give exceptions to the general rule stated in canon 857 that baptism should be celebrated in a church or oratory.

Canon 837, §2 asserts the general principle that sacraments should be celebrated in the assembly of the faithful. Since a parish church is the place par excellence where the faithful assemble, the canon states a strong preference for the celebration of baptism in a church or oratory[124] (§1), especially a parish church (§2). Although baptism can be permitted in an oratory, not all the faithful may have general access to an oratory. Consequently, the canon treats oratories as secondary places for baptism. However, private chapels[125] are not mentioned as ordinary places for baptism. Thus, the selection of the place for baptism is not dictated by parochial rights as it was in canon 773 of the 1917 code, but rather by theological and liturgical concerns. Since baptism incorporates a person into the universal community of the faithful, this incorporation is best signified through incorporation into a concrete local community in and through which "there comes into being the one and only Catholic Church" (LG 23).[126] So important is this principle that the canon allows the celebration of baptism in a place other than a church or oratory only in cases of necessity. Examples of cases of necessity are treated in canons 859 and 860.

The Rite of Infant Baptism explains the reason for the preference for celebrating baptism in a parish church: "so that baptism may clearly appear as the sacrament of the Church's faith and of incorporation into the people of God."[127] That these celebrations in the parish should be communal is seen clearly in the Rite's stipulation that, in the case of infant baptism, all the babies to be baptized on a given day are to be baptized in a common celebration and not in separate celebrations at different times on the same day.[128]

Canon 857, §2 determines the specific parish church in which a person's baptism is to take place. "As a rule," the baptism is to be celebrated in the parish church of the adult candidates, or the parish church of the parents of infants. The canon does not require that the parish church of baptism be the one proper to a person by reason of his or her domicile.[129] It has become increasingly common for people to belong to parishes which are theirs not by reason of their domicile, but by reason of their personal choice. The law presumes that adult candidates for baptism have completed

[121] RCIA 49, DOL 2376.

[122] RCIA 58, DOL 2385.

[123] RBaptC 9.

[124] For "church," see c. 1214; for "oratory," see c. 1223. Note that c. 687, §1 of the Eastern code also stipulates a "parish church" for the celebration of baptism, with the same exception regarding the case of necessity. It also makes an exception for "legitimate customs."

[125] See c. 1226.

[126] See Chiappetta Com, 3137.

[127] RBaptC 10, DOL 2294.

[128] IGIC 27, DOL 2276.

[129] See c. 107.

the catechumenal stages of baptismal preparation. As a result, they have acquired a proper parish through their acceptance into the catechumenate. The proper parish church of infants is that of their parents. Canon 857, §2 allows the celebration of baptism in a church or oratory other than the parish church proper to an adult candidate or an infant's parents for a just cause. Only in cases of necessity may baptism be lawfully celebrated outside a church or oratory; only a "just cause," a much less demanding standard, is required to celebrate baptism in a church or oratory other than the parish church proper to the adult candidates or the infants' parents.

The Baptismal Font

Canon 858 — §1. Every parish church is to have a baptismal font, without prejudice to the cumulative right already acquired by other churches.

§2. After having heard the local pastor, the local ordinary can permit or order for the convenience of the faithful that there also be a baptismal font in another church or oratory within the boundaries of the parish.

The requirement that every parish church have a baptismal font is simply a corollary of the previous canon which designates the parish church as the normal and preferred place for the celebration of baptism.[130] Nevertheless, like canon 774, §1 of the 1917 code, canon 858 recognizes that churches or oratories other than parish churches may have acquired the right to have a baptismal font and allows them the right to retain them. To prevent abuses that had detracted from the role of the parish church as the primary place for celebrating baptism, canon 774, §1 of the 1917 code revoked and reprobated privileges and customs that granted non-parochial churches and oratories rights to baptismal fonts and that excluded the rights of parish churches to possess baptismal fonts.[131] Thus, any right to a baptismal font possessed by a non-parochial church or oratory is cumulative with that of the parish church. Other churches may have a baptismal font, but a parish church must have one.[132]

Like canon 774, §2 of the 1917 code, the present canon allows the local ordinary to grant other churches or oratories the right to a baptismal font, if there is a pastoral need for additional places for baptism within the territory of a parish. Distance from the parish church (as suggested by the following canon 859) and ethnic, cultural, or other subgroupings within the parish are examples of situations in which appropriate pastoral convenience may call for a baptismal font in a non-parochial church or oratory. The requirement that, before permitting a non-parochial church or oratory to have a baptismal font, the local ordinary at least consult with the pastor is meant to ensure that the addition of a baptismal font in another part of the parish will not undermine the unity of the parish or lessen the importance of the parish church as the normal place of assembly of the faithful.

The canon's primary concern is that every parish church have a baptismal font, even though, if the pastoral good of the faithful so requires, other churches or oratories may have already acquired or may yet acquire fonts. The ritual treats such matters as the construction of the font[133] and its location within the church,[134] and notes that it "should be spotlessly clean."[135]

Other Churches or Fitting Places

Canon 859 — If because of distance or other circumstances the one to be baptized cannot go or be brought to the parish church or to the other church or oratory mentioned in can. 858, §2 without grave inconvenience, baptism can and must be conferred in another nearer church or oratory, or even in another fitting place.

[130] The Eastern code makes no reference to the baptismal font.

[131] See the commentary on c. 24, §2 on reprobated customs.

[132] See McManus, in CLSA Com, 621.

[133] IGIC 19, DOL 2268.

[134] IGIC 25, DOL 2274.

[135] IGIC 19.

If it is gravely inconvenient for an adult candidate to come to or for parents to bring their infants to their parish church, there is a "just cause" for allowing baptism to be celebrated elsewhere (c. 857, §2).[136] When going to one of the churches or oratories that have acquired the right to a baptismal font (c. 858, §2) would also result in grave inconvenience, baptism may be celebrated in a "fitting place" other than a church or oratory. The canon does not specify any criteria for judging a place to be "fitting," nor does it require any permissions for celebrating the baptism in a fitting place other than a church or oratory. However, the following canon will make it clear that, apart from cases of necessity, private homes and hospitals are not considered to be fitting places for baptism, since to celebrate baptism in these places requires the permission, respectively, of the local ordinary or diocesan bishop.

If the conditions for celebrating baptism in another church or oratory or in another fitting place are met, then the minister "can" and "must" celebrate baptism. The "can" indicates that it is not illicit to celebrate baptism in this other location; the "must" emphasizes that the fact baptism takes place is more important than where it is celebrated.

Private Homes and Hospitals

Canon 860 — §1. Apart from a case of necessity, baptism is not to be conferred in private houses, unless the local ordinary has permitted it for a grave cause.

§2. Except in a case of necessity or for some other compelling pastoral reason, baptism is not to be celebrated in hospitals unless the diocesan bishop has established otherwise.

Although baptism in a parish church is the norm, the code recognizes exceptions to this norm to allow the lawful celebration of baptism elsewhere. Canon 860 represents an "exception" to the other exceptions, since additional permissions are required to celebrate baptisms in private homes and hospitals. This restriction flows from the principle which allows all the other exceptional places of baptism to be permissible: they allow for a representative assembly of the faithful that is called for in every celebration of the sacraments.[137]

Private homes and hospitals are treated in successive paragraphs because the circumstances and the authorities competent to grant the permission required for the liceity of baptisms in these places are different. The canon allows the celebration of baptism in a private home without the prior permission of the local ordinary only in cases of necessity.[138] This norm is consistent with the Rite.[139] However, the Rite limits the cases of necessity when no permission is required for baptisms in private homes to the situation of danger of death and does not foresee that baptisms might be permitted in private homes in other circumstances. The canon is more permissive than the Rite, however, since it allows for celebration of baptism in a private home not only in danger-of-death situations, but also for some other "grave cause" and with the permission of the local ordinary.

The second paragraph deals with the more pastorally frequent situation of baptizing in hospitals. The canon respects the tension between two basic principles: sacraments are to be celebrated in a communal setting, and baptism is necessary for salvation.[140] In deference to the communal nature of sacramental celebration, the canon restricts baptism in hospitals more than it does baptism in pri-

[136] The Eastern code does not make explicit reference to "another" church for celebrating baptism. Canon 687, §1 of the Eastern code states that baptism is to be celebrated "in a parish church" and does not specify, as does c. 857, §2 of the Latin code, either the parish church of an adult or the parish church of the parents in the case of infant baptism. Thus, there is no need for the Eastern code to make any provision for "another" church.

[137] See c. 837, §2.

[138] Canon 687, §2 of the Eastern code is less restrictive. It allows for the celebration of baptism in a private home "according to the prescriptions of particular law or with the permission of the local hierarch." It does not require a "grave cause" as does the Latin code.

[139] RBaptC 12, DOL 2296.

[140] See commentary on c. 849.

vate homes by requiring the permission of the diocesan bishop, not merely that of the local ordinary.[141] In deference to the necessity of baptism for salvation, it allows baptism in hospitals not only in danger-of-death situations but for "some other compelling pastoral reason." This second paragraph draws heavily from the Rite.[142]

CHAPTER II
THE MINISTER OF BAPTISM
[cc. 861–863]

Three canons treat the minister of baptism. Canon 861 defines the ordinary and extraordinary ministers and the circumstances in which the latter may lawfully baptize; canon 862 imposes territorial restrictions on the exercise of this ministry by ordinary ministers; and canon 863 notes the circumstances in which the diocesan bishop is the proper minister of baptism.

Ordinary and Extraordinary Ministers

Canon 861 — §1. The ordinary minister of baptism is a bishop, a presbyter, or a deacon, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 530, n. 1.

§2. When an ordinary minister is absent or impeded, a catechist or another person designated for this function by the local ordinary, or in a case of necessity any person with the right intention, confers baptism licitly. Pastors of souls, especially the pastor of a parish, are to be concerned that the Christian faithful are taught the correct way to baptize.

The ritual uses the term "ministry" to include a wide variety of functions during both the preparation for and celebration of baptism. Parents, sponsors, godparents, catechists, indeed the whole community of the faithful are mentioned explicitly as those charged with ministries and offices in baptism.[143] The code uses "minister" in the more restricted sense of "celebrant" as is clear in the three canons of this chapter. The ordinary minister of baptism is one who has received the sacrament of orders: a bishop, a presbyter, or a deacon.[144]

Canon 741 of the 1917 code did not include deacons among the ordinary ministers of baptism. It spoke of deacons only as extraordinary ministers of baptism who needed a justifying reason to baptize as well as the permission of the local ordinary or pastor. However, this discipline was abrogated long before the promulgation of the present code. Vatican Council II "restored the diaconate as a distinct and permanent rank of the hierarchy" and conferred upon deacons "the duty to administer baptism solemnly."[145]

A slight restriction on the ability of ordinary ministers to baptize lawfully is suggested by the reference in canon 861 to canon 530, 1° which lists those functions that, while no longer reserved to the pastor, are considered as "especially entrusted" to him. Among these is the right to administer baptism in his parish.

All persons (including non-Catholics and even non-Christians) are considered potential extraordinary ministers of baptism. The second paragraph of canon 861 delineates two situations in which extraordinary ministers may baptize lawfully. The first is when an ordinary minister of baptism is not present or is impeded from administering the sacrament. The term "absent" means that a cleric is not physically present. The term "impeded" suggests that a minister may be present or could easily be present, but is physically or [141] The Eastern code places no restrictions on celebrating baptism in a hospital.

[142] RBaptC 13, DOL 2297.

[143] RCIA 41–48, DOL 2368–2375. RBaptC 4–7, DOL 2288–2291.

[144] Canon 677, §§1–2 of the Eastern code speaks only of a priest as the ordinary minister of baptism, since chrismation, which only a priest can confer, immediately follows baptism in ordinary situations. The deacon may serve only as an extraordinary minister of baptism in cases of necessity.

[145] LG 29. See also IGIC 11, DOL 2260. The conciliar directive that deacons confer solemn baptism entered canon law with Paul VI, mp Sacrum diaconatus ordinem, v, 22, 2, June 18, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 702.

morally prevented from exercising his function. For example, a laicized priest or a priest under suspension or some other censure is impeded from administering baptism. In these cases, a lay person previously deputed by the local ordinary is the extraordinary minister. In keeping with Sacrosanctum Concilium 68, the canon specifically mentions catechists as lay people who can appropriately be deputed as extraordinary ministers of baptism.[146] The canon does not, however, reserve this ministry to catechists, as is obvious from the words "or another person."[147] The ritual provides the "Rite of Baptism for Children Administered by a Catechist When No Priest or Deacon Is Available," an abbreviated rite for baptism by an extraordinary minister when ordained ministers are absent or impeded.[148] These situations are common in mission territories as well as in areas of this country which suffer from a scarcity of priests and deacons.

Paragraph two also provides for an extraordinary minister in cases of necessity. The Rite is clearer than the canon that these cases of necessity are danger-of-death situations. In these situations, the extraordinary minister is any person, baptized or not, as long as he or she has the right intention, that is, the intention of the Church. For danger-of-death situations, the ritual provides a "Rite of Baptism for Children in Danger of Death When No Priest or Deacon Is Available." Even an ordinary minister may use this rite if he is present.[149] This rite reflects the concern of the Church that, even in situations of danger of death, the celebration of baptism should have an ecclesial dimension. If death is imminent, however, then all ceremonies are omitted except those required for the validity of baptism: the washing with water and the proper verbal formula.

Because any member of the faithful is a potential minister of baptism, the final sentence in the canon is an exhortation to parish priests, and to pastors in particular, to ensure that the faithful are properly educated in the correct way to baptize. The Rite explains:

> All lay persons, since they belong to the priestly people, and especially parents and, by reason of their work, catechists, midwives, family or social workers or nurses of the sick, as well as physicians and surgeons, should be thoroughly aware, according to their capacities, of the proper method of baptizing in case of emergency. They should be taught by parish priests, deacons, and catechists. Bishops should provide appropriate means within their diocese for such instruction.[150]

Territorial Restrictions on Ordinary Ministers

Canon 862 — Except in a case of necessity, no one is permitted to confer baptism in the territory of another without the required permission, not even upon his own subjects.

Although this canon makes no explicit reference to canon 530, its prohibition of any ordinary minister, including a bishop, from administering baptism outside his own territory is an application of the same principle. The restriction can also be seen as an application of canon 857, §2 which identifies the subject's own parish church as the [146] Canon 677, §2 of the Eastern code presents, in descending order of priority, a more specific listing of who can function as the minister of baptism in cases of necessity: deacons, another cleric, a member of an institute of consecrated life, or any member of the Christian faithful. Parents can baptize their child only if none of these other people is available.

[147] During the final revision of the 1980 schema of the code, it was proposed that if the canon was going to mention a specific office, such as catechist, the canon should also explicitly mention lectors and acolytes as instituted ministries prior to mentioning catechists. Otherwise, no specific office should be singled out. The suggestion was rejected on the grounds that the catechist's role as minister of baptism was already foreseen by the council. See Comm 15 (1983) 180. See SC 68. See also RBaptC 20, DOL 2304.

[148] RBaptC 132–134, DOL 2304–2306.

[149] RBaptC 21, DOL 2305.

[150] IGIC 17, DOL 2266.

preferred place for baptism. Since by baptism one enters the Christian community, the local parish church where the faith of the baptized will be nourished and grow is normally the appropriate place for a person to enter the community of the faithful. The principle underlying the present canon is evident in canons 877–878 which deal with proving and recording baptisms. When proof of baptism is needed, the baptismal register of the person's home parish is the usual place to seek it.

The canon admits of only two circumstances when one ordinary minister of baptism can lawfully celebrate baptism in the territory of another: (1) when there a case of necessity, and (2) when the minister has received the required, and not merely tacit, permission of the one in whose territory he is baptizing. The seriousness of this norm is underscored by the phrase "not even upon his own subjects."

A Restriction on Presbyter and Deacon Ministers

Canon 863 — The baptism of adults, at least of those who have completed their fourteenth year, is to be deferred to the diocesan bishop so that he himself administers it if he has judged it expedient.

The final canon dealing with the proper minister of baptism presents the special case of the baptisms of adults fourteen and older; the celebration of baptism in this case is reserved to the bishop in conformity with the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.[151] The Rite affirms that the bishop is the preferred minister of all the sacraments of initiation, as well as of the rite of election, for all adults,[152] since the whole catechumenal process is placed under his care as the chief liturgist of the diocese.[153] The Rite specifies only "the bishop," although it obviously intends the diocesan bishop. The canon is more explicit on this point than is the ritual.

Nevertheless, the canon calls for the referral to the bishop not of the baptisms of all those considered "adults" for purposes of the rite,[154] but only the baptisms of those fourteen years of age and older.[155] The reason for choosing fourteen years of age is not clear. It does not correspond with the age of majority in the new code (eighteen),[156] nor does it correspond with the age of discretion when young people become adults for purposes of baptism (c. 852, §1). Canon 817 of the 1980 schema had proposed sixteen as the age at which adult baptisms should be referred to the bishop. One member of the committee noted that the choice of the age of sixteen was rather arbitrary.[157] Although the age was later reduced to fourteen, it still appears just as arbitrary.

The canon does not require the diocesan bishop to be the minister of baptism for all adults over fourteen years of age, but obliges the pastor to refer these candidates to him in the event the bishop wants to reserve their baptism to himself. The canon does not prevent the bishop from reserving to himself the baptism of adults younger than fourteen, nor from setting a higher age for those adults whose baptisms he reserves to himself, nor even from reserving all adult baptisms to himself. Should the bishop decide not to reserve any adult baptisms to himself, he can grant the faculty to his priests to be the minister of baptism for all adults over the age of fourteen.

CHAPTER III
THOSE TO BE BAPTIZED
[cc. 864–871]

The title of this chapter, "Those to Be Baptized," is a significant departure from that of the [151] The Eastern code makes no mention of referring candidates for baptism to an ecclesiastical authority higher than the priest.

[152] RCIA 44, DOL 2371. See also IGIC 12, DOL 2261.

[153] See c. 835, §1.

[154] See c. 852, §1.

[155] The parallel in the CIC 744 also refers adults to the bishop but with no specification of age.

[156] See c. 97, §1.

[157] Comm 15 (1983) 180.

former code which used the term "recipients" or "subjects" of baptism. These terms are not appropriate for adults "who consciously and freely seek the living God and enter the way of faith and conversion as the Holy Spirit opens their hearts."[158]

The topics of these eight canons are logically, although unevenly, divided into four areas: the universal capacity for baptism (c. 864); the requisites for adult baptism (cc. 865–866); the requisites for infant baptism (cc. 867–868); and the special situations of conditional baptism, baptism of abandoned children, and baptism of aborted fetuses (cc. 869–871). The canons carefully distinguish between adult baptism and infant baptism. By presenting the canons on adult baptism first, the code implicitly recognizes the normative character of adult baptism.

Universal Capacity for Baptism

Canon 864 — Every person not yet baptized and only such a person is capable of baptism.

This primarily theological canon, reflecting Jesus' command that the gospel be preached to all nations and to every creature,[159] is a concise statement of the absolute universality of the juridic capacity for baptism from which no human being can ever be excluded. To be a "person" is to be capable of baptism. Since the contemporary understanding of the human person necessarily entails that a person is a living being, the canon does not repeat the stipulation of the former code that the person be alive.[160] Neither baptism nor any other sacrament can ever be conferred on a person who is clearly dead.

That the person be "not yet baptized" recognizes that the ontological change which baptism produces is by its very nature unrepeatable as already noted in canon 845, §1. Once one has been claimed by Christ through baptism, the relationship is absolutely irrevocable.

[158] RCIA 1, DOL 2328.
[159] See Mt 28:19; Mk 16:15–16; Jn 3:5.
[160] CIC 745.

Because the gift of salvation is offered to all human beings without exception, nothing whatsoever can ever eradicate this capacity. Although the juridic capacity for baptism is unconditional, the following canons deal with various conditions of age, Christian education, and preparation that affect the lawfulness of the exercise of a person's fundamental capacity for baptism.[161] These conditions must be fulfilled for the full effect of the sacrament to take root in those to be baptized.

Prerequisites for Adult Candidates

Canon 865 — §1. For an adult to be baptized, the person must have manifested the intention to receive baptism, have been instructed sufficiently about the truths of the faith and Christian obligations, and have been tested in the Christian life through the catechumenate. The adult is also to be urged to have sorrow for personal sins.

§2. An adult in danger of death can be baptized if, having some knowledge of the principal truths of the faith, the person has manifested in any way at all the intention to receive baptism and promises to observe the commandments of the Christian religion.

The canon distinguishes between the prerequisites for adult baptism in normal situations and in danger-of-death situations.[162] Paragraph one lists four requirements which differ in their importance for the validity of the baptism.[163] These requirements touch the faculties constitutive of the human person: the will, the intellect, the capacity to act, and the human heart.

First, an adult's intention to be baptized must be externally manifested, since the will to be baptized is necessary for the validity of the sacrament. No one who has attained the use of reason can be validly baptized against his or her will.[164] The [161] See Composta, in Urbaniana Com, 331.

[162] Canon 682 of the Eastern code calls for similar prerequisites.
[163] See Tejero, in Pamplona ComEng, 566.
[164] SCOf, In foliis, August 3, 1860, Collectanea S. Congregationis de propaganda fide; seu Decreta, instructiones, manifest will called for by the canon can be a positive act of the will (the opposite of an express will not to be baptized), a habitual act of the will (an act of the will made previously and never withdrawn), or even an implicit act of the will (the adult or, more commonly, a child of catechetical age intends to do what Christ or the Church wills). Because even a habitual or implicit intention suffices for the validity of baptism, an unconscious person can also be baptized validly, even though the canon does not explicitly state this.[165] Without some intention of the will, an adult cannot be validly baptized. The concern of the canon is not directly with the actual will of the adult candidate, which is required for the validity of baptism, but rather with the external manifestation of that will, which is required for the liceity of baptism.

The second prerequisite touches on the faculty of the intellect: the adult must be sufficiently instructed in the truths of the faith and in the obligations which that faith entails. The canon does not make explicit what those truths of the faith are. They would certainly include the existence of God, the final judgment, the incarnation, the resurrection, and the Trinity.[166] The canon presumes the preparation supplied through the catechumenal process called for in canon 851, 1°. When candidates for adult baptism are children of catechetical age, the requirement of knowledge of the faith must be adapted to their age, as well as to their culture, background, and environment.[167] Although knowledge of the faith is obviously important for one called to live the Christian life, only a person's lack of faith itself and not deficiencies in knowledge of the faith would invalidate his or her baptism.

The third requirement touches on the adult's capacity to put his or her faith into practice by living the Christian life and considers the catechumenate as the locus par excellence for testing that faith. The catechumenate also furnishes the pastor and community the opportunity to evaluate the candidate's readiness for baptism.

The final requirement touches on the heart: the adult is urged to express sorrow for personal sins which will be forgiven through reception of the sacrament. The term "urged" indicates that such sorrow for personal sins is not required for the validity of baptism.

Paragraph two treats the prerequisites for adult baptism in danger-of-death situations. With the exception of sorrow for sin, which is not mentioned in this paragraph, the prerequisites are relaxations of the requirements listed in paragraph one. The will to be baptized may be manifested "in any way at all," even only implicitly. The adult is required to have only "some" knowledge of the "principal truths" of the faith, not the "sufficient" knowledge called for in normal situations. Nor does the canon mention the obligations flowing from that faith as did paragraph one; rather, the adult is to promise "to observe the commandments of the Christian religion" if he or she recovers.

These mitigated prerequisites are to be presumed to have been met when the adult is a catechumen. When the adult in danger of death is not a catechumen, he or she > must give serious indications of being converted to Christ and of renouncing pagan worship and must not be seen to be attached to anything that conflicts with the moral life. The person must also make a promise to go through the complete cycle of initiation upon recovering.[168]

Completion of the Sacraments of Initiation

Canon 866 — Unless there is a grave reason to the contrary, an adult who is baptized is to be confirmed immediately after baptism and is to participate in the eucharistic celebration also by receiving communion.

rescripta pro apostolicis missionibus, I, Ann. 1622–1866, nn. 1–1299 (Rome: SCProp, 1907) n. 1198, pp. 655–656.

[165] The 1917 code recognized this explicitly in c. 752, §3.

[166] Tejero, in Pamplona ComEng, 566.

[167] W. Woestman, Sacraments (Ottawa: Saint Paul University, 1996) 59.

[168] RCIA 279, DOL 2422.

The seriousness of the requirement that the other sacraments of initiation follow immediately upon an adult's reception of baptism, even in danger-of-death situations, is indicated by the fact that the code requires "a grave reason" to defer these other sacraments.[169] The language of the 1917 code was a little stronger. It required that the newly baptized assist at Mass and receive communion immediately (statim) after baptism unless a "grave and urgent reason" prevented it.[170] During the formulation of the present code both lighter and stricter reasons were proposed for departure from the norm that adults receive all three sacraments of initiation in a continuous ceremony. An early schema called only for a "just" reason to defer confirmation.[171] The 1980 schema called for a "grave" reason as does the present code, although it was proposed that the canon call for a "most grave" (gravissima) reason for not completing baptism immediately with confirmation and Eucharist.[172]

The Rite uses less preceptive terminology: "A priest who baptizes should confer confirmation after the baptism..., and whenever possible... should give the Eucharist."[173] The present canon uses stronger terms. The adult who is baptized "is to be confirmed... and is to participate in the eucharistic celebration," an obligation further intensified by the opening phrase "unless there is a grave reason to the contrary." Examples of such a grave reason are given in the rite for adult initiation in danger-of-death situations: when a priest baptizes and does not have chrism or lacks the time and materials needed for celebration of the Eucharist.[174]

The canon is a corollary to canon 842, §2 which speaks of the interrelationship of all three of the sacraments of initiation.

The Time for Celebrating Infant Baptism

Canon 867 — §1. Parents are obliged to take care that infants are baptized in the first few weeks; as soon as possible after the birth or even before it, they are to go to the pastor to request the sacrament for their child and to be prepared properly for it.

§2. An infant in danger of death is to be baptized without delay.

Canons 867–868 present the prerequisites for lawful infant baptism. Canon 867 treats the appropriate length of time between an infant's birth and his or her baptism; canon 868 states what is required of parents for the licit celebration of their children's baptism. The canons require nothing of the infants themselves. Like canons 865–866, these canons distinguish between baptism in ordinary and in extraordinary circumstances.

The time for celebrating infant baptism has varied throughout history. In the ancient Church infant baptism was celebrated in conjunction with adult initiation, primarily on Easter and Pentecost. During the Dark and Middle Ages, the precariousness of life led to the increasing practice of baptizing infants as soon as possible after birth. This practice was mandated by the Council of Florence[175] which decreed that infants are to be baptized as soon as possible (quamprimum), either immediately after birth or in the first month of life. This was the practice reflected in the 1917

[169] The absence of a parallel canon in the Eastern code reflects the long practice of the Eastern churches of celebrating in one ceremony all three sacraments of initiation for infants, not just for adults as is the case in the Western churches.

[170] CIC 753, §1. This canon did not, however, allow the priest who baptized an adult to confirm him or her. Since few Latin rite priests had the faculty to confirm, the reception of confirmation and Eucharist by adults who were baptized took place at different ceremonies, often separated by a considerable period of time, and not in the context of the same liturgical celebration as called for by the present ritual and canon.

[171] Comm 13 (1981) 222.

[172] Comm 15 (1983) 181.

[173] RCIA 280, DOL 2444.

[174] Ibid. Although a priest may bless the oil of the sick during the celebration of the sacrament of anointing (c. 999, 2°) he may never consecrate chrism (c. 880, §2).

[175] Council of Florence, sess. XI, Bulla unionis Coptorum, DOL 576.

code,[176] which left the determination of the exact meaning of quamprimum to particular law. In the United States, the Plenary Council of Baltimore interpreted quamprimum to mean "at once."[177] Thus, it was not uncommon for mothers not to be present for the baptism of their own children.

The present law reflects a middle ground between these two traditions. Canon 867 does not use the word quamprimum to determine the appropriate time for infant baptism but calls for baptism during "the first few weeks" of an infant's life. The following canon will call for a greater interval between birth and baptism if the parents' lack of faith leaves no hope that the infant will be brought up in the practice of the faith. Canon 856 sees the Easter Vigil as the privileged time for baptism of both adults and infants and recalls that this was the time for infant baptism in the ancient tradition of the Church.

The change in discipline reflects the postconciliar theology of baptism summarized in canon 849. Since popular piety may still think of the baptism of infants only in terms of the removal of original sin and insurance against limbo, the sense of urgency is shifted from the baptism itself to the catechesis of the infant's parents about baptism and their formation for raising their child in the faith. It is this catechesis and formation that are to occur quamprimum after the infant's birth or even before it. The necessity of this preparation is the reason for the code's greater flexibility regarding the time when an infant is to be baptized.[178] Besides the need for time to provide proper preparation to the parents, the Rite mentions other reasons for an interval between an infant's birth and his or her baptism: the welfare of the child, the health of the mother, and the time needed to plan the ceremony.[179] The Rite also authorizes episcopal conferences "to determine a longer interval between birth and baptism."[180]

Parental Prerequisites for Infant Baptism

Canon 868 — §1. For an infant to be baptized licitly:

1° the parents or at least one of them or the person who legitimately takes their place must consent;

2° there must be a founded hope that the infant will be brought up in the Catholic religion; if such hope is altogether lacking, the baptism is to be delayed according to the prescripts of particular law after the parents have been advised about the reason.

§2. An infant of Catholic parents or even of non-Catholic parents is baptized licitly in danger of death even against the will of the parents.

The canon distinguishes between prerequisites for parents in ordinary situations and in danger-of-death situations. The opening line of the canon makes it clear that these prerequisites are only for the liceity of the baptism and not for its validity.

The canon stipulates two prerequisites in ordinary situations. The first is that it be the will of the parents to have the infant baptized. By presenting a child for baptism, the parents accept the responsibility to see that the fruits of the sacrament come to realization as the child matures. This responsibility cannot be accepted if the parents are unwilling to have their child baptized. While, in ideal situations, both parents would share this willingness, the willingness of one of them or of a guardian or a person who takes the place of the parent is sufficient to render the baptism lawful.

The parents' desire for their child's baptism must be sincere. Normally, this sincerity is evidenced by their own practice of the faith and by the fact that they do not view baptism as a mere social convention.[181] This sincerity is the basis for

[176] CIC 770.

[177] For a historical development of the time for celebrating infant baptism, see McManus, in CLSA Com, 626.

[178] Canon 686, §1 of the Eastern code calls for baptism to be celebrated as soon as possible "according to legitimate custom."

[179] RBaptC 8, DOL 2292.

[180] RBaptC 25, DOL 2309.

[181] See CDF, Reply to Bishop B. Henrion of Dapango, July 13, 1970, DOL 2318, n. 2.

the well-founded hope that the child will be raised in the practice of the faith which the canon requires for the lawfulness of the baptism. If this well-founded hope is lacking, the celebration of the sacrament is to be delayed. The canon draws from an earlier instruction issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith:

> Pastoral action regarding the baptism of infants must, in the concrete order, be governed by two principles, the second of which is subordinate to the first. (1) Baptism, which is necessary for salvation, is a sign and instrument of God's prevenient love which frees us from original sin and gives us a share in the divine life: considered on its own merits, the gift of these blessings for infants must not be put off. (2) Assurances must be given that this gift will be able to grow through a genuine education in faith and in Christian living, that the sacrament may attain its full "truth." As a rule, these assurances are given within the Christian community. If, on the other hand, these assurances are not in reality serious, that fact can be reason for postponing the sacrament. Finally, if it is certain that there are no assurances, the sacrament must be denied.[182]

The consequence of a clear lack of any well-founded hope of the child being raised in the faith is somewhat softened in the canon. If assurances are altogether lacking, the baptism is not to be denied outright, as was stipulated in the instruction from the Congregation, but rather "delayed."[183] Since the canon calls for a postponement rather than a denial of baptism, the pastor should maintain contact with the parents and offer whatever help they may need so that, in time, they will be able to supply the assurance the canon calls for, and proceed to the celebration of their child's baptism.

The canon imposes two additional requirements on those who make the decision to postpone an infant's baptism because of the absence of founded hope that the child will be raised in the faith. First, the postponement must follow the prescripts of particular law, either of a diocesan bishop or of the episcopal conference. Second, the baptism is to be postponed only after the parents have been informed of the reasons for this action. The canon is concerned that the postponement of the baptism not further alienate them from the Church, and, by making their reconciliation more difficult, cause additional delays in the celebration of the infant's baptism.

The formulation of canon 868, §2 followed a tortuous path during the code revision process due to differing opinions among the consultors regarding the liceity of baptizing infants in danger-of-death situations against the explicit wishes of their parents or those who take the parents' place. In the first schema of the canons on baptism, the norm on infant baptism in danger-of-death situations was the exact opposite of that in the present canon: the baptism of an infant against the wishes of the parents was judged illicit.[184] In the course of discussion among consultors, the canon was rephrased several times between 1978 and 1983. The first revised version continued to assert the unlawfulness of baptizing infants in danger of death against the will of their parents. It stated, however, that, in danger-of-death situations, the baptism of an infant of Catholic or non-Catholic parents was licit, provided that this was not contrary to the will of the parents.[185] A slightly more restrictive formulation was proposed by the addition of the phrase "and provided that no danger of hatred of religion result."[186] Further discussion led to a substantial change in the proposed formulation of the canon: the baptism was to be considered licit even if both the parents were expressly opposed to the baptism, provided that no danger of hatred of religion would result.[187] This was the version proposed in the 1980 schema. The final revision eliminated the phrase regarding "hatred of religion" on the ground that the fact that such hatred may result was not as important as the salvation of the infant through baptism. The result of these discussions was the canon in its present form.

[182] CDF, instr Pastoralis actio, n. 28, October 20, 1980, AAS 72 (1980) 1137–1156.

[183] In a private response ten years previous to Pastoralis actio, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith called not for postponing or denying the sacrament when the assurances were insufficient, but for "the enrollment of the child with a view to its being baptized later [and] further pastoral meetings as a way of preparing them [the parents] for the rite of reception of the child for baptism." This enrollment was seen as analogous to the enrollment of adults in the catechumenate. See CDF, Reply, June 13, 1970, in N 7 (1971) 69–70, DOL 2317–2318. The later instruction by the same congregation rejected this alternative so that there would be no confusion between such a rite of enrollment of children and baptism. See McManus, in CLSA Com, 627.

[184] Comm 3 (1971) 200.

In situations of danger of death, it is lawful to baptize an infant against the express will of the infant's parents. However, it is clear that the canon in no way advocates that a child, even in danger of death, be baptized against the express will of the parents. It simply presents a juridical clarification of the liceity of a baptism administered under those conditions.

Conditional Baptism

Canon 869 — §1. If there is a doubt whether a person has been baptized or whether baptism was conferred validly and the doubt remains after a serious investigation, baptism is to be conferred conditionally.

§2. Those baptized in a non-Catholic ecclesial community must not be baptized conditionally unless, after an examination of the matter and the form of the words used in the conferral of baptism and a consideration of the intention of the baptized adult and the minister of the baptism, a serious reason exists to doubt the validity of the baptism.

§3. If in the cases mentioned in §§1 and 2 the conferral or validity of the baptism remains doubtful, baptism is not to be conferred until after the doctrine of the sacrament of baptism is explained to the person to be baptized, if an adult, and the reasons of the doubtful validity of the baptism are explained to the person or, in the case of an infant, to the parents.

The canon is an application to baptism of the principle stated in canon 845, §1 regarding (1) the non-repeatability of baptism, confirmation, and sacred orders, the sacraments which impose a character, and (2) the conditions under which these sacraments may be conferred conditionally when there is serious doubt as to whether they were conferred at all or whether they were conferred validly.

The general norm for conditional baptism is based on two underlying principles: the unrepeatability of baptism, and the necessity of baptism for the valid reception of any other sacrament. It is little more than a restatement of canon 845. Two types of doubt may arise: a doubt about the fact of the baptism (whether it was ever received at all) and a doubt about the validity of the baptism previously conferred. The fact of a baptism may be doubtful if no record of it can be produced and there are no witnesses to the baptism. Doubt about the validity of a baptism may arise if there is reason to question whether the washing with water was omitted, whether the required verbal form was used, or whether the minister or the one baptized as an adult had the proper intentions. The canon calls for a serious investigation to attempt to resolve such doubts (see c. 845, §2). If a doubt still persists after this investigation, conditional baptism is to be conferred.[188]

When a person was baptized in a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community, there is usually no doubt whatsoever about the fact that the baptism occurred; the only area of doubt is whether or not the baptism was conferred validly. Since the person was baptized a Christian, the law presumes that the baptism was valid. The reasons for doubting the validity of the baptism conferred in the non-Catholic church or ecclesial community must be supported by sufficient evidence to call the reliabil-

[185] Comm 13 (1981) 223.
[186] Comm 13 (1981) 224.
[187] Ibid.

[188] The Eastern code has no parallel canon on conditional baptism.

ity of this presumption into question. Therefore, those baptized in non-Catholic Christian churches and ecclesial communities are not to be baptized conditionally unless a serious doubt or a positive and probable doubt remains even after a thorough investigation of the matter. This caution reflects the 1967 Ecumenical Directory which prohibits the indiscriminate conditional baptism of those already baptized in a non-Catholic Christian community: "The practice of conditional baptism of all without distinction who desire to enter full communion with the Catholic Church cannot be approved."[189]

To safeguard the integrity of baptism and to respect the ecclesial nature of non-Catholic churches and ecclesial communities,[190] the areas which must be investigated before conferring conditional baptism include: the matter and the verbal formula used, the intention of the one baptized, and the intention of the minister of baptism. The investigation should consider first the norms, rituals, and customs of the non-Catholic ecclesial community to determine whether or not what the community generally does when baptizing results in valid baptism. If this investigation reveals no doubt about the validity of baptism conferred in that community, doubt can persist only if there is evidence that the minister did not follow the approved rites of his or her own community.

Non-Catholic ecclesial communities whose baptisms are recognized as valid by the Catholic Church include, besides all Eastern non-Catholics: African Methodist Episcopal, Amish, Anglican, Assembly of God, Baptists, Evangelical United Brethren, Church of the Brethren, Church of God, Congregational Church, Disciples of Christ, Episcopalians, Evangelical Churches, Lutherans, Methodists, Liberal Catholic Church, Old Catholics, Old Roman Catholics, Church of the Nazarene, Polish National Church, Presbyterian Church, Reformed Churches, Seventh Day Adventists, and the United Church of Christ.[191]

The question of conditional baptism usually arises when an adult, previously baptized in a non-Catholic Christian community, seeks full communion with the Catholic Church. The Rite calls for the prudent investigation as explained in paragraph two of the canon:

> The sacrament of baptism may not be repeated and conditional baptism is not permitted unless there is a prudent doubt about the fact or validity of the baptism already received. If after serious investigation it seems necessary—because of such prudent doubt—to confer baptism again conditionally, the minister should explain beforehand the reasons why baptism is conferred conditionally in this instance and he should administer it in the private form. The local Ordinary shall determine, in individual cases, what rites are to be included or excluded in conditional baptism.[192]

The third paragraph of canon 869 is a pastoral norm which is drawn primarily from the Rite. It presumes that the conditions for a conditional baptism outlined in the two previous paragraphs have been met. Before the conditional baptism takes place, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, the canon calls for an explanation of the doctrine of baptism and the reasons for the conditional baptism. These explanations are to be given to the adult candidate directly and to the parents in the case of infant baptism.

The canon does not include the statement in the Rite that the conditional baptism is to be celebrated privately. The 1917 code distinguished between solemn and private baptism. Baptism was solemn when all the ceremonies were celebrated, private when they were not.[193] This distinction has not been retained in the revised code. The "private"

[189] Ecum Dir I, 14.
[190] Ecum Dir I,13.
[191] J. Huels, The Pastoral Companion (Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1986) 51.
[192] RCIA, Appendix, "Rite of Receiving Baptized Christians into the Full Communion of the Catholic Church," 7, DOL 2482.
[193] CIC 755, §1 and 759.

baptism called for in the Rite is one that is not celebrated publicly. The reasons for this preference are the same as those that prompt the Rite to recommend restraint when receiving into full communion one baptized in a non-Catholic community:

> Any appearance of triumphalism should be carefully avoided and the manner of celebrating this Mass should be decided beforehand and with a view to the particular circumstances. Both the ecumenical implications and the bond between the candidate and the parish community should be considered. Often it will be preferable to celebrate the Mass with only a few relatives and friends.[194]

Not all the rites and ceremonies need be celebrated in a conditional baptism. Sometimes, it is sufficient simply to supply those ceremonies whose omission or defect gave rise to doubts about the validity of the original baptism. The Rite notes that this determination is to be left to the local ordinary.

Baptism of an Abandoned Child

Canon 870 — An abandoned infant or a foundling is to be baptized unless after diligent investigation the baptism of the infant is established.

The last two canons of this chapter deal with special cases of baptism. Canon 870 treats the baptism of an abandoned child; canon 871 that of an aborted but viable fetus.[195]

In canon 869, the presumption was that baptism conferred in a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community is valid until the contrary is proven. In canon 870, the presumption is reversed. Abandoned children are presumed not to have been baptized until the contrary is proven. Whereas canon 869 called for a diligent investigation to overturn the presumption that the original baptism was valid, the present canon calls for a similar investigation to rebut the presumption that an abandoned child was not baptized.

The canon is also an exception to canon 868, §1, 2° which stipulates that in order to baptize an infant, there must be a founded hope that the child will be raised in the practice of the faith, and that this assurance is the responsibility of the parents or guardian. No such guarantees can be given in the case of an abandoned child. Therefore, the assurance of Catholic upbringing will have to come from those who will care for the child. Until it is determined that a Catholic will be entrusted with the care of the abandoned child, there should be no rush to baptize the child, outside a danger-of-death situation.

Baptism of an Aborted Fetus

Canon 871 — If aborted fetuses are alive, they are to be baptized insofar as possible.

The 1917 code contained several canons on baptizing fetuses.[196] These detailed norms stipulated when to baptize absolutely and conditionally depending on the manner in which the child was aborted. The present canon reduces all these norms to one. Regardless of how the abortion occurred, baptism is to be conferred as long as the fetus is alive. If the fetus is clearly dead, baptism cannot be conferred.[197] Although the canon does not explicitly address the case of doubt, a doubtfully living fetus should be baptized conditionally, as provided for in the 1917 code.[198]

It is highly unlikely that a priest, deacon, catechist, or another person designated to baptize will

[194] RCIA, Appendix, "Rite of Receiving Baptized Christians into the Full Communion of the Catholic Church," 3, DOL 2478.

[195] Canon 680 of the Eastern code treats the case of a fetus and c. 681, §2 that of a foundling.

[196] CIC 746–748.

[197] See Pastoral Care 224: "It may be necessary to explain to the family of the person who is dead that sacraments are celebrated for the living, not for the dead, and that the dead are effectively helped by the prayers of the living."

[198] CIC 745.

be present for the baptism of a fetus. The Rite presumes this situation, and, referring to canon 861, §2, it reminds pastors of their obligation to instruct lay people, especially "midwives, family or social workers or nurses of the sick, as well as physicians and surgeons" on how to baptize.[199]

CHAPTER IV
SPONSORS
[cc. 872–874]

The three canons of this chapter give a summary treatment of the office of sponsor.[200] Canon 872 speaks in very general terms of the responsibility of sponsors. Canon 873 specifies the number of sponsors. Canon 874 lists the qualifications for this office.

Responsibilities of Sponsors

Canon 872 — Insofar as possible, a person to be baptized is to be given a sponsor who assists an adult in Christian initiation or together with the parents presents an infant for baptism. A sponsor also helps the baptized person to lead a Christian life in keeping with baptism and to fulfill faithfully the obligations inherent in it.

The canon defines the sponsor as one who assists an adult in Christian initiation, or who, together with the parents, presents an infant at baptism. While the Canon Law Society of America (CLSA) translation of the code uses the word "sponsor" for this office, the official Latin text uses the terms patrinus and matrina, which are more accurately translated as "godfather" and "godmother." The role and function of godparents, properly speaking, are treated more extensively in the Rite. The General Introduction to Christian Initiation delineates the role of the godparent:

> It is a very ancient custom of the Church that adults are not admitted to baptism without a godparent, a member of the Christian community who will assist them at least in the final preparation for baptism and after baptism will help them persevere in the faith and in their lives as Christians.
>
> In the baptism of children, as well, a godparent is to be present in order to represent the expansion of the spiritual family of the one to be baptized and the role of the Church as a mother. As occasion offers, the godparent helps the parents to lead the child to profess the faith and to show this by living it.
>
> At least in the final rites of the catechumenate and in the actual celebration of baptism, the godparent's part is to testify to the faith of the adult candidate or, together with the parents, to profess the Church's faith, in which the child is being baptized.[201]

The General Introduction then proceeds to list the qualifications of "godparents." These correspond word for word with the qualifications listed in canon 874 for "sponsors." Thus, one should be aware that the English translation of the code consistently uses the term "sponsor" for what the Latin text of the code terms "godparents" (patrinus, matrina). It should also be noted that the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults uses the term "godparents" for those who perform the functions mentioned in canon 872.

This confusion in translation would cause no problem, except that the Rite uses the term "sponsor" for an office which is quite distinct from that of godparent:

> Any candidate seeking admission as a catechumen is accompanied by a sponsor, that is, a man or woman who has known and assisted the candidate and stands as a witness to the candidate's moral character, faith, and intention. It may happen that this sponsor is > not the one who will serve as godparent (patrinus, matrina) for the periods of purification, enlightenment, and mystagogy; in that case, another person takes the sponsor's place in the role of godparent.

[199] IGIC 17, DOL 2266.

[200] A similar treatment of sponsors is found in cc. 684–686 of the Eastern code.

[201] IGIC 8–9, DOL 2257–2258.

>
> But on the day of election, at the celebration of the sacraments, and during the period of mystagogy the candidate is accompanied by a godparent (patrinus, matrina). This is a person chosen by the candidate on the basis of example, good qualities, and friendship, delegated by the local Christian community, and approved by the priest.[202]

According to the Rite, the offices of sponsor and godparent are distinct. The sponsor is one who assists the catechumen during the initial stages of the journey, while the godparent accompanies the candidate at the celebration of the rite of election, at the baptism, and during the period of post-baptismal catechesis.

In presenting the responsibilities of sponsors (godparents), canon 872 mentions first the responsibility unique to adult baptism, then the responsibility unique to infant baptism, and finally two additional responsibilities common to both.

The responsibility unique to adult baptism is "to assist an adult in Christian initiation." This "assistance" is explained more fully in the Rite: to assist an adult "for the periods of purification, enlightenment, and mystagogy,"[203] that is, for the final stages of initiation. The responsibility of the sponsor at the baptism of an infant is shared conjointly with the parents: "to present an infant for baptism." Responsibilities common to both adult and infant baptism are: to assist the one baptized in living the Christian life and in fulfilling faithfully the obligations flowing from it. The Rite expands on these roles:

> It is the responsibility of the godparent to show the candidate how to practice the Gospel in personal and social life and to be for the candidate a bearer of Christian witness and a guardian over growth in the baptismal life. Chosen before the candidate's election, the godparent fulfills this office publicly from the day of the election, testifying to the community about the candidate. The godparents continue to be important during the time after reception of the sacraments when the neophyte needs to be assisted to remain true to the baptismal promises.[204]

The Rite says little about godparents in infant baptism: "Because of the natural relationship, parents have a more important ministry and role in the baptism of infants than the godparents."[205] The Rite then develops five areas of responsibility for parents, but never mentions godparents again, except to note that each child may have a godfather and a godmother.[206]

A sponsor (godparent) is not necessary for a valid and licit baptism, although it is clear that his or her presence is desired and preferred. The presence of a sponsor at adult baptism "is a very ancient custom of the Church."[207] The presence of a sponsor at infant baptism is also desirable "in order to represent the expansion of the spiritual family of the one to be baptized and the role of the Church as a mother."[208]

Canon 762 of the 1917 code spoke of a spiritual relationship that arose from serving as a sponsor in a solemn baptism. This relationship had a juridical consequence. It gave rise to an impediment to marriage between the sponsor and the one baptized. In the present code this diriment impediment has been abrogated.

Although the canon says nothing about a sponsor's presence through a proxy, this silence is not to be understood as barring the use of a proxy to stand in for an absent sponsor.

[202] RCIA 42–43, DOL 2369–2370.
[203] Ibid.

[204] RCIA 43, DOL 2370.
[205] RBaptC 5, DOL 2289.
[206] RBaptC 6, DOL 2290.
[207] IGIC 8, DOL 2257.
[208] Ibid.

Number of Sponsors

Canon 873 — There is to be only one male sponsor or one female sponsor or one of each.

The canon designates the number of sponsors permitted at the celebration of both adult and infant baptism. It allows for either one sponsor, male or female, or two, one male and one female.[209] The rite of adult baptism always speaks of the sponsor in the singular, indicating perhaps a preference for only one sponsor. The Rite of Baptism for Children states more clearly, "Each child may have a godfather and a godmother; the word 'godparents' is used in the Rite to describe both."[210] This indicates that the Rite seems to prefer that two sponsors be present at the baptism. In any case, the canon allows for both of these preferences. The use of the term "godparents" rather than "sponsors" makes obvious the stipulation that if two are present, they should not be of the same sex.

The canon does not permit more than two sponsors. This may call for some pastoral sensitivity in those cultures in which it is traditional for more than two people to be designated as godparents or sponsors. In such a case it is advisable for the minister to consult with the parents prior to the baptism and determine which two names (one male, one female) will be inscribed in the baptismal register.

Prerequisites for Sponsors

Canon 874 — §1. To be permitted to take on the function of sponsor a person must:

1° be designated by the one to be baptized, by the parents or the person who takes their place, or in their absence by the pastor or minister and have the aptitude and intention of fulfilling this function;

2° have completed the sixteenth year of age, unless the diocesan bishop has established another age, or the pastor or minister has granted an exception for a just cause;

3° be a Catholic who has been confirmed and has already received the most holy sacrament of the Eucharist and who leads a life of faith in keeping with the function to be taken on;

4° not be bound by any canonical penalty legitimately imposed or declared;

5° not be the father or mother of the one to be baptized.

§2. A baptized person who belongs to a non-Catholic ecclesial community is not to participate except together with a Catholic sponsor and then only as a witness of the baptism.

The first paragraph lists five prerequisites for exercising the office of sponsor. First, the sponsor must be properly designated. In infant baptism, the choice of sponsors belongs first to the parents, then to those who take the parents' place, and finally to the parish priest. For adult baptism, the adult himself or herself designates the sponsor.

Second, the sponsor must be at least sixteen years old. However, the diocesan bishop may determine a different age. In individual cases, the pastor or the minister of the sacrament can, for a just reason, make an exception either to the canonical age or to the age established by the diocesan bishop.

Third, because of the theological interrelatedness of the sacraments of initiation, the sponsor must be a fully initiated Catholic. Since the sponsor's role extends beyond the ceremony of baptism and includes the responsibility "to help the baptized person to lead a Christian life in keeping with baptism and to fulfill faithfully the obligations inherent in it" (c. 872), it is only fitting that the sponsor be a Catholic who has already received the sacraments of confirmation and the Eucharist. But even a fully initiated Catholic may be restricted from exercising the office of sponsor if he or she does not live the faith in a manner that is in keeping with the responsibilities of this office. Thus, people who do not participate regularly in the Eucharist or who are living in marriages not recognized by the Church may not be qualified to function as sponsors. Fourth, those who labor under a declared or imposed canonical penalty are barred from serving as sponsors.

[209] Canon 684, §1 of the Eastern code places no limitation on the number of sponsors.

[210] RBaptC 7, DOL 2290.

Fifth, parents are prohibited from being sponsors of their own children. The parents are primarily responsible for raising the child in the faith.[211] The godparents' role is simply to assist them. However, the role of the sponsor becomes more critical when the parents fail in their responsibility. Thus, the canon clearly distinguishes between the role of parent and that of godparent. The canon does not, however, repeat the 1917 code's disqualification of religious, priests, and deacons and spouses of adult candidates from undertaking the office of sponsor.[212]

The second paragraph permits a non-Catholic Christian to exercise the role of a Christian witness in the celebration of baptism. The witness does not replace the sponsor. The canon responds to the pastoral situation in which, often for merely social reasons, the parents want to choose as a sponsor a relative or close friend who is Christian but not Catholic. The canon tries to balance the tension between the canonical and sacramental role of the sponsor and a merely social understanding of this office:

> For reasons of kinship or friendship, a Christian of another Communion, having a convinced faith in Christ, can be admitted along with the Catholic godparent as a Christian witness to a baptism. In similar circumstances, a Catholic can fulfill this role for a member of a Community separated from us. In these cases the responsibility for the Christian upbringing of the candidate falls per se on the godparent who is a member of the Church or Ecclesial Community in which the infant is baptized.[213]

The canon repeats the stipulation of the Ecumenical Directory that the Christian witness may function only with a Catholic sponsor, that is, with a sponsor who meets the canonical prerequisites for the office.

The second paragraph does not make explicit allowance for a member of a separated Eastern church to serve as a sponsor, and not merely as a Christian witness, at the baptism of a Roman Catholic, even though this explicit recognition was proposed during the drafting of the present code.[214] Canon 685, §3 of the Eastern code does, however, explicitly permit non-Catholic members of Eastern churches to be sponsors at Catholic baptisms. The 1967 Ecumenical Directory, whose provisions are still in force, also allows a separated Eastern Christian to undertake the role of sponsor:

> It is permissible for a just reason to accept one of the faithful of an Eastern Church as godparent along with a Catholic godparent at the baptism of a Catholic infant or adult, as long as the Catholic upbringing of the one being baptized is provided for and there is assurance that the person is fit to be a godparent. A Catholic invited to stand as a godparent at a baptism in an Eastern Church is not forbidden to do so. In such cases the duty of looking out for the Christian upbringing of the baptized falls first upon the godparent belonging to the Church in which the child is baptized.[215]

It is not permissible, however, for a member of a separated Eastern church to function as a sponsor in a Catholic baptism unless there is also a Catholic sponsor.[216] The Eastern code makes this point clear in canon 685, §3.

[211] SC 67. See also RBaptC 5, DOL 2289.

[212] See CIC 765, 3° and 766, 4°, 5°.

[213] Ecum Dir 57.

[214] See Comm 15 (1983) 230–231.

[215] Ecum Dir 48.

[216] See J. Cuneo, "Canon 874: Members of Greek Orthodox Church as Sponsors at Catholic Baptism," in CLSA Advisory Opinions (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995), 261–264.

CHAPTER V
THE PROOF AND REGISTRATION OF THE CONFERRAL OF BAPTISM
[cc. 875–878]

The final four canons treat first the means of establishing the fact of baptism, or, in other words, the proof of baptism (cc. 875–876), and second the registration or recording of that fact (cc. 877–878).

Establishing Proof of Baptism

Canon 875 — A person who administers baptism is to take care that, unless a sponsor is present, there is at least a witness who can attest to the conferral of the baptism.

Canon 876 — To prove the conferral of baptism, if prejudicial to no one, the declaration of one witness beyond all exception is sufficient or the oath of the one baptized if the person received baptism as an adult.

Canons 875 and 876 are concerned that there be living witnesses of the baptism who can verify that it took place. In contemporary society, witnesses are particularly important forms of proof in civil and criminal trials. Otherwise, documents or certificates which attest to the occurrence of an event are more common and even preferred. The first two canons on proofs reflect a cultural milieu where proof by documents is not the rule but the exception, and where witnesses are the usual means for providing proof. Nevertheless, the canons have practical relevance for those situations in which a baptismal record cannot be produced.

Canon 875 concerns a baptism at which there was no sponsor, who is ordinarily the principal witness to the baptism. This situation is most likely to occur in the case of baptism in danger-of-death situations. The canon places a responsibility on the minister to see that some other witness is present who will be able to verify that the baptism did indeed take place.

Canon 876 establishes the probative value of the testimony of a witness to a baptism. The testimony of a single witness is sufficient to establish the fact of a baptism. If the person was baptized as an adult, the word of the baptized person is sufficient to establish proof of baptism. This canon is an exception to the general rule that the testimony of a single witness cannot normally provide full proof (c. 1573).

The canon notes that for the testimony of a single witness to provide full proof of baptism, the witness must be above suspicion, i.e., the witness's honesty must be above reproach. The canon states that the testimony of a single witness, even an honest one, or the testimony of the baptized adult alone may not be sufficient proof in "prejudicial" cases. A prejudicial case is one in which the rights of another person may be adversely affected, such as a contested marriage case if the declaration of nullity rests on the proof or disproof of a person's baptism. In cases such as this, the testimony of a single witness may be judged insufficient and more convincing proof may be required.[217]

Recording the Baptism

Canon 877 — §1. The pastor of the place where the baptism is celebrated must carefully and without any delay record in the baptismal register the names of the baptized, with mention made of the minister, parents, sponsors, witnesses, if any, the place and date of the conferral of the baptism, and the date and place of birth.

§2. If it concerns a child born to an unmarried mother, the name of the mother must be inserted, if her maternity is established publicly or if she seeks it willingly in writing or before two witnesses. Moreover, the name of the father must be inscribed if a public document or his own declaration before the pastor and two witnesses proves his paternity; in other cases, the name of the baptized is inscribed with no mention of the name of the father or the parents.

[217] See commentary on c. 1573.

§3. If it concerns an adopted child, the names of those adopting are to be inscribed and, at least if it is done in the civil records of the region, also the names of the natural parents according to the norm of §§1 and 2, with due regard for the prescripts of the conference of bishops.

Canon 878 — If the baptism was not administered by the pastor or in his presence, the minister of baptism, whoever it is, must inform the pastor of the parish in which it was administered of the conferral of the baptism, so that he records the baptism according to the norm of can. 877, §1.

The last two canons deal with the person charged with recording the fact of the celebration of baptism and the kind of information to be recorded.

Canon 877 deals with the recording of baptism when the pastor, and by extension, an associate pastor, is the minister of the sacrament. The first paragraph simply mentions the kind of information normally to be recorded in the baptismal register whether the person baptized was an adult or an infant: the names of the person baptized, of the minister, of the parents, and of the sponsors and witnesses; the place and date of birth of the baptized person; and the date and place of baptism.

The remaining two paragraphs treat special situations which pertain only to the baptism of children. The second paragraph explains the kind of information to be recorded or not recorded when the parents of the baptized child are not married. The intent of this paragraph is to protect the reputations of the parents of an illegitimate child. The third paragraph deals with information to be recorded or not recorded when the baptized child has been adopted. Paragraph three tries to find a balance between the desirability of a complete record of baptism, which includes the names of the natural parents, and respect for the civil requirements which may demand the concealment of the names of the natural parents.

Canon 878 treats the case when someone other than the parish priest was the minister of baptism. The baptism may have been conferred licitly in an emergency situation or in a non-parochial church or oratory within the parish territory. It may also have been conferred illicitly, perhaps by a relative of the family at home without permission of the pastor. The point of the canon is simply to ensure that, even in these situations, the fact of the baptism is recorded in the register of the parish in which the baptism took place.

Although it is not explicitly stated in these canons, the baptismal register is primary, since other sacraments for whose celebration proof may be needed (confirmation, marriage, orders) and other events affecting a person's ecclesial status (religious profession, declaration of nullity of marriage) are also to be noted in the person's baptismal record. This explains the canon's emphasis that the record of the baptism be kept in the parish where it was celebrated, since this is the first place contacted when proof of baptism, the reception of other sacraments, or other events determining a person's ecclesial status is needed.

TITLE II
THE SACRAMENT OF CONFIRMATION
[cc. 879–896]

The eighteen canons which constitute the code's treatment of the sacrament of confirmation give little hint of the differing theological emphases, changes in discipline, and controversies which have marked the historical development of this sacrament. Some of these controversies continue to the present day, most notably those surrounding the age of confirmation, the sequence of reception of the sacraments of initiation in pastoral practice, and, to a lesser extent, the minister of the sacrament. In order to understand the code's treatment of confirmation, and to perceive more accurately the continuing questions regarding the current discipline of this sacrament, a limited historical overview is necessary. This historical overview will concentrate on the three areas of current discussion mentioned above.

Most historical treatises on confirmation recognize the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (c. 215–220) as the earliest documentary evidence that we have of this sacrament:

> After this pouring the consecrated oil and laying his hand on his head he says, "I anoint you with holy oil in God the Father Almighty and Christ Jesus and the Holy Spirit." And sealing him on the forehead, he shall give him the kiss and say, "The Lord be with you." And he who has been sealed shall say: "And with your spirit."[218]

In recent years, however, attempts have been made to trace the origins of confirmation back beyond the third century to a structural component of ancient liturgies termed the "dismissal rite" (missa) which closed or sealed a particular liturgical rite and was accompanied by an imposition of hands and a blessing, but without, necessarily, the use of oil.[219] Nevertheless, as the citation from Hippolytus indicates, the rudiments of confirmation as we know it are already in place by the third century: the bishop as minister, prayer over the neophytes, anointing with oil on the forehead, verbal (Trinitarian) formula, and kiss of peace.

Until the early part of the fourth century, the bishop remained the sole minister of the sacrament in both the Eastern and the Western churches. Confirmation was administered immediately following the baptismal washing and then the Eucharist was celebrated. The interrelationship between the three sacraments of initiation was clearly evident in both theology and practice, an interrelationship which has again become prominent in the West, but only to a limited degree.

Beginning with the Edict of Constantine in 313, however, a series of developments gave rise to widely divergent disciplines with consequently different theologies and emphases. As Christianity emerged from the catacombs, its popularity increased dramatically, not always due to religious conversion or spiritual motives. The lengthy period of catechumenal formation and conversion became truncated, and, most significant of all in terms of confirmation, it became increasingly difficult for the bishop to retain his earlier distinction as the sole minister not only of confirmation but of all the sacraments of initiation.

In both East and West, by necessity, presbyters (and, in their absence, deacons) became the usual ministers of baptism.[220] But in the East they also became the usual ministers of confirmation with the result that the reception of the sacraments of initiation continued to manifest their essential interrelationship. To this day, the Eastern discipline and theology of confirmation give greater emphasis to the unity of the sacraments of initiation.[221] In the West, however, the retention of the bishop's role as the principal or even exclusive minister of confirmation resulted in a temporal separation between this sacrament and baptism. The theological consequence was that confirmation now stressed the union of the newly confirmed with the pastor of the whole particular church and not just with their local community or parish, and made more clear the connection of the confirmed with the apostolic origins and mission of the Church.[222]

With the fall of the Roman Empire in the West in the sixth century, communities became widely scattered and remote, conditions making it even more difficult for the bishop to remain the sole minister of confirmation. While presbyters baptized, the bishop came later, sometimes much later, to complete or "confirm" the baptism by anointing with chrism. Liturgical norms distinguished the anointing with chrism by a presbyter immediately following the baptismal washing from a second anointing with chrism by the bishop.[223]

218 Hippolytus, The Apostolic Tradition, 22. Trans. in P. F. Palmer, Sacraments and Worship (Westminster: Newman, 1955) 8.

219 See A. Kavanagh, Confirmation: Origins and Reform (New York: Pueblo, 1988) 31.

220 Council of Elvira, c. 77.

221 See CCEO 694, 695, 697.

222 See CCC 1292.

223 Council of Toledo, c. 20.

In time, the discipline of the bishop as sole minister of confirmation was no longer universal in the West. The Council of Toledo drafted prohibitions on the consecration of chrism by presbyters and imposed limits on presbyters acting as ministers of confirmation, but did not forbid their confirming in the absence of a bishop.[224]

A letter of Innocent I to the bishop of Gubbio in 416 attests to the practice of presbyter-ministers of confirmation, but calls for an end to this practice.[225] No doubt, the practice of presbyteral confirming continued and in some areas became the custom, as is confirmed by the letter of Gregory I to the bishop of Cagliari a hundred and fifty years later.[226] The letter reveals that the faithful of Cagliari "were scandalized by the introduction of a new discipline regarding the conferral of the sacrament of confirmation."[227] The "new discipline" was the papal prohibition of confirmation by presbyters. A compromise was reached: it was the bishop's place to confirm, but presbyters could confirm in his absence.[228]

The practice of presbyters confirming continued as a general custom until the eleventh century in Spain and Portugal, but in Germany and what is now France presbyteral confirming was allowed by synodal legislation only in danger of death. Not until the Council of Trent was the practice of allowing presbyters to confirm formally condemned, primarily because the reformers had allowed presbyters this role.[229] Thus, the practice finally came to an end in the West.

Due to the temporal separation of baptism and confirmation in the West, differing theologies of confirmation developed in an attempt to supply confirmation with a uniqueness that its ritual distinction from baptism alone failed to do. Since confirmation was celebrated later in life, there gradually developed an understanding that the effects of the sacrament paralleled the age at which the sacrament was received, an understanding which has continued to recent times. The Baltimore Catechism defined the sacrament as that which makes one a "strong and perfect Christian and a soldier of Jesus Christ." The effect of confirmation as making one a "soldier of Christ" (miles Christi) developed as a result of the Crusades, but it is also mentioned in much more recent authoritative documents.[230] At present it is often understood primarily as a sacrament of Christian maturity and a sacrament of service to the Church and community. These emphases are certainly elements of a theology of confirmation, but they tend to eclipse the relationship of confirmation to baptism and the Eucharist.

While the Eastern churches have preserved confirmation as the completion of baptism for both adults and infants, the general reservation of confirmation in the West to the bishop has resulted in a wide variety of ages at which the sacrament is received. Since confirmation was inevitably delayed beyond infancy, it was rarely conferred prior to use of reason. This practice has long since become normative, particularly after the definitive suppression of presbyter-ministers of confirmation of infants and children by the Council of Trent. Both the 1917 code and the revised code stipulate the age of reason, generally accepted as seven years, as the appropriate time for confirmation. However, the sacrament is generally delayed well beyond that age.

The primary factor governing the determination of the appropriate age for confirmation is the theological understanding of its nature, effects, and relationship to baptism. Those who see confirmation primarily as a sacrament of maturity consider the age of seven far too young. Those who see confirmation primarily as the comple-

[224] R. J. Barrett, "Confirmation: A Discipline Revisited," J 52 (1992) 698.

[225] See Ench 215.

[226] Gregory I, Ep. 26, ad Januarium, in PL 77:696.

[227] Barrett, 699.

[228] Ibid.

[229] Barrett, 700–702.

[230] See SCSacr, Spiritus Sancti munera, in AAS 38 (1946) 349–350: "... suffused with the fullness of grace and marked with the character of soldiers of Christ, they may be equipped in fact and by profession for every good work." CLD 3, 303–311.

tion of baptism and stress the ancient ordering of the reception of the sacraments of initiation consider seven years of age the latest time for its reception. In the United States, the bishops' conference determined in 1993 that the "uniform" age for confirmation in this country is anywhere between seven and eighteen years of age, a decision which confirms the wide variety of current pastoral practice.[231]

Although the discipline on the minister of confirmation and the age for its reception have varied widely, the order in which the sacraments of initiation are celebrated has been much more constant. Until the latter part of the nineteenth century confirmation was celebrated after baptism and prior to the Eucharist. As confirmation came to be delayed in the West, so did first reception of the Eucharist. Thus, the traditional ordering of the sacraments of initiation was maintained even though they were celebrated in separate ceremonies.

The first change in this ordering occurred in France in the latter part of the nineteenth century when several dioceses developed the practice of not confirming until after reception of first Eucharist. While Rome complained about this practice, it was not suppressed.[232] Such a reordering of the sacraments, however, became more universal following the promulgation in 1910 of Quam singulari by Pius X, which introduced the discipline of admitting children to first Eucharist at the age of reason, or the age of seven. The encyclical said nothing about the ordering of other sacraments, particularly confirmation and penance. However, as a result of the practical problems connected with catechizing children simultaneously for the reception of confirmation, Eucharist, and penance, the reception of first Eucharist came to precede the celebration of confirmation. The connection of confirmation to baptism which the prior ordering of the sacraments had maintained was broken and the sacrament became even more distant from baptism.

In 1963 Vatican Council II called for a reform of confirmation with a view to restoring its original connection with the other sacraments of initiation:

> The rite of confirmation is also to be revised in order that the intimate connection of this sacrament with the whole of Christian initiation may stand out more clearly; for this reason it is fitting for candidates to renew their baptismal promises just before they are confirmed.[233]

The text still presumes a celebration of confirmation apart from baptism, but nevertheless reveals its clear intent to relate these two sacraments more closely to one another.

The actual revision was accomplished and promulgated eight years later.[234] In the apostolic constitution promulgating the revised Rite of Confirmation Paul VI stated:

> The aim of this work has been that the intimate connection of this sacrament with the whole of Christian initiation may stand out more clearly. But the link between confirmation and the other sacraments of initiation is more easily perceived not simply from the fact that their rites have been more closely conjoined; the rite and the words by which confirmation is conferred also make this link clear.[235]

> Confirmation is so closely linked with the holy Eucharist that the faithful, after being signed by baptism and confirmation, are incorporated fully into the Body of Christ by participation in the Eucharist.[236]

[231] W. Levada, "Reflections on the Age of Confirmation," TS 57 (1996) 302.

[232] Barrett, 703.

[233] SC 71.

[234] Congregation for Divine Worship, Ordo confirmationis, August 22, 1971 (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1971); Rite of Confirmation, DOL 305, 2510–2528.

[235] Paul VI, apconst Divinae consortium naturae, August 15, 1971, AAS 63 (1971) 658, DOL 2500.

[236] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 660, DOL 2502.

It is true that, in the 1971 Rite of Confirmation, the other sacraments of initiation were "more closely conjoined," but not to the extent that they would be a year later with the promulgation of the adult rite of Christian initiation. The 1971 revised rite presumed that baptism had been celebrated some time prior to confirmation, as is clear from the opening line of the rite: "Those who have been baptized continue on the path of Christian initiation through the sacrament of confirmation."[237]

The rite does note that "adult catechumens ... are to be confirmed immediately after baptism,"[238] but does not supply a liturgical rite for this celebration.

The rite designates the bishop as the "primary" and "normal" minister of the sacrament and offers a scriptural and theological justification for this tradition in the West:

> The primary minister of confirmation is the bishop. Normally a bishop administers the sacrament so that there will be a clearer reference to the first pouring forth of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost: after the apostles were filled with the Holy Spirit, they themselves gave the Spirit to the faithful through the laying on of hands. Thus the reception of the Spirit through the ministry of the bishop shows the close bond that joins the confirmed to the Church and the mandate received from Christ to bear witness to him before all.[239]

However, in a major shift from that tradition, the rite gives to presbyters the faculty to confirm adults whom they baptize or receive into full communion,[240] a faculty which will be recognized in canon 883, 2°. With regard to the age of confirmation, the rite retains the age of seven, although for the first time it recognizes the pastoral practice which often delays confirmation to a later age:

> With regard to children, in the Latin Church the administration of confirmation is generally delayed until about the seventh year. For pastoral reasons, however, especially to implant deeply in the lives of the faithful complete obedience to Christ the Lord and a firm witnessing to him, the conferences of bishops may set an age that seems more suitable. This means that the sacrament is given, after the formation proper to it, when the recipients are more mature."[241]

Those parts of the 1971 Rite of Confirmation dealing with adult confirmation are now treated much more expansively in the 1972 Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.[242] Much more than the 1971 Rite of Confirmation, the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults restores the ancient tradition of the Church regarding the liturgical and theological significance of confirmation and calls for its celebration immediately after the baptismal washing in the context of the celebration of the Eucharist at the Easter Vigil:

> According to the ancient practice preserved in the Roman liturgy, adults are not to be baptized without receiving confirmation immediately afterward unless serious reasons prevent this. This combination signifies the unity of the paschal mystery, the link between the mission of the Son and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and the connection between the two sacraments through which the Son and the Spirit come with the Father to those baptized.[243]

[237] RConf 1, DOL 2510.
[238] RConf 3, DOL 2512.
[239] RConf 7, DOL 2516.
[240] Ibid.
[241] Ibid.
[242] Congregation for Divine Worship, Ordo initiationis christianae adultorum, January 6, 1972 (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1972); RCIA 305, DOL 2328–2488.
[243] RCIA 34, DOL 2361.

Since the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults is the normative rite for adult confirmation, the use of the 1971 Rite of Confirmation in adult confirmation is restricted to those exceptional cases[244] in which the adult has not experienced the catechumenal formation periods and celebrations called for by the code and the adult rite.

The principal concerns and tensions that have surfaced in the course of the historical development of confirmation underlie the code's treatment of the sacrament: the nature and effects of confirmation, the minister, the appropriate age for its reception, and the order of its reception in relation to baptism and Eucharist.

The structure of title II repeats that of title I: an introductory theological canon (c. 879), two canons on the celebration of confirmation (cc. 880–881), seven canons on the minister of confirmation (cc. 882–888), three canons on those to be confirmed (cc. 889–891), two canons on sponsors (cc. 892–893), and finally two canons on proof and records (cc. 894–896).

There are far fewer canons on confirmation than there are on baptism, primarily because of the restored unity between this sacrament and baptism for adults. Such requirements as the preparation for the celebration of and sponsors in adult confirmation have already been treated in the canons on baptism. Despite the restoration of the catechumenate, the canons themselves presume a celebration of confirmation apart from baptism. Although the unified rite of celebrating confirmation together with baptism and Eucharist is normative, the canons reflect the more common or frequent situation in which confirmation is celebrated as a separate and distinct rite.[245]

The canons also presume that confirmation is celebrated before the reception of first Eucharist, even when baptism was celebrated several years before confirmation. Consequently, the canons do not reflect the ordering of the sacraments most common in the United States: baptism, penance, Eucharist, and confirmation. Canon 891 allows confirmation to be deferred until a later age after the reception of first Eucharist. Nevertheless, the code treats this as an exception to the order retained in all the liturgical books according to which confirmation is followed by first reception of the Eucharist.

The treatment of confirmation in the Eastern code shows some marked differences from that in the Latin code. There are far fewer canons on confirmation in the Eastern code (only six), compared with eighteen canons in the Latin code. One major difference lies in the way the two codes legislate on the minister of the sacrament, to which the Latin code devotes seven canons but the Eastern code only two.[246] The reason for this difference is that in the Eastern churches, the presbyter is the ordinary minister of the sacrament, while in the West the presbyter can function as the minister only within the parameters spelled out in canons 883–887. A second other major difference is the significantly greater emphasis in the Eastern code on the unity of the sacraments of initiation.[247] For the Eastern churches, the celebration of confirmation apart from baptism[248] and the Eucharist is clearly exceptional, while, except in the case of adults, it is generally the rule in the West. The third major difference is the age at which this sacrament is administered. The Eastern code reaffirms the ancient Eastern tradition of confirming infants[249] while the Latin code specifies that confirmation is conferred "at about the age of discretion."[250] Finally, the Eastern code does not refer to this sacrament as "confirmation," but as "chrismation with holy myron" or simply "chrismation."

[244] See RCIA 240, DOL 2433.

[245] See McManus, in CLSA Com, 632.

[246] See CCEO 694, 696.

[247] See especially CCEO 697.

[248] CCEO 697 speaks of the Eucharist as the perfection of sacramental initiation. However, it does not state that the Eucharist is to be celebrated in conjunction with baptism and confirmation, but "as soon as possible" afterward. CCEO 710, dealing with recipients of the Eucharist, confirms that infants receive the Eucharist some time after baptism and chrismation, according to prescriptions of each church sui iuris "with suitable due precautions."

[249] See CCEO 695.

[250] Canon 891.

Nature and Effects of Confirmation

Canon 879 — The sacrament of confirmation strengthens the baptized and obliges them more firmly to be witnesses of Christ by word and deed and to spread and defend the faith. It imprints a character, enriches by the gift of the Holy Spirit the baptized continuing on the path of Christian initiation, and binds them more perfectly to the Church.

The initial canon on confirmation is a theological summary of the nature and effects of the sacrament and is drawn from the revised rite of 1971:

> Those who have been baptized continue on the path of Christian initiation through the sacrament of confirmation. In this sacrament they receive the Holy Spirit whom the Lord sent upon the apostles on Pentecost.
>
> This giving of the Holy Spirit conforms believers more fully to Christ and strengthens them so that they may bear witness to Christ for the building up of his Body in faith and love. They are so marked with the character or seal of the Lord that the sacrament of confirmation cannot be repeated.[251]

This citation from the 1971 Rite of Confirmation in turn draws heavily from conciliar teaching:

> By the sacrament of confirmation they are more perfectly bound to the Church and are endowed with the special strength of the Holy Spirit. Hence they are, as true witnesses of Christ, more strictly obliged to spread and defend the faith by word and deed.[252]
>
> As members of the living Christ, incorporated into him and made like him by baptism, confirmation and the Eucharist, all the faithful have an obligation to collaborate in the expansion and spread of his Body, so that they might bring it to fullness as soon as possible.[253]

Confirmation is an unrepeatable gift which is the Holy Spirit. The canon avoids any speculation on the nature of the sacramental character which was treated in canon 845, §1. The text of the canon is more nuanced than the rite in its description of the action of the Holy Spirit. The canon sees the Holy Spirit as "enriching" what was already begun in baptism, whereas the rite states that in confirmation one "receives" the Holy Spirit. The canon, then, presents a more balanced view in which the Holy Spirit is seen as acting in both baptism and confirmation.

One effect of the gift of the Spirit is that it strengthens those who are confirmed, and in addition obliges them more firmly to be witnesses to Christ, a theme drawn almost verbatim from the rite. Finally, the confirmed person is enabled by the Holy Spirit "to spread and defend the faith." The notion of spreading the faith is drawn from the rite, which uses the terminology "building up his Body," but even more explicitly from the teaching of Lumen gentium and Ad gentes cited above.

The canon departs from the 1971 rite when it speaks of confirmation as binding one "more perfectly to the Church." The rite's focus is more christocentric: the sacrament "conforms believers more fully to Christ." The canon's stress on the ecclesial effect of confirmation flows from Lumen gentium and Ad gentes.

That confirmation enables one to "defend the faith" is drawn from Lumen gentium 11 and echoes a more martial understanding of confirmation as a sacrament by which the person becomes a "soldier of Christ."[254]

The canon's reference to the candidates for confirmation as "the baptized continuing on the path of Christian initiation" presumes a prior celebration of

[251] RConf 1–2, DOL 2510–2511.

[252] LG 11.

[253] AG 36.

[254] CCEO 692 refrains from using martial terminology; instead, it describes those confirmed as "more proper witnesses and co-builders in the Kingdom of God."

baptism. Confirmation is seen as a continuation of Christian initiation begun earlier with baptism.[255]

In light of the history of this sacrament, one might wonder whether the canon presents a theological synthesis of confirmation or merely a listing of different theologies of confirmation which have been emphasized at one time or another in the course of its development. One such theology which sees confirmation as intimately related to baptism is apparent in the phrase "continuing on the path of Christian initiation" and finds its expression in the rite: "They [the apostles] received the power of giving the Holy Spirit to others and so completing the work of baptism."[256] This theology is also evident in the apostolic constitution of Paul VI which promulgated the revised rite:

> Then those who believed the apostles' preaching were baptized and they too received "the gift of the Holy Spirit." From that time on, the apostles, in fulfillment of Christ's wish, imparted to the newly baptized by the laying on of hands the gift of the Spirit that completes the grace of baptism. This is why the Letter to the Hebrews listed among the first elements of Christian instruction the teaching about baptism and the laying on of hands.[257]

A second theology, which considers confirmation principally as the reception of the Holy Spirit, is in evidence in the canon's phrase, "enriches by the gift of the Holy Spirit"; and in the rite's, "Bishops . . . have the power of giving the Holy Spirit to the baptized."[258] This theology is also found in Paul VI's apostolic constitution:

> From ancient times the conferring of the gift of the Holy Spirit has been carried out in the Church through various rites. These rites have undergone many changes in the East and the West, but always keeping as their meaning the conferring of the Holy Spirit.[259]

A third theology, which sees confirmation as the fulfillment of the events of Pentecost and emphasizes not so much the gift of the Holy Spirit as the plurality of gifts for the unity of the Church, is not as pronounced in the canon as it is in the rite:

> On the day of Pentecost the apostles received the Holy Spirit as the Lord had promised. . . . In our day the coming of the Holy Spirit in confirmation is no longer marked by the gift of tongues, but we know his coming by faith. He fills our hearts with the love of God, brings us together in one faith but in different vocations and works within us to make the Church one and holy. Christ gives varied gifts to his Church, and the Spirit distributes them among the members of Christ's body to build up the holy people of God in unity and love.[260]

A fourth theology, which considers confirmation primarily as the source of spiritual power, is reflected in the canon's phrase, "confirmation strengthens the baptized," but this theology is even more clearly expressed in the rite:

> The gift of the Holy Spirit which you are to receive will be a spiritual sign and seal to make you more like Christ and more perfect members of the Church. . . . You have already been baptized into Christ and now you will receive the power of his Spirit.[261]

The theology of confirmation most clearly reflected in the canon is one that sees confirmation as a sacrament of spiritual maturity in witnessing

[255] Such a reference to the baptized is, of course, absent from CCEO 692.

[256] RConf 22, Rites, 487.

[257] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 659, DOL 2501.

[258] RConf 22, Rites, 487.

[259] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 660, DOL 2503.

[260] RConf 22, Rites, 488.

[261] Ibid.

to the faith, spreading it, and defending it. This is also clear in the rite, which adds the responsibility of service:

> You must be witnesses before all the world to his suffering, death and resurrection; your way of life should at all times reflect the goodness of Christ.... Be active members of the Church, alive in Jesus Christ. Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit give your lives completely in the service of all, as did Christ, who came not to be served but to serve.[262]

Some of these theologies are complementary. Confirmation as the sacrament of the Holy Spirit, the sacrament of the plurality of gifts of the Holy Spirit for the unity of the Church, and the sacrament of the spiritual power of the Holy Spirit can easily be understood as complementary aspects of one sacrament. But the two remaining theologies are often seen as competing. Confirmation as a sacrament intimately linked with baptism from which it cannot be separated, and confirmation as a sacrament of maturity are not easily harmonized. Those who see confirmation primarily as the completion of baptism tend to call for reception of the sacrament at a much earlier age, preferably prior to or in conjunction with first reception of the Eucharist. Those who see confirmation as a sacrament of maturity, which is the predominant theme in many current catechetical texts, call for more extensive preparation for confirmation after a person's first reception of the Eucharist and the deferral of the reception of the sacrament well beyond the age of seven.

CHAPTER I
THE CELEBRATION OF CONFIRMATION
[cc. 880–881]

The code devotes only two canons to the celebration of confirmation. The first treats the essential matter and form necessary for the validity of the sacrament; the second deals with the place and liturgical context for its celebration. The brevity of this treatment is an implicit recognition that, in the normative rite of adult initiation, confirmation is celebrated together with baptism. Therefore, much of what was specified earlier for the celebration of baptism applies also to the celebration of confirmation.

Essential Elements of the Sacrament

Canon 880 — §1. The sacrament of confirmation is conferred by the anointing of chrism on the forehead, which is done by the imposition of the hand and through the words prescribed in the approved liturgical books.

§2. The chrism to be used in the sacrament of confirmation must be consecrated by a bishop even if a presbyter administers the sacrament.

Although the discipline of confirmation has varied widely throughout its history, the essential elements of the imposition of the hand and anointing with oil have remained constant. Nevertheless, the relationship between these two actions has received different emphases in the course of this development. Canon 780 of the 1917 code described the anointing and the imposition of hands as two distinct actions which accompany one another: "The sacrament of confirmation shall be conferred by the imposition of the hand accompanied by the anointing of the forehead with chrism."[263] Greater stress was placed on the anointing, since the imposition of hands accompanied it. The present canon restores a more ancient understanding of these essential elements by not treating them as two distinct actions. Rather, the anointing is performed by the imposition of the hand. The source of this shift in emphasis is Paul VI's apostolic constitution Divinae consortium naturae which promulgated the 1971 revised Rite of Confirmation. In that document the Holy Father sketched the development of the relationship between the anointing and the imposition of the hand. In the descriptions of the essential rite given by Innocent III and Innocent IV, the anointing and imposition of the hand were not two distinct actions, but rather one: the anointing which signifies the laying on of the hand:

[262] RConf 22, Rites, 488.

[263] CIC 780.

> Our predecessor Innocent III wrote: "The anointing of the forehead with chrism signifies the laying on of the hand, the other name for which is confirmation, since through it the Holy Spirit is given for growth and strength." Another of our predecessors, Innocent IV, mentions that the apostles conferred the Holy Spirit "through the laying on of the hand, which confirmation or the anointing of the forehead with chrism represents."[264]

It is evident that these descriptions of the anointing and laying on of the hand are clearly reflected in the text of the current canon, as well as in the words of Paul VI:

> From what we have recalled, it is clear that in the administration of confirmation in the East and the West, though in different ways, the most important place was occupied by the anointing, which in a certain way represents the apostolic laying on of hands.[265]

The first part of paragraph one of the canon is taken verbatim from this apostolic constitution:

> The sacrament of confirmation is conferred through the anointing with Chrism on the forehead which is done by the laying on of the hand, and through the words: Be sealed with the gift of the Holy Spirit.[266]

Thus, both the code and the Rite state that the anointing is done by the laying on of the hand. This connection is made more visible when the minister lays the palm of his hand on the head of the one to be confirmed while anointing the forehead with the thumb. However, laying the palm on the head is not the imposition of the hand per se, for the code and the rite are quite explicit that it is the anointing itself which constitutes the laying on of the hand. This is confirmed in an authoritative interpretation:

> Query: According to the Apostolic Constitution Divinae consortium naturae, must the minister in carrying out the act of anointing with chrism lay his outstretched hand on the head of the one being confirmed or is an anointing with the thumb sufficient?
>
> Reply: To the first, no; to the second, yes, according to the document. The intent is: anointing with chrism done as described sufficiently expresses the laying on of hands.[267]

There is often confusion of the imposition of the hand, which is done by anointing and which is of the essence of the sacrament, with an immediately preceding rite, what the ritual terms "the laying on of hands."[268] In this rite, the minister faces the people, and invites them to pray silently. Then the minister and any concelebrants "lay hands upon all the candidates (by extending their hands over them)" and the minister alone begins the deprecative prayer, "All powerful God . . ." The apostolic constitution notes the distinction between the two and terms the essential rite the "laying on of the hand" and the preceding, nonessential, rite the "laying on of hands:"

> In the rites of the Latin Church a laying of hands on those to be confirmed prior to [264] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 661, DOL 2504.

[265] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 663, DOL 2506.
[266] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 663, DOL 2507.

[267] Pontifical Commission for the Interpretation of the Decrees of Vatican Council II, reply, June 9, 1972, AAS 64 (1972) 526, DOL 2529.
[268] RConf 24, Rites, 489–490.

> anointing them with chrism was always prescribed.... But the laying of hands on the elect, carried out with the prescribed prayer before the anointing, is still to be regarded as very important, even if it is not of the essence of the sacramental rite: it contributes to the complete perfection of the rite and to a more thorough understanding of the sacrament. It is evident that this prior laying on of hands differs from the later laying on of the hand in the anointing of the forehead.[269]

Although the distinction is clear in the apostolic constitution, on the pastoral level it is not. The ritual itself contributes to this confusion by entitling the non-essential rite "The Laying On of Hands," which is followed immediately by "The Anointing with Chrism" in which neither the text nor the rubrics give any indication that this anointing is also the essential laying on of the hand.

The apostolic constitution also changed the verbal formula to which the last phrase of paragraph one refers. The Holy Father noted that the Byzantine expression "the seal of the Holy Spirit" can be traced back to the fourth century. The traditional Latin form had been: "I sign you with the sign of the cross and confirm you with the chrism of salvation. In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." However, this form was not stabilized until the thirteenth century. Paul VI preferred the Byzantine expression, not because of its antiquity, but because of the prominence it attributes to the role of the Holy Spirit.[270] It is this ancient Byzantine expression which, modified slightly, has become the formula in the liturgical books to which the canon refers: "N., be sealed with the gift of the Holy Spirit."

In the now abrogated formula of the Latin church, it was clear that the anointing on the forehead was done with the sign of the cross. The new formulary does not mention the sign of the cross, nor does the apostolic constitution state that the anointing is to be done in the form of a cross. The praenotanda of the Rite of Confirmation also make no reference to the sign of the cross.[271] However, the rubrics make explicit that the anointing is to be done by the sign of the cross.[272]

The second paragraph of canon 880 is an application to confirmation of the norm of canon 847 and states that the chrism used in the anointing of the forehead must always be consecrated by a bishop.[273] This holds true even when a presbyter is the minister of confirmation. Although a presbyter may confirm in certain circumstances, he cannot consecrate the chrism. The canon makes no provision for exceptions in danger-of-death situations. If the priest does not have chrism consecrated by a bishop, he cannot consecrate it himself, even though he may bless the oil of the sick and the oil of catechumens[274] in cases of necessity.[275] Although the canon states that the chrism must be consecrated by a [i.e., any] bishop, canon 847, §2 states that the priest should secure the oil from his own diocesan bishop as a way of stressing the link between a priest using the oil and the bishop as the principal liturgical celebrant of the particular church.[276]

The canon makes no reference to the oil itself other than calling it chrism. Canon 847, §1 notes that while olive oil is preferred, oil pressed from other plants may also be used, to which "some aromatic substance is added."[277] The rite explains the significance of chrism:

> The chrism is a sign that Christians, incorporated by baptism into the paschal mystery of Christ, dying, buried and rising with him, are sharers in his kingly and prophetic priesthood and that by confirmation they re-

[269] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 664, DOL 2505, 2507.

[270] Divinae consortium naturae, AAS 63 (1971) 663, DOL 2505.

[271] See RConf 9, DOL 2518.

[272] RConf 27, Rites, 490.

[273] ROils 6, DOL 3866. CCEO 693, while making reference to particular law, also reserves the confection of the myron to a bishop or the patriarch.

[274] ROils 7, DOL 3837.

[275] Canon 999, 2°.

[276] See c. 835, §1.

[277] ROils 4, DOL 3864.

ceive the spiritual anointing of the Spirit who is given to them.[278]

Place of Celebration

Canon 881 — It is desirable to celebrate the sacrament of confirmation in a church and during Mass; for a just and reasonable cause, however, it can be celebrated outside Mass and in any worthy place.

In the normative rite of adult initiation, the place for celebrating confirmation is the place where the baptism is celebrated. Thus, the canon implicitly refers to the norms governing the proper place of celebrating baptism given in canons 857–860.

The canon states a double preference: the celebration should take place in a church, and in conjunction with a celebration of the Eucharist.[279] Both preferences of the canon receive a more expansive and stronger treatment in the rite, which also provides the rationale for these preferences:

> Adult catechumens and children who are baptized at an age when they are old enough for catechesis should ordinarily be admitted to confirmation and the Eucharist at the same time as they receive baptism. If this is impossible they should receive confirmation at another community celebration. Similarly, adults who were baptized in infancy should, after suitable preparation, receive confirmation and the Eucharist at a community celebration.[280]

> Confirmation takes place as a rule within Mass in order that the fundamental connection of this sacrament with all of Christian initiation may stand out in a clearer light. Christian initiation reaches its culmination in the communion of the body and blood of Christ. The newly confirmed therefore participate in the Eucharist, which completes their Christian initiation.[281]

The canon also reflects the conciliar teaching which called for the revision of the rite:

> Confirmation may be conferred within Mass when convenient; as for the rite outside Mass, a formulary is to be composed for use as an introduction.[282]

The code has a much stronger preference for the celebration of confirmation during a Mass than did the council, which called for celebration within Mass only "if convenient." The reason for this change is clear. Between the council and the revision of the code, the rites of the sacraments, and especially the rite for adult initiation, were revised. With the restoration of the integral unity of the sacraments of initiation, the celebration of the Eucharist became necessary, since the neophytes are called to participate in it.

However, the canon does allow for confirmation to be celebrated in a place other than a church and outside of Mass "for a just and reasonable cause." The Rite itself suggests what would be such a just and reasonable cause for celebrating confirmation outside Mass: when those confirmed will not receive first Eucharist, something which may occur when the candidates are children.[283]

The revised Rite of Confirmation contains a "Rite of Confirmation outside Mass," which includes the celebration of the word. The inclusion of the liturgy of the word more than satisfies the call made at the council for a formulary to be composed and used when the rite is celebrated outside Mass.

The rite does not give any explicit indication of when the celebration of confirmation may take place "in any worthy place" as allowed for in the canon. The "Rite of Confirmation of a Person in Danger of Death" would most likely be celebrated outside a church, but not necessarily in "a worthy place."

[278] ROils 2, DOL 3862.
[279] The Eastern code makes no reference to the place of confirmation.
[280] RConf 11, DOL 2520.
[281] RConf 13, DOL 2522.
[282] SC 71.
[283] RConf 13, DOL 2522.

CHAPTER II
THE MINISTER OF CONFIRMATION
[cc. 882–888]

Because of the substantial disciplinary change allowing presbyters to confirm in a number of circumstances, the treatment of the minister of confirmation in chapter 2 contains the largest number of canons of any chapter in the code's treatment of confirmation, The historical development of confirmation attests to the fact that the minister of confirmation in the Latin church has not always been a bishop. In some localities, confirmation by a presbyter was a custom which Rome grudgingly tolerated and finally suppressed in the sixteenth century. This suppression created problems during the age of discovery and its attendant rapid missionary expansion, which coincided with the Counter Reformation. The paucity of bishops in missionary territories prompted repeated requests to Rome for a wider concession to non-bishops of the faculty to confirm. Most of these requests were denied, since the reformers allowed this practice. When the heat of the Counter Reformation began to cool, the faculty to confirm was granted to vicars apostolic.[284] By the nineteenth century the faculty to confirm was regularly granted to individual presbyters in mission territories, but it could only be used in the absence of a bishop.[285]

Canon 782 of the 1917 code recognized the faculty by law of those equivalent in law to a bishop (abbots, prelates nullius, apostolic prefects, and vicars) to confirm within the confines of their territory. Presbyters had no general faculty from the law to confirm, although it could be conceded to them by the Holy See.[286] However, such concessions were rare. Pius XII was the first to break the long tradition that presbyters had no faculty by law to confirm when he granted this faculty to pastors and some other presbyters with the full care of souls in cases of danger of death.[287] However, in these cases, the faculty could be exercised only in the absence of a bishop. In subsequent years, this faculty was gradually extended to more and more priests in pastoral ministry, but its concession was reserved to the Holy See.[288] In 1963 Pope Paul VI allowed diocesan bishops to grant this faculty to presbyters.[289] The revised Rite of Confirmation (1971) significantly expanded the faculty by law for presbyters to confirm by extending it to: those presbyters equivalent in law to diocesan bishops within the limit of their territory, presbyters who have the mandate to baptize adults or children of catechetical age or who admit already baptized adults or children of catechetical age to full communion with the Catholic Church, and, in danger-of-death situations, presbyters who hold some office in the Church or who are parochial vicars.[290] The Rite's expansion of this faculty for presbyters to confirm is the source of the code's legislation, particularly in canon 883.

The canons follow a logical order in presenting the discipline governing the minister of confirmation: a general norm on the ordinary minister and special[291] ministers of the sacrament (c. 882); the circumstances in which the law grants the faculty to confirm to special ministers (c. 883); the concession of the faculty to confirm to special ministers by competent authority (c. 884); the pastoral responsibilities of all ministers of confirmation (c. 885); and territorial limitations on all ministers' power to confirm (886–888). While the canons expand the circumstances in which presbyters can exercise the faculty to confirm, the primacy of the bishop as the ordinary minister of the sacrament is reaffirmed explicitly or implicitly in every canon except the last, which deals with the right of bishops and presbyters to confirm in exempt places.

[284] Barrett, 702.

[285] Ibid.

[286] See CIC 782, §2.

[287] SCSacr, decr Spiritus Sancti munera, September 14, 1946, AAS 38 (1946) 352–353.

[288] For a listing of these additional concessions to confirm, see Woestman, Sacraments, 82.

[289] Paul VI, mp Pastorale munus, November 30, 1963, AAS 56 (1964) 8.

[290] RConf 7, DOL 2516.

[291] The canon avoids the term "extraordinary" used in the 1917 code (CIC 792, §2) for ministers of confirmation.

Ordinary and Special Ministers

Canon 882 — The ordinary minister of confirmation is a bishop; a presbyter provided with this faculty in virtue of universal law or the special grant of the competent authority also confers this sacrament validly.

The canon singles out the bishop as the "ordinary minister" of confirmation. Vatican II's reference to the bishop as the "primary"[292] or "original" minister of the sacrament was a more historically accurate term than "ordinary minister." "Original minister" respected the tradition of the Eastern churches where the bishop could hardly be called the "ordinary" minister, since presbyters were and are the ordinary ministers of confirmation. The term "original minister" also reflected the tradition of the Latin rite where the bishop was indeed the original minister of the sacrament. "Original minister" is also a more theological term than "ordinary minister." It suggests, perhaps, that the power which the Eastern rite bishops exercised originally is a power rooted in orders, so that Eastern rite presbyters also enjoy this same power to confirm.

In the early stages of the revision of the code,[293] "original minister" was changed to "ordinary minister," on the ground that this code applied only to the Latin rite[294] in which the bishop was not only the original minister but the ordinary minister as well. "Ordinary minister" was also selected to emphasize that the power and the faculty to confirm are rooted in the episcopal order, so that presbyters confirm not by reason of their order, but only by reason of the power granted to them as a faculty, either by law or by concession from competent authority.[295] By using the term "ordinary" rather than "original," the canon skirts the question of the theological basis for granting the faculty to confirm to presbyters.

A presbyter acquires the faculty to confirm either from the law[296] or from a concession by competent authority.[297] In the revised code, the authority competent to concede to presbyters the faculty to confirm is not the Holy See alone as it was in canon 782, §2 of the 1917 code. However, this change in discipline had already been introduced prior to the promulgation of the 1983 code.[298]

Special Ministers by Law

Canon 883 — The following possess the faculty of administering confirmation by the law itself:
1° within the boundaries of their jurisdiction, those who are equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop;
2° as regards the person in question, the presbyter who by virtue of office or mandate of the diocesan bishop baptizes one who is no longer an infant or admits one already baptized into the full communion of the Catholic Church;
3° as regards those who are in danger of death, the pastor or indeed any presbyter.

This canon and the following one are the cardinal canons of chapter 2, for they specify those presbyters who have the faculty to confirm either from the law (c. 883) or from the concession of competent authority (c. 884). Canon 883 recognizes three circumstances in which the common law of the Church grants presbyters the faculty to confirm.

[292] LG 26. See RConf 7, DOL 2516. The bishop was called the "original minister" in the proposed Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis.
[293] See Comm 3 (1971) 204.
[294] Canon 1.
[295] Comm 3 (1971) 204.
[296] RConf 7, DOL 2516; c. 883.
[297] Canon 884. The treatment of the minister of chrismation in the Eastern code is greatly simplified, since all presbyters have by law the faculty to administer this sacrament to infants and adults alike, either in the context of the celebration of baptism or apart from it, and regardless of the rite sui iuris to which the one to be chrismated belongs. They need no special faculty by concession as do presbyters in the West. See CCEO 694, 696, §1.
[298] See, for example, Pastorale munus 8 by which bishops are the "competent authority" to grant faculties for confirmation to presbyters.

First, the law grants those who are equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop the faculty to confirm within the territory assigned to them. Those equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop are not themselves bishops, but presbyters who preside over particular churches that have not yet been raised to the status of a diocese. The canon repeats the norm already contained in the revised Rite of Confirmation.[299] Those who are equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop are identified in canons 381, §2 and 368: they are the prelates who preside over territorial prelatures, territorial abbeys, apostolic vicariates, apostolic prefectures, and apostolic administrations erected on a stable basis. Although canon 368 does not mention diocesan administrators (formerly called "vicars capitular") as equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop, they are included among those granted the faculty to confirm by the law in liturgical law, for they are explicitly mentioned in the Rite of Confirmation.[300]

Both the Rite and the code are careful to specify that those equivalent in law to a bishop have the faculty to confirm only "within the limits of their territory." Outside their territory, they have no faculty and, therefore, confer confirmation there invalidly. This restriction on the valid exercise of the faculty to confirm by these presbyters is mentioned again in canon 887.

Second, the law grants the faculty to confirm to presbyters who, in virtue of their office or the mandate of the diocesan bishop, have a particular relationship with the one to be confirmed. The canon again draws heavily from the revised Rite of Confirmation:

> The law gives the faculty to confirm to the following besides the bishop:... priests who, in virtue of an office they lawfully hold, baptize an adult or a child old enough for catechesis or receive a validly baptized adult into the full communion of the Church.[301]

[299] RConf 7, DOL 2516.
[300] Ibid.
[301] Ibid.

This extension to presbyters of the faculty by law to confirm is a direct result of the restoration of the unity of the sacraments of initiation called for by Vatican Council II. Since the normative rite for adult initiation calls for candidates to be confirmed immediately following their baptisms and in the same liturgical celebration, presbyters who baptize adults need the faculty to confirm. The law also calls for adults who have already been baptized in a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community and who now seek full communion with the Catholic Church to be confirmed as part of the celebration of their reception into the Church. Thus, canon 883 incorporates into the code the grant to presbyters of the faculty to confirm previously made by liturgical law in the revised Rite of Confirmation and in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.[302]

The canon, however, slightly expands the scope of the faculty presbyters enjoy by law. In the Rite of Confirmation, the law grants presbyters the faculty to confirm adults whom they baptize or receive into full communion in virtue of their office; the canon adds that the law grants the faculty to confirm to presbyters who baptize adults or receive them into full communion in virtue of a "mandate of the diocesan bishop." This expansion of the faculty covers those cases when a priest has no ecclesiastical office, but has the pastoral care of souls as would be the case for certain chaplains whose duties do not normally include baptizing adults. Canon 833, 2° grants the faculty to confirm to presbyters who, in virtue of their office or mandate, already possess the faculty to baptize adults and to receive them into full communion. Essentially, the law extends their faculty to baptize to include the faculty to confirm as well. A presbyter's office or mandate to baptize or receive adults into full communion may be territorially limited. If so, canon 887 confines his valid exercise of his faculty to confirm to the limits of this territory.

Since parish priests have the faculty to confirm by law, the diocesan bishop cannot revoke it or restrict its exercise. The diocesan bishop may, however, reserve to himself the baptisms of adults fourteen years of age or older (c. 863). If he does so, the bishop must also confirm them.[303]

[302] RCIA 46, DOL 2373.

The canon lists several conditions which must met for parish priests to exercise validly the faculty to confirm adults they baptize or receive into full communion. First, the confirmation must follow immediately after the baptismal washing or the reception of an already baptized person into full communion by a profession of faith, and not at a later time or in a different liturgical celebration. Second, this faculty from the law to confirm can be exercised only on behalf of adults. Presbyters cannot confirm children under seven years of age when they baptize them or when they receive them into the Church, except in danger-of-death situations.

Thus, the canon mentions only two cases when a presbyter can confirm in virtue of office or mandate in ordinary circumstances: when baptizing an adult and when receiving an adult into full communion.[304] However, there are two other cases in which a priest with the faculty or mandate to baptize or receive into full communion may also lawfully confirm. These two additional circumstances arise from two authentic interpretations of the decrees of Vatican Council II. Both of these authentic interpretations concern the readmission to full communion of persons who had previously been baptized in the Catholic Church.

The first interpretation dealt with the case of readmission to the Church of Catholics who were never confirmed and who apostatized from the faith. A presbyter may validly confirm these baptized Catholics upon their readmission into full communion.[305] The second interpretation concerned the case of readmission to the Catholic Church of a person who was baptized in the Catholic Church as an infant but "who without fault has been instructed in a non-Catholic religion or adhered to a non-Catholic religion."[306] If this instruction in or adherence to a non-Catholic religion was not the fault of the person, then a presbyter may validly and lawfully confirm that person upon his or her readmission to full practice of the faith.

Thus, the law foresees four situations in which a presbyter may lawfully confirm in virtue of office or mandate: when he baptizes an adult; when he receives a previously baptized non-Catholic into full communion; when he readmits into full communion a previously baptized Catholic who apostatized from the faith; and when he readmits into full communion a previously baptized Catholic who through no personal fault was instructed in or adhered to a non-Catholic religion.

Neither the law nor authentic interpretations of the law have made provision for presbyters to confirm in other frequently occurring situations. Thus, a presbyter cannot validly confirm: baptized Catholics who were instructed in or adhered to a non-Catholic religion by their own fault; baptized Catholics who were not raised as Catholic but who never belonged to any other church; and baptized Catholics who have never left the Church but were never confirmed. The law's failure to provide presbyters with the faculty to confirm in these situations does create pastoral problems when people in these situations enter a parish RCIA program as part of their return to the full practice of the faith. Although the parish priest has no faculty from the

[303] RConf 11, DOL 2520; c. 866.

[304] CCEO 696, §2 gives Latin rite presbyters the right to confer chrismation on the faithful of the Eastern churches, to the extent of their faculties as Latin rite presbyters. Thus, while an Eastern rite presbyter validly administers the sacrament to any of the faithful of the Latin rite, Latin rite presbyters validly administer the sacrament only to those members of Eastern churches for which they have the faculty to confirm the faithful of the Latin rite. Note, however, that CCEO 696, §3 requires for liceity that Eastern presbyters confer chrismation on the faithful of other churches sui iuris "with regard for the agreements entered between the Churches sui iuris in this matter."

[305] Pontifical Commission for the Interpretation of the Decrees of Vatican Council II, reply, April 25, 1975, AAS 67 (1975) 348, DOL 2352.

[306] Pontifical Commission for the Interpretation of the Decrees of Vatican Council II, reply, December 21, 1979, AAS 72 (1980) 105.

law to confirm these people, he could seek from the diocesan bishop the concession of the faculty to confirm them (c. 884).

In virtue of canon 144 the Church supplies faculties to confirm which are absent in cases of common error. For an application to the present canon, see the commentary on canon 144.

In danger-of-death situations, any presbyter has the faculty by law to confirm. The canon is drawn from the Rite of Confirmation:

> The law gives the faculty to confirm to the following besides the bishop: ... in danger of death, provided a bishop is not easily available or is lawfully impeded: pastors, and parochial vicars; in their absence their associate pastors; priests who are in charge of special parishes lawfully established; administrators, substitute and assistant priests; in the absence of all of the preceding, any priest who is not disqualified by censure or canonical penalty.[307]

The canon is less restrictive than the Rite in this situation in three respects. First, unlike the Rite, the canon makes no reference to the absence of a bishop as a condition for the licit exercise of the faculty to confirm in danger-of-death situations. Second, the canon expresses no preference for the presbyter who should confirm if more than one of them is present in a danger-of-death situation as the Rite does. Only the pastor is singled out for special mention. Third, the canon makes no reference at all to a censure or canonical penalty which, according to the Rite, would disqualify a presbyter from confirming. In short, the canon greatly simplifies the exercise of the faculty given by the law to presbyters to confirm in danger-of-death situations.

Faculty by Concession

Canon 884 — §1. The diocesan bishop is to administer confirmation personally or is to take care that another bishop administers it. If necessity requires it, he can grant the faculty to one or more specific presbyters, who are to administer this sacrament.

§2. For a grave cause the bishop and even the presbyter endowed with the faculty of confirming in virtue of the law or the special grant of the competent authority can in single cases also associate presbyters with themselves to administer the sacrament.

The previous canon stipulated those situations in which a presbyter has the faculty to confirm by the law itself. The present canon provides the means by which a presbyter may obtain the faculty by concession of competent authority for situations in which he does not have the faculty by law. In the 1917 code and in church law prior to Vatican Council II, the sole authority competent to concede to presbyters the faculty to confirm was the Holy See. The council called for the extension of this authority to the diocesan bishop. The present canon reflects this development. The canon treats two ways in which the faculty to confirm can be conceded: the concession of the faculty by the diocesan bishop to permit one or more designated presbyters to confirm in his absence, and the concession of the faculty by the bishop or delegated minister to associate other ministers with him in a concelebration of confirmation.

By recalling the particular obligation of the diocesan bishop to administer the sacrament personally, the canon reaffirms that the bishop is the ordinary minister of confirmation. If it is at all possible, the diocesan bishop should administer the sacrament throughout the diocese entrusted to him. If he is unable to do so, another bishop is the preferred alternate minister, since he too is an ordinary minister of the sacrament. The Rite of Confirmation explains this preference for a bishop as the minister of confirmation:

> The primary minister of confirmation is the bishop. Normally a bishop administers the sacrament so that there will be a clearer reference to the first pouring forth of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost: after the apostles were filled with the Holy Spirit, they themselves gave the Spirit to the faithful through the laying on of hands. Thus the reception of the Spirit through the ministry of the bishop shows the close bond that joins the confirmed to the Church and the mandate received from Christ to bear witness to him before all.[308]

[307] RConf 7, DOL 2516.

The designation of a presbyter as minister of confirmation is clearly less desirable than employing another bishop, as is indicated by the canon's qualification of this option with the clause "if necessity requires." No such qualification is attached to the selection of a bishop other than the diocesan bishop. The canon does not specify what constitutes a case of necessity. Situations such as the absence of the bishop from his diocese, his illness, distance, and the large number of parishes in a diocese would be sufficient to constitute a situation of necessity. The canon specifies that one or more "specific" presbyters can be conceded the faculty in cases of necessity. This limitation on the bishop's concession of the faculty to presbyters is meant to safeguard the primacy of the bishop as ordinary minister of confirmation. Thus, a diocesan bishop is not to grant the faculty to confirm to all or most of the priests in his diocese. The canon imposes no additional limitations on the bishop's discretion to choose the presbyter or presbyters to whom he concedes the faculty to confirm. Thus, any priest may be so delegated.

Canon 884, §2 foresees the situation in which the number of those to be confirmed is so large that the minister of the sacrament needs to be assisted by one or more co-ministers of the sacrament. The concelebration of the sacrament would prevent an unduly protracted celebration of confirmation. Since confirmation is generally celebrated in the context of the Eucharist, the use of co-ministers of the sacrament would also prevent the conferral of confirmation from overshadowing the celebration of the Eucharist.[309]

The text of paragraph two is inspired by the Rite of Confirmation:

> On the basis of true need and a special reason, as sometimes is present because of the large number of those to be confirmed, the minister of confirmation mentioned in n. 7 [the bishop] or the extraordinary minister designated by special indult of the Apostolic See or by law may associate other priests with himself in the administration of this sacrament.
>
> It is required that these priests either have a particular function or office in the diocese, being, namely, vicars general, episcopal vicars or delegates, district or regional vicars, or those who by mandate of the Ordinary are counted as equal to these ex officio; or be the pastors of the places where confirmation is conferred, pastors of the places where the candidates belong, or priests who have had a special part in the catechetical preparation of the candidates.[310]

The most obvious difference between the canon and the Rite is the simplification of the criteria for selecting presbyters to join the principal minister in the celebration of the sacrament. The rite shows a marked preference for a priest who holds some diocesan office, probably to reflect the connection between the designated priest and the bishop who is the ordinary minister. In the absence of a diocesan official, the pastor of the place of confirmation, or of the candidates, or a priest who played a principal part in the catechesis of the candidates is to be designated by the principal minister in that order. On the other hand, the canon expresses no order of preference for the presbyters who are to join the principal minister in celebrating the sacrament.

[308] Ibid.

[309] See McManus, in CLSA Com, 637.

[310] RConf 8, DOL 2517.

The canon treats this concelebration of confirmation as an exceptional event, since it is permitted only "for a grave cause." The Rite gives an example of what constitutes such a grave cause: "the large numbers of those to be confirmed." That concelebration is exceptional is also evident in the canon's stipulation that concelebration is permitted only "in single cases."

Both the canon and the rite state that the bishop (the canon is more specific in qualifying him as the "diocesan bishop") and the presbyter who has the faculty to confirm either by law or by concession can concede to other priests the faculty to confirm. Although the diocesan bishop can designate a priest to confirm in his absence, the designated priest can associate other priests with him to confirm only in a ceremony at which he personally exercises his faculty to confirm. He cannot "subdelegate" the faculty to another priest to confirm in his absence.

The rite describes how these associated priests function in the celebration of confirmation. They extend hands over the candidates along with the principal celebrant, but do not join in the prayer which accompanies this "laying on of hands."[311] They confer the anointing in the same way as the principal minister.[312]

Obligations of Ministers

Canon 885 — §1. The diocesan bishop is obliged to take care that the sacrament of confirmation is conferred on subjects who properly and reasonably seek it.

§2. A presbyter who possesses this faculty must use it for the sake of those in whose favor the faculty was granted.

Since bishops have the power and some presbyters the faculty to confirm, they have the obligation to use the power or faculty on behalf of those for whom it was given. As the ordinary minister of confirmation, the bishop has the ultimate responsibility to see that confirmation is conferred on his subjects who properly and reasonably request it. Since the sacrament of confirmation is necessary for full initiation into the Church, baptized members of the faithful are entitled to this sacrament,[313] provided that they are properly prepared and request it freely.

The priest who has the faculty to confirm, whether by law or by special concession, has the obligation to use that faculty on behalf of those for whom it was granted. Thus, a presbyter is bound to confirm adults he baptizes or receives into full communion with the Catholic Church on the occasion of the baptism or rite of admission. No presbyter should neglect to confirm a person in danger of death.

Rights of and Restrictions on the Ordinary Minister

Canon 886 — §1. A bishop in his diocese legitimately administers the sacrament of confirmation even to faithful who are not his subjects, unless their own ordinary expressly prohibits it.

§2. To administer confirmation licitly in another diocese, a bishop needs at least the reasonably presumed permission of the diocesan bishop unless it concerns his own subjects.

The remaining canons of this chapter deal with the rights of and restrictions on ministers of the sacrament of confirmation.[314] Canon 886 treats of the rights of bishop ministers; canon 887 of the rights of presbyter ministers. Canon 888 addresses the particular situation when confirmation is celebrated in exempt places. The context of all three of these canons is the effect of the territory or place in which confirmation is conferred on the lawfulness and validity of the celebration.

[311] RConf 9, DOL 2518.
[312] RConf 45.

[313] See c. 213.
[314] The Eastern code presents a simplified version of the restrictions on the minister of chrismation in c. 696, §3. These restrictions are only for liceity.

Canon 886 deals with the situation in which a bishop is the minister of confirmation. Within the confines of his own diocese, the bishop has the right to confirm his own subjects. He confirms validly and licitly the subject of another ordinary, unless that ordinary has expressly prohibited him from doing so. Outside his own diocese, a bishop confirms licitly with at least the implied permission of the local diocesan bishop. Even without this permission and even if expressly prohibited, the bishop confirms his own subjects validly and licitly in another ordinary's territory. Since the canon does not speak of a "diocesan bishop" but simply of a "bishop" without qualification, auxiliary bishops and retired bishops enjoy the same rights as does the diocesan bishop in the exercise of their ministry to confirm.

Rights of and Restrictions on Presbyter Ministers

Canon 887 — A presbyter who possesses the faculty of administering confirmation also confers this sacrament licitly on externs in the territory assigned to him unless their proper ordinary prohibits it; he cannot confer it validly on anyone in another territory, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 883, n. 3.

Canon 887 has more juridical significance than the preceding canon because it determines not only when a presbyter exercises the faculty to confirm lawfully, but also when he does so validly. Thus, the canon can be seen as an implicit reaffirmation of the primacy of the bishop as ordinary minister of confirmation, since he always confirms validly. The liceity and validity of confirmation by presbyters depends on the territory for which the faculty to confirm was granted.

Territorial restrictions on presbyters' faculty to confirm were already stipulated in canon 883, 1° which grants the faculty to confirm to presbyters who are equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop but only within the limits of their territory. The "territory" of those equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop is the entire territory of the particular churches under their direction. Outside that territory, they have no faculty, and, therefore, confirmations administered by them are invalid. Canon 887 imposes a similar territorial restriction on the faculty of other presbyters to confirm. However, the territory of these other presbyters may be more restricted than that of those equivalent in law to diocesan bishops. Since the mandate to baptize or receive into full communion, which forms the basis for the faculty by law to confirm, may not have been given for the entire territory of the particular church, "the territory assigned to him" may be restricted to a particular region or parish. The diocesan bishop's designation of a presbyter to confirm in his absence may be restricted to a particular parish or to a single celebration of confirmation in a determined area which becomes by the deputation "the territory assigned to him."

Within the confines of his own territory, a presbyter who has the faculty to confirm, either by law or by special mandate, always confirms validly and licitly those who live in his territory. Within the scope of his faculty, a presbyter may also validly and licitly confirm externs (those not domiciled in the territory assigned to him) who happen to be in his territory, as long as their own ordinary has not prohibited this. Should the presbyter confirm externs despite their own ordinary's express prohibition, the confirmation would be valid but illicit. Thus, a presbyter's confirmation of an extern despite the prohibition of the extern's proper ordinary has the same juridic effect as a bishop's.

While a bishop confirms validly but illicitly outside his own territory unless he has the at least presumed permission of the diocesan bishop of that place, a presbyter has no faculty to confirm outside his own territory. Therefore, a confirmation outside the presbyter's assigned territory is invalid, whether the one confirmed is the presbyter's own subject or not. However, the faculty of a presbyter to confirm is not territorially restricted when confirmation is administered in danger-of-death situations.

There are also other instances when a presbyter may confirm outside the territory where his pastoral ministry is normally exercised. For example, if a pastor who has the faculty to baptize an adult invites a presbyter from another diocese to baptize the adult in his parish, the extern priest must also confirm the neophyte (c. 866). Since the extern priest has the faculty to baptize the adult from the pastor, the law itself grants him the faculty to confirm as well. Similarly, a diocesan bishop may designate a priest from another diocese to minister confirmation in his absence. A priest designated by a diocesan bishop to confirm may also associate with him in the concelebration of confirmation a priest from another diocese. In all of these situations, the confirmations are both valid and licit. However, these examples are not really exceptions to the rule that presbyters validly confirm only in their own territory, but rather cases in which "the territory" is expanded. An extern priest can confirm a person he baptizes because, although the priest is incardinated elsewhere, he is confirming within the "territory assigned to him" by his mandate from the pastor to baptize. When a diocesan bishop designates a priest from another diocese to confirm during his absence, the bishop makes his own diocese the presbyter's proper territory for purposes of confirmation. In the same way, when a priest who has the faculty to confirm associates an extern priest with himself for confirmation, this priest is within the territory assigned to him for purposes of this particular confirmation.

Rights of Ministers in Exempt Places

Canon 888 — Within the territory in which they are able to confer confirmation, ministers can administer it even in exempt places.

The final canon of this chapter on the minister of confirmation speaks of the rights of the minister in "exempt places." "Exempt places" are those religious houses or territories within the geographical boundaries of a particular church or diocese which are exempt from the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishop or person equivalent to him in law. Normally, this term is used to designate houses of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right. However, their exemption does not restrict the right and obligation of the bishop to regulate the liturgical life of the diocese.[315] Exempt places are subject to the authority of the diocesan bishop in what pertains to the public exercise of divine worship (c. 678, §1). Canon 888 is an application of this principle. It allows any lawful minister, whether he is a bishop or a presbyter, to celebrate confirmation in places otherwise exempt from his jurisdiction.

CHAPTER III
THOSE TO BE CONFIRMED
[cc. 889–891]

With canon 889, the code begins its consideration of those to be confirmed. This is a short chapter (three canons) by comparison with the parallel chapter on baptism (eight canons).[316] In the normative rite for the celebration of sacraments of initiation for adults, the celebration of confirmation takes place in the same ceremony as the celebration of baptism. Thus, there is no need to repeat the norms governing the confirmation of adults immediately following baptism. Canon 889 determines the basic requirements for confirmation. Canon 890 treats the obligation of the faithful to receive the sacrament and the obligation of parents and pastors to see that the faithful are properly prepared for it. Canon 891 treats the proper age for confirmation.

[315] See c. 838, §4.

[316] The Eastern code devotes only one canon to this matter. CCEO 693 simply states that those who are baptized are to be chrismated. Since the faithful of the Eastern churches are confirmed as infants, there is no need for the distinction between adults and children or for any stipulation of the appropriate age, as there is in the Latin code.

Capacity for Confirmation

Canon 889 — §1. Every baptized person not yet confirmed and only such a person is capable of receiving confirmation.

§2. To receive confirmation licitly outside the danger of death requires that a person who has the use of reason be suitably instructed, properly disposed, and able to renew the baptismal promises.

The first paragraph of canon 889 is distilled from two previous canons: canon 842, §1 which states that no other sacrament may be received prior to baptism and canon 845 which lists confirmation as one of those sacraments which imposes a character and so cannot be repeated.

The second paragraph is a justification for the practice in the Latin church of deferring confirmation until the candidate has reached the age of discretion: the kind of preparation necessary for the reception of confirmation is beyond the intellectual capacity of infants.

The canon mentions three elements of such preparation: the person is to be suitably instructed; the person is to be properly disposed; and the person is to be able to renew the baptismal promises. The absence of even a mention of the catechumenate as a possible means by which this preparation can be provided is another indication that the canons on confirmation presume that this sacrament will be celebrated in a distinct ceremony apart from baptism.

Paragraph two of the canon foresees circumstances when these requirements for confirmation are not binding. The text is drawn from the Rite of Confirmation, but the canon expands into two exceptions what is presented in the rite as a single exception. The Rite states:

> If one who has the use of reason is confirmed in danger of death, there should, as far as possible, be some spiritual preparation beforehand, suited to the individual situation.[317]

The Rite mentions only one situation when preparation for confirmation is not required: the case when a person who has the use of reason is in danger of death. The canon expands this one exception into two: the case when any person is in danger of death, and the case when a person does not have the use of reason, even when there is no danger of death.

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Children of Catechetical Age presents a more extensive overview of the sort of preparation for confirmation the law expects.

> The initiation of children requires both a conversion, which is personal and somewhat developed according to their age, and the assistance of the education needed at this age. From then on their initiation is to be adapted both to the spiritual progress of the candidates, that is, their growth in faith, and to the catechetical instruction they receive. Accordingly, as with adults, their initiation is to be extended over several years, if need be, before they receive the sacraments. It is also divided into different stages and periods and is marked by liturgical rites.[318]

> The children's progress in the formation they receive depends as much on the help and example of their companions as on their parents. This should be taken into account.
>
> Generally the children to be initiated belong to a group of their companions who are already baptized and are preparing for confirmation and Eucharist. Therefore, their initiation is based on this catechetical group and shares in its progress.
>
> It is to be hoped that the children will also receive as much help and example as possible from their parents, who must assent to their initiation and to their leading a Christian life from this time forward. The period of initiation will also provide a good opportunity for the family to have contact with priests and catechists.[319]

[317] RConf 12, DOL 2521.

[318] RCIA 307, DOL 2459.

Obligation of Confirmation

Canon 890 — The faithful are obliged to receive this sacrament at the proper time. Parents and pastors of souls, especially pastors of parishes, are to take care that the faithful are properly instructed to receive the sacrament and come to it at the appropriate time.

The canon treats the obligation to receive confirmation, an obligation which binds the Christian faithful in general and parents and pastors in particular. The Christian faithful are to receive this sacrament at the proper time. What constitutes the "proper time" will be determined in the next canon. This preceptive norm is very different from the parallel canon in the 1917 code[320] which stressed that the sacrament was not necessary for salvation, but that the faithful who have the opportunity to receive it should not neglect to do so.

Like the 1917 code, the present canon stresses the obligation of pastors to see that candidates for confirmation are properly prepared to receive it. However, it extends this obligation to parents as well. By specifically mentioning parents, the canon reveals the underlying presumption of almost all the canons on confirmation that the sacrament is conferred at a separate celebration distinct from baptism when those to be confirmed are children still under the care of their parents, rather than in the normative celebration together with baptism in the case of adults.

The rite gives an extensive treatment of the role of the parents and pastors and recognizes the role of the entire Christian community in this preparation, about which the code is silent.

One of the highest responsibilities of the people of God is to prepare the baptized for confirmation. Pastors have the special responsibility to see that all the baptized reach the completion of Christian initiation and therefore that they are carefully prepared for confirmation.

Adult catechumens who are to be confirmed immediately after baptism have the help of the Christian community and, in particular, the formation that is given to them during the catechumenate. Catechists, sponsors, and members of the local Church participate in the catechumenate by means of catechesis and community celebration of the rites of initiation. For those who were baptized in infancy and are confirmed only as adults, the plan for the catechumenate is used with appropriate adaptation.

The initiation of children into the sacramental life is ordinarily the responsibility and concern of Christian parents. They are to form and gradually increase a spirit of faith in the children and, at times with the help of religious education classes, prepare them for the fruitful reception of the sacraments of confirmation and the Eucharist. The role of the parents is also expressed by their active participation in the celebration of the sacraments.[321]

Age for Confirmation

Canon 891 — The sacrament of confirmation is to be conferred on the faithful at about the age of discretion unless the conference of bishops has determined another age, or there is danger of death, or in the judgment of the minister a grave cause suggests otherwise.

Prior to the revision of the rites of Christian initiation, particularly the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, confirmation was sometimes referred to, somewhat sarcastically, as a sacrament in search of a theology. The commentary on canon 879 noted the different emphases, some complementary, some competing, but all justifiable, that are present in current theological treatments of confirmation. Of those different theological emphases, those that appear most in competition are the one that emphasizes confirmation as the completion of baptism, and the one that emphasizes confirmation as the sacrament of mature faith and adult commitment. These two recurring emphases partly explain why the age for celebrating confirmation has varied so much throughout the history of the Church, and varies still, particularly in the differing practices of the several autonomous ritual churches that comprise the Catholic Church.

[319] RCIA 308, DOL 2460.
[320] CIC 787.
[321] RConf 3, DOL 2512.

In the earliest days of the Church, it was the bishop who conferred the sacraments of baptism and confirmation. As the Church grew, it became necessary for presbyters to confer baptism, and in the Eastern churches confirmation as well. The Latin church deferred confirmation until a later age, not for any compelling theological reason, but simply because it took several years for the bishop to visit all his local communities to confer the sacrament. The gradual development of a theology of confirmation as a sacrament of adult or mature faith was an attempt to justify theologically the historical and "accidental" separation of confirmation from baptism, and to give more meaning to a sacrament that was normally celebrated apart and seen as distinct from baptism.

With the promulgation of Pius X's Quam singulari at the beginning of this century, the age for the reception of first communion (and, with it, the age for the reception of first penance) became the age of discretion. The practical problems involved in catechizing young people for the reception of three sacraments at the age of discretion led to the deferral of the reception of confirmation until a still later age. Thus, the traditional ordering of the sacraments which had remained constant throughout the history of the Church was altered. The normal order in which these sacraments have been received during most of this century became: baptism, penance, Eucharist, and finally confirmation. Thus, throughout the long development of the sacrament of confirmation, it has been conferred at every possible age.

The 1917 code determined not a normative age, but a "preferred" age for the reception of confirmation: it "should preferably be postponed in the Latin Church until the seventh year of age."[322] At the time, pastoral practice generally deferred the reception of confirmation well beyond the age of seven. Canon 5 of the 1917 code allowed bishops to retain the practice of confirming at a later age or even an earlier age than seven, if this was a centennial or immemorial custom in their region.[323] However, a 1952 authoritative interpretation prohibited postponing confirmation beyond the age of ten.[324]

Prior to Vatican Council II, there had been only limited official recognition by Rome of the actual pastoral situations in local churches where confirmation was postponed well beyond the age of seven and often well beyond the age of ten. However, after the promulgation of the revised Rite of Confirmation in 1971, wider concessions were made in order to recognize divergent practices. Episcopal conferences were charged to determine an age for confirmation more suitable for their local cultures and customs.[325]

> With regard to children, in the Latin Church the administration of confirmation is generally delayed until about the seventh year. For pastoral reasons, however, especially to implant deeply in the lives of the faithful complete obedience to Christ the Lord and a firm witnessing to him, the conferences of bishops may set an age that seems more suitable. This means that the sacrament is given, after the formation proper to it, when the recipients are more mature.[326]

[322] CIC 788.
[323] See McManus, in CLSA Com, 639–640.
[324] CodCom, March 26, 1952, AAS 44 (1952) 496; CLD 3, 314.
[325] McManus, in CLSA Com, 640.
[326] RConf 11, DOL 2520.

Since the age for confirmation established in the 1917 code was not normative but only "preferred," and since the Rite of Confirmation allowed episcopal conferences to determine an age for confirmation in light of local conditions, the 1980 schema of the revised code proposed suppressing the age of seven as the preferred age for confirmation and leaving the determination of the age at which to confirm to local custom or to a decree of the conference of bishops.[327]

However, canon 891 is considerably different from the norm proposed in the 1980 schema. Although it speaks of the "age of discretion," the revised code retains the age of seven not just as the "preferred" age, but as the normative age for confirmation. Nevertheless, the canon continues to allow episcopal conferences to determine another age. This is an important development, since it allows for an exception to the normative age to become a general policy within the territory of an episcopal conference.

The age at which confirmation is conferred varies widely in the dioceses of the United States. As a result of this divergent practice, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops debated for ten years before determining the age for confirmation. In 1993, the conference determined not a specific age but a range of ages for the conferral of confirmation: from seven to eighteen. This determination was approved by the Holy See for a five-year period beginning on July 1, 1994. However, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops will soon have to decide whether to determine another age or range of ages for confirmation or to reaffirm the present rather elastic norm. The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops took another approach to determining the age for confirmation. They decreed "that the sacrament of confirmation in the Latin rite shall be conferred at the age determined in the approved catechetical programmes."[328]

Canon 891 differs from its source, the Rite of Confirmation, in another respect. The rite states that episcopal conferences could determine an age other than seven "when the recipients are more mature."[329] The canon is less restrictive. It allows the episcopal conference to determine "another age," and does not require that it be a more mature age than seven. Thus, a bishops' conference could establish an age younger than seven for the reception of confirmation.

Exceptions can be made to both the normative age of discretion and the age determined by the conference of bishops when there is danger of death or when, in the judgment of the minister, some other grave cause is present.

CHAPTER IV
SPONSORS
[cc. 892–893]

The two canons which comprise chapter 4 give only a summary treatment of the role of sponsors for confirmation and are dependent on the parallel canons on sponsors at baptism.

The CLSA translation of the code renders the Latin patrinus or matrina ("godfather" or "godmother") as "sponsor." The term "sponsor" has a more technical sense in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, where the sponsor is one who presents a candidate for the catechumenate, and may, but need not, be chosen as the godparent prior to the celebration of the rite of election.

Role of Sponsor

Canon 892 — Insofar as possible, there is to be a sponsor for the person to be confirmed; the sponsor is to take care that the confirmed person behaves as a true witness of Christ and faithfully fulfills the obligations inherent in this sacrament.

The sponsor is the person charged with seeing that the one confirmed lives as a true witness to [327] 1980 Schema, c. 845.

[328] See Woestman, Sacraments, 92.

[329] RConf 11, DOL 2520.

Christ and fulfills faithfully the obligations connected with the sacrament.

A sponsor is required at confirmation only "insofar as possible." Canon 793 of the 1917 code[330] had noted the presence of a sponsor at confirmation as "a very ancient custom of the Church."[331] Thus, the present canon agrees with the 1917 code that a sponsor is not necessary for the celebration of the sacrament, but that it is a preferred custom.

The Rite of Confirmation expands somewhat on the role of the sponsor during the celebration of the sacrament and makes a forceful argument for the presence of a sponsor:

> As a rule there should be a sponsor for each of those to be confirmed. These sponsors bring the candidate to receive the sacrament, present them to the minister for the anointing, and will later help them to fulfill their baptismal promises faithfully under the influence of the Holy Spirit whom they have received.[332]

Requirements for Sponsors

Canon 893 — §1. To perform the function of sponsor, a person must fulfill the conditions mentioned in can. 874.

§2. It is desirable to choose as sponsor the one who undertook the same function in baptism.

The requirements or prerequisites for a person to serve as a sponsor at confirmation are the same as those for sponsors at baptism (c. 874).[333] In the normative celebration of confirmation of adults, the sponsors for baptism and those for confirmation are the same, since both sacraments are conferred in the same liturgical celebration. As a result, it is understandable that the requirements for baptismal and confirmation sponsors should be the same.

This connection between baptismal and confirmation sponsors is made even more explicit in the second paragraph of canon 893 which states that it is desirable that those who earlier exercised the office of sponsor at baptism should also exercise this office when the previously baptized person is confirmed. The Rite of Confirmation provides an explicit rationale for this preference for the sponsor at baptism continuing as the sponsor at confirmation:

> In view of contemporary pastoral circumstances, it is desirable that the godparent at baptism, if available, also be the sponsor at confirmation; CIC 796, 1° is therefore amended. This change expresses more clearly the link between baptism and confirmation and also makes the function and responsibility of the sponsor more effective.
>
> Nonetheless the option of choosing a special sponsor for confirmation is not excluded. Even the parents themselves may present their children for confirmation. It is for the local ordinary to determine diocesan practice in the light of local conditions and circumstances.[334]

Both the code and the Rite are in agreement that it is not necessary for godparents at baptism to continue as sponsors at confirmation. There appears to be a substantial difference between the code and the Rite, however, with regard to the possibility of parents serving as sponsors at the confirmation of their children. It is clear in the above text cited from the rite that parents can function as sponsors for the confirmation of their own child. The Rite of Confirmation 5 is devoted exclusively to sponsors. After mentioning that sponsors "bring

[330] CIC 793.

[331] See McManus, in CLSA Com, 641.

[332] RConf 5, DOL 2514.

[333] The Eastern code makes no mention of sponsors in the canons on chrismation, since this sacrament is always conferred with baptism and the sponsors for chrismation are always the same as those for baptism.

[334] RConf 5, DOL 2514.

the candidates to receive the sacrament" and "present them to the minister for the anointing," the Rite states a preference for the baptismal sponsors continuing as confirmation sponsors. It then makes provision for "special" sponsors, i.e., those who were not also the sponsors at baptism. The rite adds immediately that "even parents may present their children for confirmation." From the context there can be no question that the rite allows for parents to be sponsors. It uses the same terminology ("presenting" for anointing or confirmation) for sponsors in the first part of the paragraph as it does for parents in the latter part of the paragraph.

The code, however, bars parents from serving as the children's confirmation sponsors. Canon 893, §1 refers back to the requirements for baptismal sponsors in canon 874, since the requirements for confirmation sponsors are identical to those for baptismal sponsors. However, canon 874, §1, 5° stipulates that neither the mother nor the father of a child to be baptized can be the sponsor for that child. Thus, there is a contradiction between the code which states that parents cannot be their children's confirmation sponsors and the Rite which states expressly that they can serve as sponsors.

To hold that the Rite of Confirmation allows parents to be the confirmation sponsors for their children is not a misinterpretation of the law, as some have claimed.[335] In the last redaction of the 1980 schema the contradiction between the draft code and Rite was brought to the attention of the Commission for the Revision of the Code in a report submitted by four consultors. These consultors argued that the canon treating the requirements for sponsors had to be amended to allow parents to be confirmation sponsors for their children and so to harmonize the draft code with the Rite of Confirmation.[336] However, the Commission rejected this proposal. The Commission claimed that parents' presentation of their children for confirmation was distinct from the sponsors' presentation of candidates for confirmation and that, if parents did present their children and no other sponsor was present, then it must be said that sponsors were lacking.[337]

This argumentation is not very convincing. The Rite stipulates that "sponsors bring the candidates to receive the sacrament" and "present them to the minister for the anointing." Nevertheless, the Code Revision Commission claimed that what parents do when they present their children for the anointing is somehow essentially different from what sponsors do when they present children for the sacrament. Speaking about the role of parents, the Rite singled out the parents as an example of the "special sponsor," that is, a sponsor who was not the sponsor at baptism.

In 1984 the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments released a clarification to an inquiry concerning the contradiction between the code and the rite on this very point, but the clarification does little more than repeat the response of the Commission for the Revision of the Code the previous year:

> From what has been said, it is clear that parents and the godparents exercise different functions in the sacrament of confirmation. For this reason parents may present their children according to the indicated rubric, even though they cannot be admitted to the function of godparent as this function would not add anything to their duty as parents.[338]

[335] For example, see Woestman, Sacraments, 94: "The second sentence of the last paragraph [of the Rite of Confirmation, 5] caused a problem of interpretation for some. They read the sentence to mean that the parents could be the sponsors of the one confirmed. It is to be noted that the text says nothing about the parents being sponsors, but says that they can present (praesentent) their children for confirmation."

[336] Comm 15 (1983) 188–189.

[337] Comm 15 (1983) 189.

[338] CDWDS, clarification, N 20 (1984) 86; CLD 11, 202–203.

The Commission for the Revision of the Code responses to proposals from consultors for revisions of drafts of the revised code are not authoritative interpretations of the code that was eventually promulgated. Nor is the "clarification" offered by the congregation, which was issued as a documentorum explanatio, an authoritative interpretation. Texts of this kind are guides for interpretation, but they are not official, and therefore not authentic, interpretations.[339] (Authentic interpretations are always published in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis; this "clarification" was not.)

The contradiction between the code and the Rite has given rise to a doubt of law (dubium iuris) regarding the current law that governs the possibility of parents serving as sponsors at their children's confirmations. Thus, one is free to interpret the rite as allowing parents to act as sponsors of their children until an authoritative interpretation resolves the conflict.

CHAPTER V
THE PROOF AND REGISTRATION OF THE CONFERRAL OF CONFIRMATION
[cc. 894–896]

The three final canons on confirmation deal with the methods of proving the sacrament's conferral, the information to be recorded in the register, and those responsible for recording this information.[340] The canons are clear and self-explanatory.

Proof of Confirmation

Canon 894 — To prove the conferral of confirmation the prescripts of can. 876 are to be observed.

Proof that confirmation was conferred is to be established in the same ways that the conferral of baptism is to be proven (c. 876). The juridic consequences of confirmation for a person's status and rights in the Church are not nearly as critical as are those of other sacraments, especially baptism, sacred orders, and matrimony. Consequently, cases in which people need to secure records proving their reception of confirmation are less frequent. Proof of confirmation is required for reception of orders[341] and may be requested prior to the celebration of marriage.[342] It may also be necessary to establish that a person was confirmed for him or her to serve as a sponsor for baptism or confirmation, since full initiation into the Church is a requirement for assuming these offices.[343] Since establishing proof of confirmation is only rarely an urgent matter, the issue is given a more summary treatment here than in the parallel canons on proof of baptism (cc. 875–876).

Registration and Notification

Canon 895 — The names of those confirmed with mention made of the minister, the parents and sponsors, and the place and date of the conferral of confirmation are to be recorded in the confirmation register of the diocesan curia or, where the conference of bishops or the diocesan bishop has prescribed it, in a register kept in the parish archive. The pastor must inform the pastor of the place of baptism about the conferral of confirmation so that a notation is made in the baptismal register according to the norm of can. 535, §2.

After indicating the names and other information to be recorded, canon 895 presents two options for the place in which the record is to be kept. Curiously, first preference is given to a diocesan register to be kept in the central office of the diocese. No such diocesan record is foreseen [339] See N 1 (1965) 136; see also Woestman, Sacraments, 94–95.

[340] Since in the Eastern churches chrismation is usually celebrated with baptism, there is no treatment in the Eastern code of the registration and proof of chrismation. Only in the case where chrismation was celebrated apart from baptism is the minister of chrismation to notify the pastor of the place where the person was baptized (CCEO 695, §2.)

[341] Canon 1050, 3°.

[342] Canon 1065, §1.

[343] Canon 874, §1, 3°.

in the parallel canons on baptism. The purpose of such a diocesan register for confirmation is an implicit affirmation of the primacy of the bishop as ordinary minister of the sacrament. Since the bishop is usually the most common minister of the sacrament, a diocesan register may facilitate securing a confirmation record when it is needed.

The second option, a parochial register, is also allowed by the canon. This, however, is seen as a secondary preference, since the selection of this possibility appears to require the approval of the conference of bishops.

Regardless of which option is adopted, the pastor of the place where the confirmation took place is required to send notification of the confirmation to the pastor of the place where the confirmed person was baptized. The canon refers to canon 535, §2 which describes the kind of information that is to be added to the baptismal register, most notably those sacraments received and other events which determine the canonical status of the person after baptism.

Notification of the Pastor of the Place of Confirmation

Canon 896 — If the pastor of the place was not present, the minister either personally or through another is to inform him as soon as possible of the conferral of confirmation.

The canon is the parallel to canon 878 which deals with notifying the pastor of the parish in which a baptism was celebrated but at which he was not the minister or not present. This notification is called for to ensure that the proof of baptism is recorded. The present canon applies this same principle to confirmation.[344] It has special relevance for the situation in which a person was confirmed in danger of death. If the pastor himself did not confirm the person, then the minister who did so is to notify the pastor so that the conferral of confirmation may be recorded.

[344] See the parallel canon in CCEO 695, §2.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(The following bibliographical material provides further information regarding the sacraments discussed in the titles of Book IV on baptism and confirmation.)

Books

Abbo, J., and J. Hannan. The Sacred Canons. 2nd rev. ed. 2 vols. St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co., 1960.

Austin, G. The Rite of Confirmation: Anointing with the Spirit. Studies in the Reformed Rites of the Catholic Church, Vol. III. New York: Pueblo, 1985.

Bouscaren, T., and A. Ellis. Canon Law: A Text and Commentary. 2nd ed. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Co., 1955.

Chiappetta, L. Dizionario del Nuovo Codice di Diritto Canonico. Naples: Dehoniane, 1986.

———. Prontuario di Diritto Canonico e Concordatario. Rome: Dehoniane, 1994.

Cogan, P., ed. CLSA Advisory Opinions: 1984–1993. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995.

Echeverria, L., et al., eds. Code de Droit Canonique. Trans. A. Soria-Vasco, H. LaPlane, and M. Chueca. Paris: Cerf, 1989.

Huels, J. The Pastoral Companion. Chicago: Franciscan Herald, 1986.

Kavanagh, A. Confirmation: Origins and Reform. New York: Pueblo, 1988.

NCCB. "National Statutes for the Catechumenate." Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (Appendix III). Chicago: Liturgy Training Pub., 1988.

Paralieu, R. Guide Pratique du Code de Droit Canonique. Bourges: Tardy, 1985.

Pfnausch, E., ed. Code, Community, Ministry. 2nd rev. ed. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992.

Reedy, W., ed. Becoming a Catholic Christian. New York: Sadlier, 1981.

Regatillo, E. Ius Sacramentarium. 3rd ed. Santander: Sal Terrae, 1960.

Woestman, W. Sacraments: Initiation, Penance, Anointing of the Sick. 2nd ed. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1996.

Woywod, S., and C. Smith. A Practical Commentary on the Code of Canon Law. Rev. ed. New York: Joseph F. Wagner, Inc., 1957.

Articles

Barrett, R. "Confirmation: A Discipline Revisited." J 52 (1992) 697–714.

Covino, P. "The Postconciliar Infant Baptism Debate in the American Church." W 56 (1982) 240–260.

Daly, B. "Canonical Requirements of Parents in Cases of Infant Baptism according to the 1983 Code." Stud Can 20 (1986) 409–438.

Green, T. "The Church's Sanctifying Office: Reflections on Selected Canons in the Revised Code." J 44 (1984) 357–411.

Levada, W. "Reflections on the Age of Confirmation." TS 57 (1996) 302–312.

Rehrauer. A. "Welcome In! Canonical Issues and the RCIA." CLSA Proceedings 52 (1990) 161–169.

John M. Huels, O.S.M.

TITLE III
THE MOST HOLY EUCHARIST
[cc. 897–958]

The third and final sacrament of full Christian initiation is the Eucharist, the subject of the sixty-two canons of this title. The canons are arranged in three chapters: "The Eucharistic Celebration," "The Reservation and Veneration of the Most Holy Eucharist," and "The Offering Given for the Celebration of Mass." This division better integrates the various aspects of eucharistic discipline than did the former code which dealt with reservation and worship of the Eucharist not in the section on the sacraments but in that on divine worship, which included such topics as sacred furnishings and vows and oaths. The new arrangement bespeaks the essential unity of the Eucharist celebrated, received, and reserved. Some members of the coetus (committee) of the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law which prepared this title of the code believed that the section on Mass offerings should be treated in Book V on church property, but it was decided to leave it in this title given its special relation to the celebration of the Eucharist.[1]

The principal sources for title III are the 1917 code, Vatican II's constitution on the sacred liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium, the 1967 instruction Eucharisticum mysterium on the worship of the Eucharist,[2] the 1973 Rite of Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass, and the 1975 revised edition of the General Instruction of the Roman Missal. The canons also draw on numerous other postconciliar documents mentioned in the footnotes of the commentary.

The Eastern code is considerably different from the Latin code in its treatment of the Divine Eucharist. While the Latin code covers the subject in sixty-two canons in three chapters, the Eastern code has only twenty canons in one chapter (CCEO 698–717). The Eastern code better recognizes the active role of deacons and laity in the celebration (CCEO 698, §§2–3) than does the Latin code, and it relegates many matters of detail to the particular laws of the various churches sui iuris. The reception of first communion by infants at their baptism and chrismation is permitted in accord with particular law (c. 710). In addition to offerings for the celebration of the Divine Liturgy, a priest is permitted to accept offerings for the Liturgy of the Presanctified and for commemorations in the Divine Liturgy in accord with established custom (c. 715).

The most noteworthy developments in the Latin law on the Eucharist since 1983 have occurred by means of authentic interpretations of the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Canons of the Code of Canon Law and its successor, the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts. These developments are treated in the commentary at canons 906, 910, 917, and 951. Other significant developments came about in a 1995 Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith letter on the matter of the Eucharist, treated at canon 924, and in a 1991 Congregation for the Clergy decree, treated at canon 948.

FOUNDATIONAL CANONS

Canon 897 — The most august sacrament is the Most Holy Eucharist in which Christ the Lord himself is contained, offered, and received and by which the Church continually lives and grows. The eucharistic sacrifice, the memorial of the death and resurrection of the Lord, in which the sacrifice of the cross is perpetuated through the ages is the summit and source of all worship and

[1] ComCICRec, Schema Documenti Pontificii quo Disciplina Canonica de Sacramentis Recognoscitur (Rome: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1975) 8.

[2] SCRit, May 25, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 539–573, DOL 179; hereafter cited as Eucharisticum mysterium.

Christian life, which signifies and effects the unity of the people of God and brings about the building up of the body of Christ. Indeed, the other sacraments and all the ecclesiastical works of the apostolate are closely connected with the Most Holy Eucharist and ordered to it.

Canon 898 — The Christian faithful are to hold the Most Holy Eucharist in highest honor, taking an active part in the celebration of the most august sacrifice, receiving this sacrament most devoutly and frequently, and worshiping it with the highest adoration. In explaining the doctrine about this sacrament, pastors of souls are to teach the faithful diligently about this obligation.

Canon 899 — §1. The eucharistic celebration is the action of Christ himself and the Church. In it, Christ the Lord, through the ministry of the priest, offers himself, substantially present under the species of bread and wine, to God the Father and gives himself as spiritual food to the faithful united with his offering.

§2. In the eucharistic gathering the people of God are called together with the bishop or, under his authority, a presbyter presiding and acting in the person of Christ. All the faithful who are present, whether clerics or laity, unite together by participating in their own way according to the diversity of orders and liturgical functions.

§3. The eucharistic celebration is to be organized in such a way that all those participating receive from it the many fruits for which Christ the Lord instituted the eucharistic sacrifice.

Canons 897 and 898 introduce the entire title on the Eucharist, including the chapters on eucharistic reservation and worship and on Mass offerings. Canon 899 is an additional introductory canon for the first chapter on the eucharistic celebration, but it is best treated in connection with these two foundational canons. Canons 897 and 899 establish the doctrinal foundations for the disciplinary canons which follow, i.e., they are doctrinal in the broad sense, in that they include statements of dogma as well as authoritative teachings which lack a strictly dogmatic character. The canons manifest an effort to harmonize past doctrine, such as the real presence and the sacrificial nature of the Mass, with Vatican II emphases such as the Eucharist as meal as well as its celebrational and memorial character. The ecclesial dimensions of the Eucharist which were highlighted at the council are also evident: the Eucharist as source and sign of the unity of the body of Christ; as source and summit of the Church's life and worship, its nourishment and growth; and as action of the whole people of God participating in the sanctifying function of the Church and reflecting its hierarchical structure through diverse and distinct liturgical roles and ministries.

Canon 898 is an exhortation on the general obligations of the faithful regarding the Eucharist and on the duty of pastoral ministers (animarum pastores) to elucidate eucharistic doctrine. This duty, which binds all ecclesiastical officeholders who exercise pastoral care, is also stated in canon 843, §2 for the sacraments in general. More specific directives on the obligation of pastors of parishes (parochi) to provide catechetical and experiential formation in the Eucharist are found in canons 528, §2; 777, 2°; and 914. Canon 898 also introduces three principal aspects of the Eucharist which are treated in the code: the Eucharistic action or celebration, holy communion, and the veneration of the Eucharist.

The history of these three canons is rather complex. A major part of canon 897 was derived from canon 66, §1 of the proposed Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis; the original version of canon 898 was canon 72 of the 1975 schema introducing the proposed section on the subject of the Holy Eucharist; the core of canon 899, §§1–2 was canon 61 of the same schema. Major revisions in the formulation and positioning of the canons were made by the coetus on the sacraments in response to critiques received during the consultation process, and final changes were made before the 1981 plenary session of the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law.[3]

[3] Comm 13 (1981) 233–238, 408–410; Rel 209–210.

The immediate and proximate sources of the canons are chiefly certain texts of Vatican II, but the canons also draw on preconciliar sources such as the Council of Trent and the 1917 code, as well as postconciliar sources such as the General Instruction of the Roman Missal.[4]

CHAPTER I
THE EUCHARISTIC CELEBRATION
[cc. 899–933]

This chapter of thirty-three canons—more than half of all the canons on the Eucharist—is divided into four articles: "The Minister of the Most Holy Eucharist," "Participation in the Most Holy Eucharist," "The Rites and Ceremonies of the Eucharistic Celebration," and "The Time and Place of the Celebration of the Eucharist." The former code treated the Eucharist in two chapters, one on the eucharistic sacrifice and one on the sacrament. The more integral approach of the revised code better manifests the continuity and unity of the sacrificial and sacramental dimensions of the eucharistic action. The doctrinal canon (c. 899) which introduces the chapter on the eucharistic celebration was discussed above in the commentary on the foundational canons.

ARTICLE 1: THE MINISTER OF THE MOST HOLY EUCHARIST [cc. 900–911]

The twelve canons of this article deal with a wide variety of issues relative to the ministers of the Eucharist, who include the celebrant and concelebrants at Mass, and the ordinary and special ministers of communion and Viaticum. The canons establish the discipline for the following matters: valid and licit celebration (c. 900), Mass intentions (c. 901), concelebration (c. 902), the celebret (c. 903), the frequency of celebration (c. 904), binations and trinations (c. 905), the necessity of the presence of some faithful (c. 906), functions restricted to the priest (c. 907), the prohibition of interdenominational concelebration (c. 908), the personal prayer of the priest (c. 909), eucharistic ministers (c. 910), and ministers of Viaticum (c. 911).

[4] See, e.g., SC 14, 26, 28, 41, 47, 48; LG 11; PO 2, 5, 6; Trent, sess. XIII, cap. 1, c. 1; sess. XXII, cap. 1, cc. 1–2; CIC 801; Intro. to GIRM 1–15; GIRM 1–5, 7, 48, 58–62, 74, 326.

Valid and Licit Celebration

Canon 900 — §1. The minister who is able to confect the sacrament of the Eucharist in the person of Christ is a validly ordained priest alone.

§2. A priest not impeded by canon law celebrates the Eucharist licitly; the provisions of the following canons are to be observed.

The 1917 code (CIC 802) spoke of the priest's having the "power to offer the sacrifice of the Mass," whereas this canon speaks of validly confecting the sacrament of the Eucharist. Despite the change in terminology, the meaning remains the same: only a validly ordained priest may preside at or concelebrate the Eucharist and validly consecrate the bread and wine.[5] Lay persons who attempt the liturgical action of the Eucharist automatically incur the penalty of interdict and deacons the penalty of suspension (c. 1378, §2, 1°).

The second paragraph of the canon, which is new in the revised code, deals with the licit celebration of the Eucharist. While any priest may validly consecrate the sacrament, some priests may not do so licitly, such as those who have been deprived of the exercise of their order by an irregularity or impediment,[6] or by a penalty,[7] or who have lost the clerical state.[8] Other requirements for the licit celebration of the Eucharist are specified in the canons which follow.

[5] See SCDF, letter Sacerdotium ministeriale, August 6, 1983, AAS 75 (1983) 1:1001–1009; CLD 10, 151–158.

[6] Canon 1044. See W. H. Woestman, "Restricting the Right to Celebrate the Eucharist," Stud Can 29 (1995) 155–178.

[7] Canons 1331, §1, 2°; 1332; 1333, §1, 1°; 1338, §2.

[8] Canons 290, 292, 1336, §1, 5°.

Mass Intentions

Canon 901 — A priest is free to apply the Mass for anyone, living or dead.

A Mass may be applied for anyone,[9] living or deceased, baptized or non-baptized, sinner or saint. A non-Catholic may not be mentioned in the eucharistic prayer, however, since "ancient Christian liturgical and ecclesiological tradition permits the specific mention in the Eucharistic Anaphora only of the names of persons who are in full communion with the Church celebrating the Eucharist."[10]

The canon is considerably different from its correlate in the 1917 code (CIC 809) which said that Mass may be applied for the dead in purgatory or for the living with the exception of public Masses for the excommunicated. Private Masses could be applied for tolerated excommunicates (excommunicati tolerati), which included baptized non-Catholics, but for the excommunicates who must be avoided (excommunicati vitandi), a private Mass could be applied only for their conversion (CIC 2262, §2, 2°). A "private Mass" excluded any publicizing of the name of the person for whom the Mass was being applied. A 1976 Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith decree derogated from the 1917 code to permit public Masses to be applied for deceased non-Catholic Christians when their families, friends, or subjects expressly request it and the ordinary judges that scandal is absent.[11] These conditions no longer bind since the revised code does not mention them.

This canon was dropped from the second draft of the schema on the sacraments in 1978 because it was considered more theological than juridical, but it was reinstated in 1981.[12]

[9] See the introductory commentary to cc. 945–958 for an explanation of what it means to apply a Mass.

[10] Ecum Dir 121.

[11] Accidit in diversis regionibus, June 11, 1976, AAS 68 (1976) 621; CLD 8, 864; DOL 163.

[12] Comm 13 (1981) 244; Rel 209.

Concelebration

Canon 902 — Unless the welfare of the Christian faithful requires or suggests otherwise, priests can concelebrate the Eucharist. They are completely free to celebrate the Eucharist individually, however, but not while a concelebration is taking place in the same church or oratory.

Various forms of concelebration have existed in the Western and Eastern churches since at least the third century. Even before the liturgical reforms decreed by Vatican II, the Roman Pontifical had prescribed concelebration at Masses for the ordination of priests and the consecration of bishops. Sacrosanctum Concilium derogated from canon 803 of the 1917 code to permit much wider opportunity for concelebration.[13] It also directed that a new rite for concelebration be prepared, and this was accomplished by 1965.[14] The liturgical laws governing concelebration are found principally in the General Instruction of the Roman Missal 153–208.[15] Concelebration is required at the ordinations of bishops and presbyters and at the Chrism Mass. The liturgical law recommends concelebration, unless the needs of the faithful require otherwise, at: (a) the evening Mass of Holy Thursday; (b) the Mass for councils, meetings of bishops, or synods; (c) the Mass for the blessing of an abbot; (d) the conventual Mass and the principal Mass in churches and oratories; (e) the Mass for any kind of gathering of priests, either secular or religious. The diocesan bishop, in accord with the law, has the right to regulate concelebration in his diocese, also in the churches and oratories of

[13] SC 57.

[14] SC 58; Ritus servandus in concelebratione Missae et Ritus Communionis sub utraque specie (Rome: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1965); P. Jounel, The Rite of Concelebration of Mass and of Communion under Both Species (New York: Desclée, 1967). Hereafter cited as either Rite of Concelebration or Rite of Communion under Both Kinds.

[15] See also NCCB, Guidelines for the Concelebration of the Eucharist, rev. ed., September 23, 1987, BCLN 23 (1987) 83–87.

clerical religious institutes and clerical societies of apostolic life when the eucharistic celebration is open to the faithful.[16]

The first part of the canon is based substantially on a statement from Eucharisticum mysterium 47. Concelebration is preferred over multiple private Masses because it manifests the Church gathered "in the unity of sacrifice and priesthood and the single offering of thanks around the one altar with the ministers and holy people."[17] However, priests should not insist on concelebration at the expense of the welfare of the faithful, such as when more than one Mass is required to meet pastoral needs.

The second part of the canon is based on Sacrosanctum Concilium 57, §2, n. 2 which says that each priest should have the opportunity (facultas) to celebrate an individual Mass. The canon reaffirms this by saying that priests are completely free to celebrate the Eucharist individually. This does not apply to Holy Thursday, however, when liturgical law prohibits all Masses without a congregation. Furthermore, priests are forbidden from celebrating an individual Mass at the time when there is a concelebration occurring in the same place, and they are also subject to the law of canon 906 on celebrating with at least some faithful present.

Concelebration among priests of different Catholic churches sui iuris can be done with permission of the diocesan/eparchial bishop for a just cause, especially that of fostering charity, and for the sake of manifesting unity between the churches.[18] The liturgical rite of the principal celebrant is to be observed, and he is to wear the appropriate vestments and insignia of his own church sui iuris (CCEO 701). Ordinarily the concelebrants wear the vestments of their own church, but for a just cause and having removed any wonderment on the part of the faithful, they may wear the liturgical vestments of another church sui iuris (CCEO 707, §2).

The Celebret

Canon 903 — A priest is to be permitted to celebrate even if the rector of the church does not know him, provided that either he presents a letter of introduction from his ordinary or superior, issued at least within the year, or it can be judged prudently that he is not impeded from celebrating.

The law on the celebret from the 1917 code (CIC 804) is retained here but is greatly simplified. A celebret is a letter of introduction from a priest's ordinary or superior which attests to the priest's ordination and good standing, and certifies that there is nothing to prevent him from celebrating Mass. Secular priests obtain the celebret from their local ordinary, and priests who are religious or members of clerical societies of apostolic life may obtain it from their local ordinary, major superior, or local superior. To be valid it must be dated within a year of its presentation to the rector of the church where the priest wishes to celebrate. In this canon the term "rector" includes anyone who has the care of a church or an oratory, such as a pastor or religious superior, and not only the rector mentioned in canon 556. In many places the celebret is not requested of visiting priests, and the canon states that it is not necessary when the rector prudently judges that a priest is not impeded from celebrating.[19] The need for a celebret is even less if a priest merely wishes to celebrate Mass privately, in accord with canon 906.

Frequency of Celebration

Canon 904 — Remembering always that in the mystery of the eucharistic sacrifice the work of redemption is exercised continually, priests are to celebrate frequently; indeed, daily celebration is

[16] See cc. 678, §1; 1214; 1223.

[17] SCRit, decr Ecclesiae semper, March 7, 1965, AAS 57 (1965) 410, DOL 1792. See also GIRM 59; and CDW, decl In celebratione Missae, August 7, 1972, AAS 60 (1972) 561–562, DOL 208.

[18] One opinion holds that the bishop's permission is necessary only in the case of a publicly announced celebration. See Pospishil Com, 299.

[19] See commentary above on c. 900, §2.

recommended earnestly since, even if the faithful cannot be present, it is the act of Christ and the Church in which priests fulfill their principal function.

The daily celebration of the Eucharist by each priest was not an ancient practice in the Church, nor was it required by universal law even when it became common. The 1917 code obliged priests to celebrate several times a year, which the commentators interpreted as only three or four times a year. The former law also directed bishops and religious superiors to see that their priests celebrated Mass at least on Sundays and holy days of obligation (CIC 805).

Canon 904, unlike the directives in the 1917 code, does not speak of a binding obligation to celebrate but instead uses a milder form of preceptive language: "priests are to celebrate frequently," not must celebrate. Moreover, daily celebration by priests is earnestly recommended or, in the words of canon 276, §2, 2°, they are "earnestly invited" to offer the Eucharist daily. While there is no law binding priests to celebrate Mass daily, it is highly commended for the reasons adduced in the canon.

The wording of canon 904 is very similar to that of Eucharisticum mysterium 44, which in turn draws on Presbyterorum ordinis, the conciliar decree on the ministry and life of priests, and Paul VI's encyclical Mysterium fidei, on the doctrine and worship of the Holy Eucharist.[20] The statement that "priests fulfill their principal function" by celebrating the Eucharist originates in Presbyterorum ordinis 13 and must be interpreted in that context where the council was speaking expressly of priests' sanctifying function only. The same article also develops the priests' functions of ruling (in the broad sense of pastoral care) and teaching.

The 1994 Directory on the Ministry and Life of Priests 49 speaks of the importance of daily Eucharist for priestly spirituality. It says that the Mass should be for the priest "the central moment of his day and of his daily ministry, fruit of a sincere desire and an occasion for a deep and effective encounter with Christ."[21]

Bination and Trination

Canon 905 — §1. A priest is not permitted to celebrate the Eucharist more than once a day except in cases where the law permits him to celebrate or concelebrate more than once on the same day.

§2. If there is a shortage of priests, the local ordinary can allow priests to celebrate twice a day for a just cause, or if pastoral necessity requires it, even three times on Sundays and holy days of obligation.

While priests may celebrate daily, they are forbidden from celebrating or concelebrating more than once each day except when the law permits it. The purpose of canon 905, §1 is to prevent the abuse of priests' celebrating multiple Masses for inadequate reasons or from improper motives. Similar prohibitions have been a part of church law since the eleventh century.[22] The law also serves to ensure that the manner of celebrating by priests does not become too hurried or routine due to the pressures of multiple Masses.

The principal occasions when the law permits a priest to celebrate or concelebrate more than once a day are: (1) on Holy Thursday at the Chrism Mass and at the evening Mass of the Lord's Supper; (2) at the Easter Vigil and the second Mass of Easter; (3) at the three Masses of Christmas, provided that the Masses are at their proper times according to the liturgical books; and (4) at concelebrations with the bishop or his delegate at a synod or pastoral visitation, or on the occasion of a meeting of priests, or gatherings of [20] PO 13; ency Mysterium fidei, September 3, 1965, AAS 57 (1965) 762, DOL 176. See also PO 2, 5; LG 28; AG 39.

[21] CFC, Directory on the Ministry and Life of Priests (London: Catholic Truth Society, 1994) 51–52. See also John Paul II, letter Dominicae cenae 2, February 24, 1980, AAS 72 (1980) 113–149; CLD 9, 531–532.

[22] C. 53, D. I, de cons.; c. 3, 12, X, de celebratione missarum, III, 41; CIC 806.

religious—and another Mass celebrated for the benefit of the people.[23]

The 1917 code (CIC 806, §1) permitted trination on All Souls' Day, a practice that had existed in the universal Church only since 1915.[24] The revised code has abolished this practice because the former code is explicitly abrogated (c. 6, §1, 1°). Nevertheless, some canonists continue to maintain that this trination has not been abrogated.[25]

In 1963 Paul VI granted to diocesan bishops the faculty to permit priests to celebrate twice on weekdays for a just cause and when there is a shortage of priests, and even three times on Sundays and holy days of obligation when there is true pastoral need.[26] Canon 905, §2 extends this faculty to all local ordinaries.[27] The law permits bination and trination only for priests who preside at the Eucharist but not for concelebration except in the cases mentioned above. Local ordinaries may permit a priest to binate when there is a just cause, such as to provide for the needs of the faithful, and only when there is an insufficient number of priests available. For permission to trinate on Sundays and holy days, there must be a case of genuine pastoral need as, for example, when a priest has the care of more than one church or when the church is unable to accommodate all the faithful who wish to attend. The mere convenience of the faithful would not be an adequate reason to trinate unless a sufficient number of them could not otherwise attend Mass.

The Apostolic See discourages the multiplication of Masses when a church is large enough to accommodate the faithful at a smaller number of Masses. According to Eucharisticum mysterium 26, the pastoral effort is weakened by multiple Masses because the participation of the people in a scattered congregation is diminished and the effectiveness of overworked priests is reduced. The same document adds that small religious communities and other groups should take part in the parish Mass on Sundays and feast days rather than at separate celebrations. Multiple Masses attended by a few and small group Masses on the Lord's Day tend to detract from the value of the Eucharist as a sign and source of ecclesial unity.

The vigil Mass on the evening before a Sunday, in respect to this canon, counts as a Mass celebrated on Saturday, not Sunday; likewise a vigil Mass on the evening before a holy day of obliga-

[23] GIRM 158. See also SCSacr, rescript, March 10, 1970; CLD 7, 38–39, which permits priests who celebrate a Mass for the faithful on Holy Thursday to concelebrate at the evening Mass.

[24] Benedict XV, apconst Incruentum, August 10, 1915, AAS 7 (1915) 401.

[25] Most canonists who have commented on this canon assume or claim that the All Souls' trination is still permissible, and they cite the 1915 apostolic constitution of Benedict XV as their source. W. Woestman, e.g., says that the constitution is liturgical law and lies outside the domain of the code in keeping with c. 2. See "Three Masses on All Souls' Day," J 47 (1987) 521–530. However, the principal provision of the 1915 constitution, that Mass may be celebrated by each priest three times on All Souls' Day, was taken up by the 1917 code and is therefore subject to the provision of c. 22 of that code, as well as c. 20 of the 1983 code, that a later law abrogates a former one if it entirely reorders it. Even if the 1915 apostolic constitution may be called liturgical law, it is still subject to the same rules of interpretation and revocation as are other ecclesiastical laws. Since permission for the All Souls' trination is no longer included in the code or the current liturgical law, it has been formally abrogated. If this was unintentional, as some infer, then the legislator must correct this in a subsequent edition of the GIRM. It cannot be corrected by liturgical ordos, even if published by the Apostolic See; the compiler of the ordo is not the legislator.

If a revised GIRM does not explicitly provide for priests to trinate on All Souls, it should be clear that this faculty has indeed been abrogated. If there is no change in the Missal and three Mass texts continue to be provided for November 2, this would mean, as it now does, that a priest has a choice of Mass texts for that day, not that he may celebrate all three Masses in virtue of the law itself.

[26] PM I, 2.

[27] Chiappetta maintains that this faculty probably pertains also to ordinaries of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life of pontifical right relative to their subjects. However, his interpretation is contrary to the proper meaning of the words of this canon. See Chiappetta Com, 3218.

tion counts for that day, not the holy day. If pastoral need requires that a priest regularly celebrate more than two Masses on weekdays, including Saturdays, or more than three times on Sundays and holy days, the diocesan bishop may dispense in individual cases. However, the bishop may not give general permission without an indult from the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments.

Presence of Faithful Necessary

Canon 906 — Except for a just and reasonable cause, a priest is not to celebrate the eucharistic sacrifice without the participation of at least some member of the faithful.

The prohibition against celebrating the Eucharist without the presence of some member of the faithful has been a part of church law at least since the pontificate of Alexander III in the twelfth century, and it was reaffirmed in the 1917 code in terms of the requirement of a server for every Mass.[28] Vatican II insisted:

> When rites, according to their specific nature, make provision for communal celebration involving the presence and active participation of the faithful, it is to be stressed that this way of celebrating them is to be preferred, as far as possible, to a celebration that is individual and, so to speak, private. This applies with special force to the celebration of Mass.[29]

Lest this conciliar teaching be misunderstood, in 1965 Pope Paul VI reaffirmed the traditional practice of priests' celebrating Mass with only a server present:

> Although it is eminently in accord with the very nature of the celebration of Mass that large groups of the faithful participate actively, nevertheless, there is to be no disparagement but full approval of a Mass that, in conformity with the prescriptions and lawful traditions of the Church, a priest for a sufficient reason offers in private, that is, with no one present except the server.[30]

The Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments in 1949 stated that according to the approved authors there are only four cases in which Mass may be celebrated without a server: when it is necessary to give Viaticum to a sick person; to enable the people to satisfy the precept of hearing Mass; in time of pestilence, when a priest would otherwise be obliged to abstain from celebrating for a notable time; and when the server leaves during the course of the Mass.[31] Pius XII would not grant an indult for Mass to be said without a server unless some member of the faithful were present to assist.[32] The server in the former law was required not primarily for the material assistance of the priest but because the Eucharist is essentially an action of the whole Church, priest and people. In the words of Thomas Aquinas, the server "represents the whole Catholic people, and in that capacity answers the priest in the plural."[33] These principles are equally applicable to the present law, although the server's place may now be taken by any member of the faithful.

Canon 906 alters the previous discipline in two ways. First, the server is no longer necessary, but there must be the participation of at least some member of the faithful, i.e., of at least one other Christian who can make the responses in place of the congregation. For individual celebration the Roman Missal provides a "Rite of Mass without a Congregation," and the server's responses in it may be made by any member of the faithful. Sec-

[28] C. 6, X, de filiis presbyt. ord. vel non, I, 17; CIC 813, §1.
[29] SC 27, DOL 27.

[30] Mysterium fidei 32, September 3, 1965, AAS 57 (1965) 761–762, DOL 1176.
[31] Instr Quam plurimum, October 1, 1949, AAS 41 (1949) 507; CLD 3, 318.
[32] Instr Quam plurimum, October 1, 1949, AAS 41 (1949) 508.
[33] STh III, q. 83, art. 5, ad 12.

ond, the requirement that there be serious necessity for a priest to celebrate alone is changed to "a just and reasonable cause." Such a cause would be demonstrated whenever a member of the faithful is unavailable and when the priest is unable to participate in a communal celebration, e.g., as a result of illness, infirmity, or travel. A just and reasonable cause would not be the mere convenience of the priest or his preference for celebrating alone. Canon 902, while granting priests the freedom of celebrating individually instead of concelebrating, does not excuse the priest from the law requiring the presence of at least some member of the faithful.

Female Altar Servers

The former law corresponding to canon 906 is canon 813 of the 1917 code. This canon had barred females from serving Mass. Since certain liturgical documents before 1983 had also contained the ban on female servers, there was some doubt as to whether the ban was still in effect in keeping with the principle of canon 2, or whether it had been abrogated in keeping with canon 6, §1. There was also a question as to whether the code implicitly permitted female servers as one of the "other functions" mentioned in canon 230, §2. In 1992 the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts gave an authentic interpretation of canon 230, §2 which acknowledged that women or girls could be altar servers at Mass.[34] This was a merely declarative interpretation, since the prohibitions of canon 813 of the 1917 code against females serving Mass and approaching the altar during Mass were not included in canon 906 of the 1983 code.[35]

[34] AAS 86 (1994) 541; BCLN 30 (1994) 13. See also BCL, "Suggested Guidelines Regarding Altar Servers," BCLN 30 (1994) 165–166.

[35] See J. Huels, "Female Altar Servers: The Legal Issues," W 57 (1983) 513–525; Disputed Questions in the Liturgy Today (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1988) 27–38.

Functions Restricted to the Priest

Canon 907 — In the eucharistic celebration deacons and lay persons are not permitted to offer prayers, especially the eucharistic prayer, or to perform actions which are proper to the celebrating priest.

In the tradition of Jewish ritual meals and of the Last Supper, certain functions in the Eucharist have always been reserved to a presider, who as leader of the community prays and acts in its name. The Second Vatican Council established the general principle that those who have a liturgical ministry should perform only and all those functions which pertain to them according to the nature of the rite and the liturgical norms.[36] The hierarchical structure of the liturgy flows from the hierarchical ordering of the people of God who "all take part in this liturgical service, not indeed all in the same way, but all in their proper way."[37] The more the faithful clearly understand their proper role in the liturgical assembly and in the eucharistic action, "the more conscious and fruitful will be the active participation that belongs to a community."[38]

The eucharistic prayer is the preeminent prayer of the priest.[39] In this central prayer of praise and thanksgiving the priest unites the community with himself as he addresses the Father through the Son in the name of all, and "the entire congregation joins itself to Christ in acknowledging the great things God has done and in offering the sacrifice."[40] The priest's voice alone must be heard "as the assembly gathered to celebrate the liturgy maintains a reverent silence."[41] When non-priests join in the eucharistic prayer or when concelebrants are more than barely audible, the sign of the celebrant as leader of worship and president

[36] SC 28.

[37] LG 11.

[38] Eucharisticum mysterium 11; see also n. 12, DOL 1240–1241.

[39] GIRM 10.

[40] Eucharisticum mysterium 54, DOL 1444.

[41] SCDW, littcirc Eucharisticae participationem 8, April 27, 1973, AAS 65 (1973) 343, DOL 1982.

of the community is diminished and the role of silence, fostered by Sacrosanctum Concilium, is neglected.[42] Moreover, the common recitation of the eucharistic prayer destroys its dialogical character whereby the priest proclaims and the people listen attentively and respond. Among the most important responses of the people is the "Amen" when they affirm the whole prayer at its end. To accentuate its importance, the "Amen" should be embellished with song and never overwhelmed by reciting the doxology in common.[43]

Besides the eucharistic prayer, the other prayers and actions in the Eucharist proper to the celebrating priest are specified in the Roman Missal. Although canon 907 is new, it is related to canon 818 of the 1917 code which stated that the priest celebrant must observe accurately and devoutly the rubrics of the liturgical books and beware of adding other ceremonies or prayers on his own. The canon is closely related to the basic principle expressed in canons 835, §4 and 899, §2 that the faithful have their proper part to play in the sanctifying office and actively participate in liturgical celebrations, especially the Eucharist, in their own way.

Interdenominational Concelebration Prohibited

Canon 908 — Catholic priests are forbidden to concelebrate the Eucharist with priests or ministers of Churches or ecclesial communities which do not have full communion with the Catholic Church.

The 1993 Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism gives a rationale for this law: eucharistic concelebration is a visible manifestation of full communion in the faith, worship, and community life of the Catholic Church, expressed by ministers of that Church.[44] According to this principle, there can be no concelebration with ministers of other Christian churches and ecclesial communities until full communion exists with them. A Catholic priest who concelebrates at a non-Catholic Eucharist is subject to a just penalty (c. 1365).

Although there was no comparable canon in the 1917 code, the content of this canon is not new. Two decrees of Vatican II and several post-conciliar documents issued by the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity considered the question of sacramental sharing in general and of common participation in the Eucharist in particular.[45] A 1970 declaration of the secretariat specifically mentions the issue of "a communal Eucharist celebrated together by ministers belonging to still separated churches and ecclesial communities."[46] A 1972 instruction of this same secretariat affirmed the basic principle that "of its very nature, the celebration of the Eucharist signifies the fullness of profession of faith and the fullness of ecclesial communion."[47]

Personal Prayer of Priest

Canon 909 — A priest is not to neglect to prepare himself properly through prayer for the celebration of the eucharistic sacrifice and to offer thanks to God at its completion.

The appendix to the Roman Missal provides several optional prayers of preparation for and [42] GIRM 170; BCL, Study Text 5: Eucharistic Concelebration (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1978) 25, n. 6; SC 30. See also F. R. McManus, Liturgical Participation: An Ongoing Assessment, American Essays in Liturgy 10 (Washington, D.C.: Pastoral Press, 1988) 11–14.

[43] GIRM 191; IDon 4; BCL, Music in Catholic Worship (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1972) 53–54; BCLN 16 (1980) 230.

[44] Ecum Dir 104 e.

[45] OE 27–29; UR 8, 14, 22; ED 42–44, 55, 59; SPCU, decl Dans ces derniers temps, January 7, 1970, AAS 62 (1970), 184–188, DOL 150; SPCU, instr In quibus rerum circumstantiis, June 1, 1972, AAS 64 (1972) 518–525; SPCU, interpretation Dopo la pubblicazione, October 17, 1973, AAS 65 (1973) 616–619; SPCU, Ecumenical Collaboration at the Regional, National and Local Levels IIIa, private, February 22, 1975, CLD 8, 879–880.

[46] Dans ces derniers temps 1, DOL 1024.

[47] In quibus rerum circumstantiis IV, 1.

thanksgiving after Mass. The priest may use these prayers or choose other ways to observe this canon. Canon 909 is substantially the same as canon 810 of the 1917 code.

Eucharistic Ministers

Canon 910 — §1. The ordinary minister of holy communion is a bishop, presbyter, or deacon.

§2. The extraordinary minister of holy communion is an acolyte or another member of the Christian faithful designated according to the norm of can. 230, §3.

Canon 845 of the 1917 code stated that the priest alone is the ordinary minister of communion, and the deacon is the extraordinary minister who could exercise this ministry only with permission of the local ordinary or the pastor, and for a grave reason. The current canon 910 states the church discipline that has been in effect since 1967 when the permanent diaconate was restored and deacons were made ordinary ministers of the Eucharist.[48]

The second paragraph of the canon treats the extraordinary, or special, minister of the Eucharist. Minister extraordinarius, which refers to a minister other than the ordinary minister, is translated as "special minister" by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy; this avoids the connotation of the English word "extraordinary" meaning "unusual."[49] According to canon 230, §3, acolytes and other special ministers of the Eucharist may distribute communion when the needs of the Church require it and when (ordinary) ministers are lacking. This may be either during the celebration of Mass or outside Mass, and they may administer either the bread or the cup.

In 1987 the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Canons of the Code of Canon Law made an authentic interpretation of this canon which stated that the special minister may not exercise his or her function "when ordinary ministers, who are not in any way impeded, are present in the church, though not taking part in the Eucharistic celebration."[50] This interpretation reinforces the fact that special ministers have an auxiliary function and are to be used only if there are insufficient ordinary ministers present who are not impeded. An ordinary minister may be impeded if he is not vested, has not been notified that he is to assist in this ministry, or cannot easily approach the sanctuary.[51]

Diocesan bishops also have the faculty to permit individual priests to appoint a qualified person to distribute communion for a single occasion when there is a genuine need.[52] This faculty provides for the exceptional cases when the number of available ordinary ministers and regularly deputed special ministers is insufficient to meet pastoral needs. Those who would make use of the provision are required to obtain advance permission from their diocesan bishop, who may also give general permission. In cases of pressing need, tacit permission may be presumed unless the contrary is evident.

The special minister is to be deputed in accord with canon 230, §3. In keeping with the norm of canon 231, §1, it is desirable to provide a suitable program of formation or instruction for the candidates who are to be commissioned as special min-

[48] SDO 3.

[49] See Rite of Commissioning Special Ministers of Holy Communion, BB chap. 63.

[50] Reply, February 20, 1987, AAS 80 (1988) 1373; BCLN 24 (1988) 104; Pamplona ComEng, 1293.

[51] See CLSGBI Com, 500.

[52] SCSacr, instr Immensae caritatis 2, 6, January 29, 1973, AAS 65 (1973) 264–271, DOL 2076, 2080. The Vatican English translation of the 1997 "Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests," art. 8, §1, Origins 27 (November 27, 1997) 406, leaves out the word "also" (etiam). It should read: "A non-ordained member of the faithful in cases of true necessity may be deputed by the diocesan bishop . . . to act as an extraordinary minister to distribute Holy Communion also outside of liturgical celebrations." The mistake in the Vatican translation makes it appear that the appointment applies only to distributing communion outside the liturgy. See CC et al., instr, Ecclesiae de ministerio, August 15, 1997, AAS 89 (1997) 871.

isters.[53] A diocesan bishop is free to mandate special ministers as he sees fit provided that the individual candidates' names are approved by the diocesan bishop himself; he may also delegate this faculty.

Legal History

In 1927 and 1930 extraordinary faculties were granted to ordinaries in Mexico and Russia permitting "pious lay men" to bring holy communion to the sick and to prisoners.[54] A wider use of special ministers of communion was permitted in 1969 by the routine granting of indults from the Holy See.[55] During the next few years numerous indults were granted to individual bishops and even to entire bishops' conferences, including the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.[56] When the minor orders were abolished by Paul VI in 1972, the new lay ministry of acolyte was created, among whose duties is that of distributing the Eucharist whenever ordinary ministers are not available or the number of communicants is great.[57]

The 1973 instruction of the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, Immensae caritatis, provided for the creation of special ministers without the necessity of the competent authorities applying for particular indults.[58] With the appearance of the instruction, local ordinaries had the faculty to appoint qualified persons of either sex to serve as special ministers for a given occasion, for a stated period of time, or even permanently, if needed. Immensae caritatis noted three circumstances, each of which would warrant the exercise of this ministry: (1) the absence of a priest, deacon, or acolyte; (2) the inconvenience to these same persons or their inability to distribute communion due to their involvement in some other pastoral ministry or because of ill health or advanced age; and (3) the presence of so many people who wish to receive communion that the celebration of Mass or the distribution of communion outside Mass would take an excessively long time.

Ministers of Viaticum

Canon 911 — §1. The pastor, parochial vicars, chaplains, and, with regard to all those dwelling in the house, the superior of a community in clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life have the duty and right of bringing the Most Holy Eucharist as Viaticum to the sick.

§2. In the case of necessity or with at least the presumed permission of the pastor, chaplain, or superior, who must be notified afterwards, any priest or other minister of holy communion must do this.

The minister of Viaticum in the 1917 code was principally the pastor; other priests could administer it only in cases of necessity or with at least the presumed permission of the pastor or ordinary.[59] The chief change in the law governing the minister of Viaticum occurred in the 1972 revision of the rites of anointing and Viaticum, which added as ordinary ministers both parochial vicars and priests who care for the sick in hospitals.[60] This canon includes not only those who care for the sick in hospitals, but all chaplains as ordinary ministers of Viaticum. General norms governing

[53] Some worthwhile instructional aids are W. J. Belford, Special Ministers of the Eucharist (New York: Pueblo, 1979); and BCL, Study Text I: Holy Communion, Commentary on the Instruction Immensae Caritatis (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1973).

[54] D. Sheehan, The Minister of Holy Communion, CanLawStud 298 (1950) 108–117.

[55] SCSacr, instr Fidei custos, April 30, 1966, not published, DOL 259. This instruction required that the person for this ministry be chosen in this order of preference: subdeacons, clerics in minor orders, those who have received tonsure, men religious, women religious, male catechists (unless, in the prudent judgment of the pastor, a male catechist is preferable to a woman religious), laymen, laywomen. See n. 3, DOL 2046. This hierarchy no longer applies.

[56] CLD 7, 648–652.

[57] MQ VI.

[58] DOL 264; see also HCWE 17.

[59] CIC 850; see also CIC 397, 3°; 464, §2; 1368.

[60] RAnointing 29.

chaplains are found in canons 564–572; canon 566, §1 specifically mentions the administration of Viaticum as one of the chaplain's chief duties. The right of the pastor to administer Viaticum is also implicit in canon 530, 3° where it is listed as one of the functions specially committed to the pastor.

The ordinary ministers of Viaticum for religious remain nearly the same as in the 1917 code (CIC 514). For clerical religious institutes and clerical societies of apostolic life, the ordinary minister of Viaticum is the superior of the house. He has the right and duty to administer the sacrament to all who live in the house, including boarders who are not members of the institute. The ordinary minister for houses of lay religious is the pastor, parochial vicar, or chaplain of the house. The ordinary minister of Viaticum for a diocesan seminary is the seminary rector or his delegate in accord with canon 262.

The administration of Viaticum by the ordinary minister is both a right and a duty. By making it a duty incumbent on priests who have positions of pastoral care, the legislator assures that the faithful have access to the full benefits of spiritual comfort provided by the Church, including penance and anointing. The administration of Viaticum is also a right, which means that the ordinary minister may reserve this ministry to himself in all cases or in individual instances, unless he is impeded.

Ministers of Viaticum other than the ordinary ministers may be used either in case of need or if the minister has at least the presumed permission of the ordinary minister. A case of need is demonstrated when someone is in danger of death and the ordinary minister is unavailable. One can always presume the permission of the ordinary minister in cases of danger of imminent death because the right of the faithful to receive the last sacrament supersedes the right of the ordinary minister to give it. Since the administration of Viaticum is a canonical duty of the ordinary minister, he should be notified when this duty is fulfilled by another. A deacon follows the rite of Viaticum outside Mass prescribed for priests in the Rite of Anointing 101–114.[61] Lay ministers follow the Rite of Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass.[62]

ARTICLE 2: PARTICIPATION IN THE MOST HOLY EUCHARIST [cc. 912–923]

The twelve canons of this article treat various aspects of participation in the Eucharist, all of which are related to the reception of holy communion. The norms regulate the following: the recipient of communion (c. 912), reception of communion by children (c. 913), duties of parents and pastors (c. 914), the prohibition of the Eucharist to public sinners (c. 915), obligation to confess serious sins (c. 916), communion twice a day (c. 917), communion outside Mass (c. 918), the eucharistic fast (c. 919), the eucharistic precept (c. 920), the recipient of Viaticum (cc. 921–922), and the Eucharist in other churches sui iuris (c. 923).

Recipient of Communion

Canon 912 — Any baptized person not prohibited by law can and must be admitted to holy communion.

Eligible baptized persons may and must be admitted to the Eucharist because they have a right to the sacrament in accord with canon 213. According to canon 842, §1, which is considered divine law, the recipient of communion must be baptized. For good reason the Church can prohibit baptized persons from receiving the sacrament or limit their reception of it. The law greatly restricts access to the Eucharist by baptized non-Catholics (c. 844, §§ 3–4). Further restrictions are specified in the canons which follow.

[61] The version approved for the United States is Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum 197–211.

[62] RAnointing 29, 112. See also commentary on cc. 910 and 921–922.

Reception of Communion by Children

Canon 913 — §1. The administration of the Most Holy Eucharist to children requires that they have sufficient knowledge and careful preparation so that they understand the mystery of Christ according to their capacity and are able to receive the body of Christ with faith and devotion.

§2. The Most Holy Eucharist, however, can be administered to children in danger of death if they can distinguish the body of Christ from ordinary food and receive communion reverently.

Since 1910 it has been the practice of the Latin church to give communion to children from the age of seven.[63] The ancient custom of giving communion to infants had largely ceased in the West by the twelfth century, but it is still maintained in Eastern churches. The Council of Trent decreed that it is not necessary to give the Eucharist to children before they have reached the age of discretion, but it did not condemn the practice.[64]

The intent of canon 913 is to ensure that children who receive the Eucharist have adequate catechetical and spiritual preparation.[65] Paragraph one states in broad terms the minimal requirements for admitting children to the Eucharist in ordinary circumstances. It does not specify what constitutes sufficient knowledge or how much faith and devotion is expected of the child but rather allows the persons mentioned in canon 914 to make such determinations while advising that the preparation be according to the child's capacity. The careful preparation required is something more than the intellectual preparation indicated by the words "sufficient knowledge." It includes formative experiences in faith such as are promoted by active participation in the Eucharist even before the children receive the first holy communion. The liturgy itself has formative value,[66] especially when it is adapted to the children's level as suggested by the principles contained in the Directory on Children's Masses. The use of the approved eucharistic prayers and lectionary for children can also encourage greater participation in and a fuller understanding of the "mystery of Christ" referred to in the canon.[67]

Children who are in danger of death may receive communion even if they do not have the sufficient knowledge and careful preparation specified in paragraph one. However, paragraph two requires that they be able to distinguish the body of Christ from ordinary food and to receive it reverently. The latter requirement is a change from the 1917 code (CIC 854, §2), which stated that the child must be able "reverently to adore" the host.

Duties of Pastors and Parents

Canon 914 — It is primarily the duty of parents and those who take the place of parents, as well as the duty of pastors, to take care that children who have reached the use of reason are prepared properly and, after they have made sacramental confession, are refreshed with this divine food as soon as possible. It is for the pastor to exercise vigilance so that children who have not attained the use of reason or whom he judges are not sufficiently disposed do not approach holy communion.

Canon 914 gives greater responsibility to parents and guardians in the preparation of children for the Eucharist than did the 1917 code (CIC 854, §5) which saw this principally as the pastor's

[63] SCSacr, decr Quam singulari, August 8, 1910, AAS 2 (1910) 577–583.

[64] Sess. XXI, Decr. de comm., c. 4.

[65] See Eucharisticum mysterium 14, DOL 1243; SCDW, Directory for Masses with Children, Pueros baptizatos 12, November 1, 1973, AAS 66 (1974) 30–46, DOL 276.

[66] SC 33.

[67] CDW, decr Postquam de precibus, Eucharistic Prayers for Masses with Children, November 1, 1974, N 11 (1975) 4–6, DOL 249; NCCB, Lectionary for Masses with Children, December 28, 1992, Liturgy Documentary Series 12: Masses with Children (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1996) 27–47.

duty.[68] Once children have attained the use of reason at about the age of seven,[69] and are judged sufficiently prepared and disposed, parents (or guardians) and pastors are responsible for seeing that these children receive communion as early as possible so that they not be deprived of a sacrament to which they have a right in law. The pastor has an additional obligation to see that children who do not have the use of reason or who are not sufficiently disposed do not receive the Eucharist. The canon gives broad discretionary latitude to the pastor for determining whether the child meets these requirements. However, in view of the right of the baptized to receive the sacraments, a doubt about the use of reason or sufficient disposition should be resolved in favor of the child's receiving communion.

Persons with Developmental Disabilities

The issue of the use of reason is especially problematic in the case of persons who are mentally retarded or who have other developmental disabilities, or who have Alzheimer's or other diseases that affect mental functioning. Traditionally the use of reason has been viewed in terms of the possession of abstract, cognitive skills, but the law does not exclude a broader definition which places primacy on symbolic and intuitive ways of knowing. For example, persons with developmental disabilities may not be able to conceptualize and articulate the difference between the body of Christ and ordinary food, but they can often appreciate the sacredness of the eucharistic food in the context of the reverence shown the sacrament by their families and the Christian community. The policy of the U.S. episcopal conference recognizes this:

> It is important to note, however, that the criterion for reception of holy communion is the same for persons with developmental and mental disabilities as for all persons, namely that the person be able to distinguish the body of Christ from ordinary food, even if this recognition is evidenced through manner, gesture or reverential silence rather than verbally. Pastors are encouraged to consult with parents, those who take the place of parents, diocesan personnel involved with disability issues, psychologists, religious educators and other experts in making their judgment [about whether such persons may be admitted to communion].[70]

Since the baptized have a fundamental right to the Eucharist, any doubts about the sufficiency of the use of reason should be resolved in favor of the person.[71]

Penance before First Communion

In the years following Vatican II there was widespread experimentation with the practice of delaying first penance until after first communion, but the Apostolic See repeatedly ordered that these experiments be halted.[72] Since the context of [68] On the role of parents in forming children for the Eucharist, see the Directory for Masses with Children 10, DOL 2143. It is the function of the pastor not so much to attend personally to the catechesis as to see that it is given, both before and after first communion. See c. 777, nn. 1–3. See also cc. 528; 843, §2; and 898.

[69] See c. 97, §2; GCD Addendum, n. 1.

[70] NCCB, "Guidelines for Celebration of the Sacraments with Persons with Disabilities" 20, June 15, 1995, Origins 25 (1995) 107–110. See also the pastoral statement of the Roman Catholic Bishops of England and Wales, All People Together 15–19 (London: CSP Studios, 1981).

[71] On the right of persons with developmental disabilities to the Eucharist, see J. Huels, "Canonical Rights to the Sacraments," in Developmental Disabilities and Sacramental Access: New Paradigms for Sacramental Encounters, ed. E. Foley (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1994) 94–115; and D. Wilson, "The Church, the Eucharist, and the Mentally Handicapped," CR 60 (1975) 69–84.

[72] SCSacr and SCC, decl Sanctus Pontifex, May 24, 1973, AAS 65 (1973) 410, DOL 379, CLD 8, 563; SCSDW, letter, April 30, 1976, DOL 380, CLD 8, 603; SCSDW and SCC, letter In quibusdam Ecclesiae partibus, DOL 381; SCSDW and SCC, reply, May 20, 1977, AAS 69 (1977) 427, DOL 382, CLD 8, 607. In contrast, the General Catechetical Directory of 1971 had previously manifested an this canon is the preparation of children for first communion, the requirement of penance before first communion should be seen as a means to assist the child's preparation to receive communion fruitfully. Children should be prepared for and should be encouraged to approach the sacrament of penance as part of their preparation for first communion. However, penance before communion is a doctrinal requirement only if a person is in a state of serious sin, and exceptions are permitted even in that case (c. 916). Therefore, if the parents, who have the primary responsibility for the child's catechesis,[73] should determine that their child is not yet ready for first penance but is ready for first communion, the child should not be denied the right to the sacrament.[74]

Prohibition of Eucharist to Public Sinners

Canon 915 — Those who have been excommunicated or interdicted after the imposition or declaration of the penalty and others obstinately persevering in manifest grave sin are not to be admitted to holy communion.

The canon is directed to individual ministers of the Eucharist who are to refuse the sacrament in the cases mentioned in the canon. A principal effect of the penalties of excommunication and interdict is the prohibition against receiving the sacraments (cc. 1331, §1, 2°; 1332). If the censure was imposed or declared, it is a public fact of the external forum and the minister is bound to refuse the Eucharist or other sacrament whether or not the community actually knows of the penalty.

Eucharistic ministers are also to refuse holy communion when they are certain: (1) that a person has committed a sin that is objectively grave, (2) that the sinner is obstinately persevering in this sinful state, and (3) that this sin is manifest. A manifest sin is one which is publicly known by a large part of the parish or other community; if the sin is not publicly known, refusing communion would be a violation of a person's right to a good reputation (c. 220). The sin in question is one which is repeated habitually, e.g., by a gangster, a drug dealer, an abortionist. This canon would not, as a rule, apply to a single grave sin, even if manifest, since obstinacy must be evident.

Obstinate perseverance is indicated when the pastor or other church authority has expressly warned the offending party to cease committing the sin, but this warning is not heeded. If there is no advance warning before communion is denied, there is no way to be certain of obstinacy. The warning should include the express threat that communion will be refused to the manifest grave sinner in order to permit the sinner to avoid the shame of a public refusal of communion. The warning should be given to the sinner in the external forum, either orally or in writing, but it cannot be given if knowledge of the sin is gained from the internal forum (cc. 983–984). The confessor may admonish an obstinate penitent to refrain from communion, but the confessor may not himself refuse it unless he had knowledge of the sin from the external forum before it was confessed.

There is another serious difficulty in applying this canon in the case of persons who obstinately persevere in manifest grave sin. The state of one's conscience is a matter of the internal forum, yet this canon addresses ministers in the external forum. It is possible that a person may have repented of the sin and now may be in the state of grace, but this might not be evident in the external forum, e.g., in the case of the internal forum solution to an irregular marriage.[75] Since there is always some risk of injustice when this canon is ap-openness to continued experimentation, provided the Holy See was kept informed; see GCD 5.

[73] Canons 226, 793, 797, 798, 835, §4. See F. G. Morrisey, "The Rights of Parents in the Education of the Children," Stud Can 23 (1989) 429–444; P. E. Baillargeon, "The Rights and Duties of Parents in the Sanctification of Their Children," CLSAP 54 (1992) 55–71.

[74] For more on this issue see J. Provost, "The Reception of First Penance," J 47 (1987) 294–340; J. Huels, Disputed Questions in the Liturgy Today (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1988) 67–74.

[75] See FC 84 e.

plied apart from the evident cases of public excommunication or interdict, it is necessary that there be some urgent need that pertains to the common good, in particular, the need to preclude grave scandal on the part of the community that would arise from the public sinner's reception of communion.

The fact of actual scandal is, moreover, culturally relative. What causes scandal in one part of the world may not cause scandal elsewhere. In North America the faithful often are more scandalized by the Church's denial of sacraments and sacramentals than by the sin that occasions it, because it seems to them contrary to the mercy and forgiveness commanded by Christ. Thus, this canon should be applied to cases of obstinate perseverance in manifest grave sin only when the common good of the Church is truly being harmed due to grave scandal. It is not the minister's own scandal that must be precluded, but the scandal that exists or would likely arise within the community.

The prohibition of the Eucharist by a minister in one community does not require that the person also be barred elsewhere where the sin may be known only to a few. This canon is directed to individual ministers of communion who must interpret it in the situation of their own community. Thus, it may not be applied by the diocesan bishop or other competent authority in order to prevent a person from receiving communion from all ministers. This may be done only through a penal process, since the deprivation of the sacraments is a penalty. Penalties may be imposed only after due process of law has been observed (c. 221, §3).[76]

Obligation to Confess Serious Sins

Canon 916 — A person who is conscious of grave sin is not to celebrate Mass or receive the body of the Lord without previous sacramental confession unless there is a grave reason and there is no opportunity to confess; in this case the person is to remember the obligation to make an act of perfect contrition which includes the resolution of confessing as soon as possible.

This canon, a composite of canons 807 and 856 of the 1917 code, is based on Tridentine doctrine. Citing the scriptures (1 Cor 11:28–29), Trent confirmed the Church's teaching that one who is conscious of grave sins may not receive the Eucharist.[77] Eucharisticum mysterium 35 affirmed this discipline, adding that confessions should not be heard during the celebration of Mass. Canon 916 adds nothing new to past discipline in requiring those who are conscious, i.e., certain, of having committed a grave sin to return to the state of grace by sacramental confession or an act of perfect contrition when sacramental confession is not possible. Perfect contrition (contrition of charity) arises from a love by which God is loved above all else; such contrition remits venial sins and also obtains forgiveness of mortal sins if it includes the intention to confess as soon as possible.[78]

A grave reason for celebrating Mass before confessing is the need to celebrate Mass for the faithful. Grave reasons for going to communion without confessing include danger of death and serious embarrassment if communion is not taken. Lack of opportunity to confess includes absence of a confessor, inability to approach the confessor at a scheduled time for the sacrament, and the availability only of a confessor who is known personally and who cannot be approached without embarrassment.

Communion Twice a Day

Canon 917 — A person who has already received the Most Holy Eucharist can receive it a second time on the same day only within the eucharistic celebration in which the person participates, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 921, §2.

[76] See F.G. Morrisey, "Denial of Access to the Sacraments," CLSAP 52 (1990) 170–186.

[77] Sess. XIII, de euch., cap. 7, c. 11.

[78] CCC 1452.

In 1984 the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Canons of the Code of Canon Law issued an authentic interpretation on this canon to clarify that the word iterum as used here means "a second time," not "again and again" as often as one participates in the Eucharist.[79] Only as Viaticum, or in the case of the priest who has permission to trinate, may anyone receive communion a third time in one day. The purpose of this law is twofold: on the one hand, to promote active participation in the Eucharist including the full sacramental sharing in the Lord's body and blood; on the other hand, to prevent the abuse of receiving multiple communions out of superstition, ignorance, or misguided devotion.

The 1917 code (CIC 857) forbade the reception of communion more than once a day except in danger of death or to prevent impending irreverence. The law was mitigated repeatedly after Vatican II to allow more frequent opportunities to receive twice on the same day.[80] This canon greatly simplifies the postconciliar legislation by permitting the reception of communion twice in a day for any reason, provided the second reception is in the context of participation in the eucharistic celebration.

Communion outside Mass

Canon 918 — It is highly recommended that the faithful receive holy communion during the eucharistic celebration itself. It is to be administered outside the Mass, however, to those who request it for a just cause, with the liturgical rites being observed.

The 1917 code was rather liberal in its provision for communion outside Mass. In addition to communion for the sick and dying, any priest could give communion outside Mass in a church at the hours during which Mass could be celebrated and even at other times for a reasonable cause; it could also be given immediately before or after a private (low) Mass.[81]

Since the pontificate of Pope Pius XII, the Church's attitude toward communion outside Mass has become more restrictive.[82] Vatican II decreed that communion received during the eucharistic celebration is "the more complete form of participation in the Mass."[83] The 1967 instruction Eucharisticum mysterium said that it is highly recommended (valde commendatur) that the faithful receive communion during Mass. It also stated that it is necessary to accustom the faithful to receive communion during the Eucharist, and that there must be a just cause for distributing communion outside Mass.[84] The canon reflects this change in attitude, and it even more strongly (maxime commendatur) recommends that the faithful receive communion during the eucharistic celebration. Because the mind of the Church is that communion be given primarily during Mass, the requirement of a just cause for communion outside Mass should be strictly observed. Some examples of a just cause include the inability to participate in the eucharistic celebration due to illness or old age or the absence of a priest who can preside at Eucharist. Liturgical law requires pastors to see to it that the sick and aged be given every opportunity to receive the Eucharist frequently, especially during the Easter season.[85]

The liturgical rites to be observed in distributing communion outside Mass are contained in the Roman Ritual under the title, "Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass." The

[79] August 7, 1984, AAS 76 (1984) 746; Pamplona ComEng, 1293–1295.

[80] IO 60; Rite of Concelebration 15; SCRit, instr Tres abhinc annos 14, May 4, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 442–448, DOL 460; Eucharisticum mysterium 28, DOL 1257; Immensae caritatis, pt. 2, DOL 2082–2084.

[81] CIC 846; 867, §4.

[82] Ency Mediator Dei, November 20, 1947, AAS 39 (1947) 565.

[83] SC 55.

[84] Eucharisticum mysterium 31, 33a, DOL 1260, 1262. See also HCWE 13.

[85] RAnointing 46. Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum provides rites of communion outside Mass for the sick in ordinary circumstances. See also commentary on cc. 921–922.

ritual prescribes an introductory rite and a celebration of the word preceding the distribution of communion. Options are provided for a shorter reading of the word when the entire service of the word is pastorally unsuitable, such as when there are only one or two communicants. The eucharistic prayer may never be said in communion services outside Mass.[86] Special directives for communion services held on Sundays are given in the 1988 Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Presbyter.[87]

Communion may be given outside Mass on any day and at any hour, with several exceptions. On Holy Thursday and Good Friday the sacrament may be administered only during the Eucharist or the celebration of the Lord's passion, respectively; communion may be given to the sick at any time on these days. On Holy Saturday only Viaticum may be administered. In this way the ancient tradition of the single Eucharist of a community is maintained at least on the principal days of the church year.

Eucharistic Fast

Canon 919 — §1. A person who is to receive the Most Holy Eucharist is to abstain for at least one hour before holy communion from any food and drink, except for only water and medicine.

§2. A priest who celebrates the Most Holy Eucharist two or three times on the same day can take something before the second or third celebration even if there is less than one hour between them.

§3. The elderly, the infirm, and those who care for them can receive the Most Holy Eucharist even if they have eaten something within the preceding hour.

The custom of fasting before the Eucharist arose after the third century and was mandated by early councils. The Church considers fasting a means of spiritual preparation for the Eucharist and a way of showing reverence for the sacrament.

Paragraph one of the canon reflects the discipline of the Church that has been in force since 1964. The traditional total fast from midnight, prescribed in the 1917 code (CIC 808, 858), was reduced to a three-hour fast in 1957[88] and to a one-hour fast in 1964.[89] Already in 1953 Pius XII had granted permission to take water and medicine at any time before reception of communion.[90] The medicine may be in solid or liquid form, and it need not be prescribed by a physician.

Paul VI allowed residential bishops to permit priests who binate or trinate to take nourishment in liquid form before the celebration of the next Mass.[91] Paragraph two of this canon extends this to all priests even without the bishop's permission, and it also allows the taking of solid foods. Priests therefore need observe the eucharistic fast only for their first Mass of the day. The word "celebrates" in §2 should be understood also as including priests who concelebrate.

Paragraph three represents a change from the previous law which required a fast of about a quarter of an hour for the sick in hospitals or at home, for those who are confined to their homes because of old age, or for those who live in nursing homes. Those who care for the sick and aged and their families were bound to a fast of about fifteen minutes if they could not observe the one-hour fast without inconvenience.[92] The sick were able to take non-alcoholic drink at any time before communion.[93] According to paragraph three of the canon, those who are advanced in age or who suffer from any infirmity and those who care for the sick and aged are not bound by any fast. The terms "elderly" and "infirm" are subject to

[86] SCDW, instr Liturgicae instaurationes 6e, September 5, 1970, AAS 62 (1970) 692–704, DOL 524.

[87] For references and commentary, see c. 1248.

[88] Pius XII, mp Sacram communionem, March 19, 1957, AAS 49 (1957) 177; CLD 4, 286.

[89] Paul VI, decr, November 21, 1964, AAS 57 (1964) 186; CLD 6, 566; DOL 272.

[90] Apconst Christus Dominus, January 6, 1953, AAS 45 (1953) 15; CLD 4, 269.

[91] PM I, 3.

[92] Immensae caritatis, pt. 3, DOL 2085–2086.

[93] Sacram communionem 4.

broad interpretation. Certainly anyone too old or too infirm to go to church need not fast. Those who care for the sick or aged are exempted from the fast only when they are actually caring for the sick or aged at the time they receive communion, such as when communion is given in a home or an institution. This category of persons may also be broadly understood to include those who contribute in non-material ways to the care of the sick, such as visitors and family members who provide moral and emotional support.

By specifying that the fast is to be at least one hour, the legislator appears to be encouraging the faithful to fast for a longer period, if they desire. The one-hour fast is computed from the time of the completion of the consumption of food or drink until the reception of communion, not the onset of Mass. Prior to the 1983 code, dispensations from the eucharistic fast were reserved to the Apostolic See;[94] now the diocesan bishop may dispense.

Eucharistic Precept

Canon 920 — §1. After being initiated into the Most Holy Eucharist, each of the faithful is obliged to receive holy communion at least once a year.

§2. This precept must be fulfilled during the Easter season unless it is fulfilled for a just cause at another time during the year.

As a result of widespread neglect of the sacrament in the Middle Ages, various church councils from the sixth century onward enacted disciplinary laws obliging the faithful to receive the Eucharist, especially on the principal feasts. Lateran IV in 1215 established a general law for the Latin church requiring the reception of communion at least once a year at Easter by those who had attained the age of discretion, unless for some reasonable cause one's priest advised against it for a time.[95] This law, confirmed by Trent,[96] is basically the same as that incorporated into the 1917 code (CIC 859, §1). The 1983 code retains the annual precept but with some changes.

One change is greater latitude in the time permitted for the fulfillment of the eucharistic precept. The coetus which prepared the original draft of this canon understood Easter time as the period from Palm (Passion) Sunday to Pentecost Sunday.[97] The dioceses of the United States have an indult which allows the Easter duty to be satisfied from the First Sunday of Lent to Trinity Sunday.[98] The satisfaction of the eucharistic precept outside this period requires a just cause, such as illness, but it must be satisfied within the space of one year. The year is reckoned from the previous communion.

Another change from the former law is the elimination of the exception which allowed the sacerdos proprius, understood as one's pastor or confessor, to permit an individual to postpone satisfaction of the eucharistic precept for a reasonable cause. The annual precept is now absolute, barring excusing causes such as physical or moral impossibility.

Under the former law, all who had attained the use of reason were bound by the eucharistic precept. The revised law specifies that all the faithful who have been initiated into the Eucharist (i.e., those who have made their first communion) are bound. Unlike the 1917 code (CIC 859, §3), the 1983 code does not require that the pastor of one's parish be notified when the eucharistic precept is fulfilled outside one's own parish.

Also dropped from the present law are canons 860 and 861 of the first code. The former canon specified the duty of those who have the care of children to see that they fulfill the paschal precept, while the latter stated that a sacrilegious communion did not satisfy the precept.

Viaticum

Canon 921 — §1. The Christian faithful who are in danger of death from any cause are to be nourished by holy communion in the form of Viaticum.

[94] EM IX, 20.
[95] Cap. 21.
[96] Sess. XIII, de euch., c. 9.
[97] Comm 13 (1981) 417–418.
[98] Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, n. 257.

§2. Even if they have been nourished by holy communion on the same day, however, those in danger of death are strongly urged to receive communion again.

§3. While the danger of death lasts, it is recommended that holy communion be administered often, but on separate days.

Canon 922 — Holy Viaticum for the sick is not to be delayed too long; those who have the care of souls are to be zealous and vigilant that the sick are nourished by Viaticum while fully conscious.

Viaticum is the last sacrament of Christian life, holy communion given to those at or near the time of death. Vatican II called for the revision of the rite of Viaticum and for a new continuous rite of penance, anointing, and Viaticum.[99] This was implemented with the 1972 Rite of Anointing of the Sick and the 1973 Rite of Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass. The liturgical law urges that Viaticum be given during Mass when possible and that it be given under both species of bread and wine. If the Eucharist is not celebrated, the Precious Blood is brought to the dying person in a sealed vessel and then poured into a chalice for administration.[100] The dying who are unable to receive under the form of bread may receive under the form of wine alone (c. 925).

The 1917 code (CIC 864) considered the reception of Viaticum by the faithful in danger of death as a "precept" to which they were bound by law. The revised code uses a milder form of command to express this duty, but the strict legal obligation still exists in the liturgical law which states that "all the baptized who can receive communion are bound by obligation to receive viaticum" in danger of death.[101] Baptized non-Catholics may, but are not obliged to, receive Viaticum from a Catholic minister.[102] Children in danger of death who are able to distinguish the body of Christ from ordinary food and receive it reverently may, but are not obliged to, receive Viaticum (c. 913, §2).

The code does not define "danger of death" but, given the Church's desire that Viaticum be the final sacrament of passage from death to eternal life, a strict interpretation is in order. Viaticum should be received only by those who are in some real danger of dying, whether from intrinsic causes such as a grave illness or extrinsic sources such as the execution of a criminal. In doubt about the degree of danger, Viaticum may be given.

Viaticum should be administered as soon as possible after the faithful are in danger of death, even if they have already received communion once or twice that day. Terminally or seriously ill persons, although not in immediate danger of death, should not postpone its reception too long lest they lose consciousness or die. Canon 921, §3 recommends that "holy communion" be given each day while the danger lasts, whereas canon 864, §3 of the 1917 code said it was fitting to give "holy Viaticum" in these same circumstances. Thus, Viaticum is to be administered only once to a dying person.

Eucharist in Other Churches Sui Iuris

Canon 923 — The Christian faithful can participate in the eucharistic sacrifice and receive holy communion in any Catholic rite, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 844.

The reference to "any Catholic rite" means any Catholic church sui iuris. This canon is substantially the same as canon 866 of the 1917 code. The chief difference was that according to the 1917 code communion could be received "for reasons of piety" in another Catholic rite, but the law urged that the paschal precept be satisfied and Vi-

[99] SC 74.

[100] RAnointing 26, 95–96; NCCB, Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (1983) 26, 181.

[101] RAnointing 27; Pastoral Care of the Sick 237; author's trans.

[102] See c. 844, §§ 3–4. The liturgical law binding all baptized Christians to receive Viaticum must be considered as derogated in view of cc. 11 and 2.

aticum received in one's own rite. Now there are no qualifications concerning the participation in and reception of the Eucharist in other Catholic churches sui iuris. However, the faithful may not receive the Eucharist of a church or ecclesial community which is not in full communion with the Catholic Church except for the case mentioned in canon 844, §2.

Article 3: The Rites and Ceremonies of the Eucharistic Celebration [cc. 924–930]

The seven canons of this article treat the following: the matter of the Eucharist (c. 924), communion under one or both kinds (c. 925), the requirement of unleavened bread (c. 926), serious abuses (c. 927), the language of the Eucharist (c. 928), vestments (c. 929), and aged and infirm celebrants (c. 930).

Matter of the Eucharist

Canon 924 — §1. The most holy eucharistic sacrifice must be offered with bread and with wine in which a little water must be mixed.

§2. The bread must be only wheat and recently made so that there is no danger of spoiling.

§3. The wine must be natural from the fruit of the vine and not spoiled.

In keeping with the Last Supper narratives, the Church has always regarded bread and wine as the only matter essential for the eucharistic meal and sacrifice. A small quantity of water (modica aqua) is to be added to the wine by the deacon or priest at the preparation of the gifts. Cyprian of Carthage saw in this ritual mixing of water and wine a sign of the unity between Christ and his people, a tradition also reflected at the Council of Trent.[103]

In a 1929 instruction, the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments taught that bread made of any substance other than wheat is invalid matter, as is bread to which has been added such a great quantity of another substance that it can no longer be considered wheat bread in the common estimation. The requirements that the bread be recently made and not corrupt are for liceity; however, if the bread is so corrupt that it is no longer considered bread in the common estimation, it is invalid matter.[104] The General Instruction of the Roman Missal 284 stipulates that the bread for the Eucharist should have the appearance of real food and be made in such a way that the priest is able to break it into parts and distribute them to at least some of the faithful. Subsequent instructions from the Apostolic See have attempted to clarify the meaning of this law by indicating that the "appearance" of bread applies to its color, taste, and thickness rather than to its shape.[105]

Persons who suffer from celiac disease may be given permission from the ordinary to receive communion in the form of bread which is low in gluten content. In fact, so called "gluten-free" wafers have been found by scientists to contain trace amounts of gliadin and would therefore be valid matter.[106] Bread without any gluten is invalid matter.[107]

Wine not made from grapes is invalid matter for the Eucharist, as is wine to which water has been added in greater or equal quantity.[108] The General Instruction of the Roman Missal 284 says the wine should be natural and pure, i.e., not mixed with any foreign substance. Wine may be [103] Epistula 63 ad Caecilianum 13, PL 4:395–396; Trent, sess. XXII, Decr. de Missa. Trent also mentioned that it was symbolic of the blood and water that came from Christ's side while on the cross.

[104] Dominus Salvator noster I, March 26, 1929, AAS 21 (1929) 632, CLD 1, 353; Missale Romanum of Pius V, De defectibus III.

[105] SCDW, instr Liturgicae instaurationes 5, September 5, 1970, AAS 62 (1970) 692–704, DOL 523; IDon 8.

[106] W. H. Woestman, Sacraments: Initiation, Penance, Anointing of the Sick (Ottawa: Saint Paul University, 1996) 161.

[107] CDF, letter, June 19, 1995, Origins 25 (1995) 191–192; BCLN 31 (1995) 217–218.

[108] Dominus Salvator noster I.

corrupt in several ways: that which has totally turned to vinegar is invalid matter; that which has partially become vinegar, or contains unapproved additives or foreign matter, or which loses most of its alcohol, is used illicitly. Over the course of time, the Apostolic See has established specific regulations governing the wine-making process, alcoholic content, and use of additives.[109]

Alcoholic Priests

When concelebrating, priests recovering from alcoholism who are unable to consume wine may receive communion by intinction or they may receive under the species of the bread alone; this is a general faculty for which no specific permission is needed. The local ordinary may permit those who celebrate alone to receive by intinction, leaving it to an assistant to consume the consecrated wine.[110]

Canonists and theologians have commonly held that must (mustum), or the unfermented juice of ripe grapes, is valid matter for the Eucharist but is gravely illicit except in necessity.[111] With the permission of their ordinary after presentation of a medical certificate, priests recovering from alcoholism or other conditions which prevent the ingestion of even the smallest quantity of alcohol may consecrate grape juice instead of wine for themselves. A separate cup of wine is to be consecrated for others present whenever communion is given under both kinds. As for deacons and lay persons, permission to receive consecrated grape juice can be given only by the Apostolic See in very rare instances, as when individuals are medically unable to consume either wine or bread.[112]

[109] E. Regatillo, Ius sacramentarium, 3rd ed. (Santander: Sal Terrae, 1960) 110–112. Hereafter cited as Regatillo.

[110] SCDF, letter, September 12, 1983, CLD 11, 208–209.

[111] The chief authorities for this view are Pope Julius I, C. 7, D. II, de cons., and Thomas Aquinas, STh III, q. 74, art. V ad 3.

[112] CDF, letter, May 18, 1995, N 31 (1995) 608–610; BCLN 31 (1995) 218, n. II E.

Communion under One or Both Kinds

Canon 925 — Holy communion is to be given under the form of bread alone, or under both species according to the norm of the liturgical laws, or even under the form of wine alone in a case of necessity.

In contrast to the 1917 code (CIC 852) which prescribed that communion be given only in the form of bread, this canon reflects the restored practice of communion under both kinds and the revised liturgical law permitting communion under the form of wine alone in cases of need. Communion under the species of the bread is given on the tongue or, where permitted by the conference of bishops, in the hand.[113]

Communion under Both Kinds

Throughout the history of the Church, communion under both kinds was always the ideal in keeping with the Lord's Supper, but the Church also permitted communion under one kind for "just causes and reasons."[114] For the first twelve centuries, communion under both kinds was the general practice of the Church. Communion under one kind was given in special cases, such as to the sick, and it could even be given under the form of wine alone when the communicant was unable to consume bread. By at least the thirteenth century, the custom of administering only the eucharistic bread had become dominant in the West, and the Council of Constance in 1415 decreed that this custom should be considered as law.[115] With few exceptions, the distribution of communion under the form of bread alone remained the practice of the Latin church until the liturgical renewal following Vatican II. In Sacrosanctum Concilium 55 b, the council took the first step toward a return to the Church's earlier practice of giving communion under both kinds to all communicants. The 1965 Rite of Communion under Both Kinds permitted the practice in specified cases with the consent of the bishop, and this and later developments were included in the 1970 Roman Missal.

[113] HCWE 21.

[114] Trent, sess. XXI. See J. Huels, "Trent and the Chalice: Forerunner of Vatican II?" W 56 (1982) 386–400.

[115] Sess. XIII.

Communion under both kinds is permitted in accord with the liturgical laws which chiefly appear in the General Instruction of the Roman Missal 240–252. Communion under both kinds is said more fully to express the sign of the eucharistic meal; of the new and eternal covenant ratified by the blood of the Lord; and of the relationship between the eucharistic banquet and the eschatological banquet.[116] The clear implication is that communion under both kinds is the ideal, or normative, practice.

The General Instruction of the Roman Missal 242 enumerates the cases for which ordinaries may permit communion under both kinds, adding that episcopal conferences may establish guidelines for the ordinaries to concede the faculty on other occasions as well. The ordinaries are to determine the extent of the practice within their respective jurisdictions, namely, local ordinaries for their territories and pontifical right major superiors of clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life for their subjects. In the United States the NCCB has extended the list of cases to all Masses, including those on Sundays and holy days, with the exception of several situations involving unprepared or excessively large congregations, as at a Mass in a stadium, when communion from the cup could not be given in an orderly and reverent manner.[117]

Wine Alone

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, the Holy Office granted indults for the reception of communion under the form of wine alone on behalf of persons who were medically unable to consume the bread; permission was even granted to take the Precious Blood through a stomach tube.[118] Eucharisticum mysterium 41 derogated from canon 852 of the 1917 code by allowing communion to be given under the form of wine alone to those who are unable to receive communion under the form of bread in case of need and in the judgment of the bishop. The instruction directed the priest to celebrate the Eucharist in the house of the sick person or to bring the Blood of the Lord to the sick person in a sealed vessel. Since 1972 the judgment of the bishop is not required.[119]

The canon requires that there be a case of need for administering communion under the form of wine alone. This is demonstrated whenever a person is physically or psychologically unable—whether permanently or temporarily—to consume the eucharistic bread.

Unleavened Bread

Canon 926 — According to the ancient tradition of the Latin Church, the priest is to use unleavened bread in the eucharistic celebration whenever he offers it.

The requirement of unleavened bread is for liceity.[120] In the early centuries, both Eastern and Western churches used leavened bread for the Eucharist, but in the eighth and ninth centuries the use of unleavened bread became the general custom in the West. In keeping with the limited scope of the code, the canon properly addresses only the practice of the Latin church, unlike the 1917 code (CIC 816) which alluded to the Eastern usage.

[116] GIRM 240.

[117] This Holy and Living Sacrifice: Directory for the Celebration and Reception of Communion under Both Kinds 22 (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1985); text also in The Liturgy Documents: A Parish Resource, 3rd ed. (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1991) 249–268.

[118] CLD 5, 434; 6, 562–565.

[119] RAnointing 95.

[120] Council of Florence, Decree for the Greeks, Ench 1303; Pius X, apconst Tradita ab antiquis II, September 14, 1912, AAS 4 (1912) 614–616.

Serious Abuses

Canon 927 — It is absolutely forbidden, even in extreme urgent necessity, to consecrate one matter without the other or even both outside the eucharistic celebration.

Theological opinion has not been in agreement on whether the consecration of only one of the elements suffices for the validity of the Mass.[121] Neither the 1917 code (CIC 817) nor the revised code resolves the issue of validity, but instead both use the authority of the Church to forbid absolutely the consecration of only one element in or outside of Mass, or the consecration of even both elements apart from the eucharistic celebration. The phrase "it is absolutely forbidden" (nefas est) most strongly conveys the Church's desire to maintain the integrity of the eucharistic celebration and the two signs of bread and wine. Excluded are even cases of extreme necessity, such as lack of time to celebrate an entire Eucharist in the case of a person in danger of death or lack of bread or wine due to war or persecution.

Language of Eucharist

Canon 928 — The eucharistic celebration is to be carried out in the Latin language or in another language provided that the liturgical texts have been legitimately approved.

Latin is the official common language of the Latin church sui iuris, the language in which all the official liturgical books are first published. However, the use of the vernacular usually allows for greater participation in the liturgy and a fuller appreciation of it. Although the vernacular is generally pastorally preferable, the Eucharist may be celebrated in Latin provided the revised texts are employed,[122] and in special cases it may even be genuinely advantageous to do so.[123] Local ordinaries are encouraged by the Apostolic See to provide Masses in Latin in at least some churches, especially in areas where groups of people speak different languages.[124] The use of music with Latin texts, particularly Gregorian chant, is often suitable even in Masses in the vernacular.[125] The so-called "Tridentine rite" Mass according to the 1962 edition of the Missale Romanum may be used only with the permission of the diocesan bishop or the Pontifical Commission Ecclesia Dei.[126]

It is also possible to celebrate the Eucharist using approved texts of two or more vernacular languages that are spoken by significant numbers of people in the assembly.[127] Vernacular texts are legitimately approved according to the norm of canon 838, §§ 2–3. Sign language may be used in Masses at which deaf persons are present.[128]

Vestments

Canon 929 — In celebrating and administering the Eucharist, priests and deacons are to wear the sacred vestments prescribed by the rubrics.

The rubrics governing Mass vestments are chiefly found in the General Instruction of the Roman Missal 297–310. The principal changes

[121] Regatillo, 178–179.

[122] See CDW, "Declaration on Eucharistic Prayers and Liturgical Experimentation," March 21, 1988, BCLN 24 (1988) 110–111.

[123] SCRit, instr Musicam sacram 48, March 5, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 314, DOL 4169; John Paul II, letter Dominicae cenae 10, February 24, 1980, N 16 (1980) 143, Origins 9 (1980) 661.

[124] SCDW, notification, June 14, 1971, AAS 63 (1971) 714, DOL 216.

[125] SC 54; Musicam sacram 51, DOL 4172.

[126] John Paul II, mp Ecclesia Dei, March 27, 1988, AAS 80 (1988) 1495–1498, Origins 18 (1988) 149; Pontifical Commission Ecclesia Dei, letter, Origins 21 (1991) 144–145.

[127] Instituto de Liturgia Hispana and the Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions, "Guidelines for Multilingual Masses," BCLN 22 (1986) 25–28. See also M. R. Francis, Liturgy in a Multicultural Community (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1991).

[128] Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, reply, December 10, 1965, DOL 274.

from past liturgical law are the elimination of the maniple and the optional use of amice and cincture when the design of the alb does not functionally require them. A cassock or habit need not be worn under the alb.

Conferences of bishops may determine adaptations regarding the material and form of vestments.[129] The NCCB allows both natural and artificial fabrics for sacred vesture provided that they are suitable for liturgical use, subject to the further judgment of the local ordinary in doubtful cases.[130] The Apostolic See has approved the use of the chasuble-alb at concelebrations, Masses for special groups, celebrations outside a sacred place, and similar occasions in several countries, including the United States and Canada. The stole is worn over the chasuble-alb and should be the color appropriate to the Mass being celebrated.[131]

When communion is given in a church or oratory, the appropriate vesture for the ordinary ministers of communion is alb and stole, or a surplice and stole over a cassock or habit. Special ministers should wear whatever is customary in the region or whatever has been approved by the ordinary. For communion outside a church, the vesture of the ministers should be appropriate and in accord with local circumstances.[132]

Aged and Infirm Celebrants

Canon 930 — §1. If an infirm or elderly priest is unable to stand, he can celebrate the eucharistic sacrifice while seated, but not before the people except with the permission of the local ordinary; the liturgical laws are to be observed.

§2. A blind or otherwise infirm priest licitly celebrates the eucharistic sacrifice by using any approved text of the Mass with the assistance, if needed, of another priest, deacon, or even a properly instructed lay person.

Paragraph one provides for priests who by reason of age or illness are unable to stand while presiding at Eucharist. The incapacitating illness may be of any nature or origin, either temporary or permanent. The intent of paragraph two is to provide for celebrants who are blind or who have disorders which would make it difficult to follow diverse Mass texts, such as a priest who is disoriented as a result of illness or old age. The prior law required the permission of the priest's bishop or general superior before making use of provisions similar to those which this canon grants outright to the priests in question.[133]

Article 4: The Time and Place of the Celebration of the Eucharist [cc. 931–933]

The three canons of this article treat the proper times for the Eucharist (c. 931), the place of celebration (c. 932), and Mass in another Christian church (c. 933).

Proper Times for the Eucharist

Canon 931 — The celebration and distribution of the Eucharist can be done at any day and hour except those which the liturgical norms exclude.

The discipline on the proper time for the celebration of the Eucharist and the distribution of communion is much simpler in canon 931 than it was in the former code (cc. 820, 821, 867). The Eucharist may be celebrated and communion may be distributed at any hour with several exceptions. The anticipated Mass of Sunday and holy days of obligation may be celebrated only in the evening (c. 1248, §1), i.e., not earlier than 4:00 P.M. on Saturday or the day before the holy day.[134]

The other exceptions for the time of celebration and the distribution of the Eucharist are for

[129] SC 128; GIRM 304, 308.

[130] "Appendix to the GIRM for the Dioceses of the U.S.A.," 305.

[131] CLD 8, 528; Woestman, Sacraments, 176–177.

[132] HCWE 20.

[133] PM I, 5, 6, 10; Secretary of State, rescript Cum admotae I, 2, 3, 5, November 6, 1964, AAS 59 (1967) 374–375; CLD 6, 147; DOL 940, 941, 943.

[134] See commentary on c. 1248.

the days of the Easter triduum. On Holy Thursday the Mass of the Lord's Supper is celebrated in the evening at a convenient hour. In cases of true necessity the local ordinary may permit an earlier Mass but only for those who find it impossible to participate in the evening Mass. Where pastoral reasons require it, the local ordinary may also permit a second evening Mass. Holy communion may be given to the faithful only during Mass, but it may be taken to the sick at any time of the day. According to the Church's ancient tradition, the sacraments are not celebrated on Good Friday or Holy Saturday. Holy communion may be given to the faithful only at the celebration of the Lord's passion on Good Friday, but it can be brought at any time to the sick. On Holy Saturday communion may be given only as Viaticum. The liturgy of the Easter Vigil takes place at night and should not begin before dark on Saturday and should end before sunrise on Sunday.[135]

Canon 931 represents little change from the previous discipline since canons 821 and 867 of the 1917 code had already been derogated from or mitigated by Pius XII in 1953 and 1957, and later by Paul VI.[136]

Place of Celebration

Canon 932 — §1. The eucharistic celebration is to be carried out in a sacred place unless in a particular case necessity requires otherwise; in such a case the celebration must be done in a decent place.

§2. The eucharistic sacrifice must be carried out on a dedicated or blessed altar; outside a sacred place a suitable table can be used, always with a cloth and a corporal.

The eucharistic celebration should take place in a church, oratory, or other sacred place that has been appointed for divine worship by dedication or blessing in accord with canons 1205–1209. The altar may be fixed or movable and should be dedicated or blessed in accord with canon 1237. In particular cases of need, the Eucharist may be celebrated in some other place suitable for celebrating the liturgy with the active participation of the people.[137] Particular cases are not only single occasions but also situations in which an individual priest must regularly celebrate outside a sacred place by reason of necessity. Cases of need include sickness, old age, distance from a church, and, in general, whenever there is some pastoral advantage to celebrating outside a sacred place, such as at occasional Masses for children and other particular groups.[138] Canon 932 of the 1917 code had required the permission of the ordinary to celebrate the Eucharist outside a sacred place. The present law leaves this to the judgment of the individual priest.

The altar used for the Eucharist in sacred places is to be dedicated or blessed.[139] At Masses outside a sacred place any suitable table may be used instead of an altar.[140]

Mass in Another Christian Church

Canon 933 — For a just cause and with the express permission of the local ordinary, a priest is permitted to celebrate the Eucharist in the place of worship of some Church or ecclesial community which does not have full communion with the Catholic Church so long as there is no scandal.

The local ordinary is the final judge of whether there may be scandal but, in many areas, especially where non-Catholic Christians are numerous, the possibility of scandal is remote. A just cause is required for this permission, i.e., any good reason, [135] See the rubrics of the Roman Missal for the triduum.

[136] Christus Dominus VI, CLD 4, 269; Sacram communionem 1, CLD 4, 286; PM I, 4; Cum admotae I, 1, DOL 939.

[137] GIRM 253.

[138] Directory for Children's Masses 25, DOL 2158; SCDW, instr Actio pastoralis 3, May 15, 1969, AAS 61 (1969) 806–811, DOL 2124; Directory 85, DOL 2655. Masses for special groups outside a sacred place are "abnormal" and should be done rarely. See A. Kavanaugh, Elements of Rite (New York: Pueblo, 1982) 13–14, 67–68.

[139] See commentary on c. 1237.

[140] GIRM 260.

not just a case of necessity. Since the phrase, "some Church or ecclesial community which does not have full communion with the Catholic Church," refers only to separated Christian churches, canon 933 does not apply to non-Christian churches. Hence, there is no strict obligation to obtain the local ordinary's permission to celebrate in such places, especially in interdenominational chapels at hospitals, universities, military bases, and other places of worship where the possibility of scandal is slight. The diocesan bishop may also permit non-Catholic Christians to use a Catholic church or other building if they lack a place of their own.[141]

Canon 933 alters the previous discipline in the following ways: (1) the prohibition against celebrating Mass in the churches of heretics or schismatics is abrogated;[142] (2) permission of the diocesan bishop is no longer required to celebrate the Eucharist at sea and on rivers;[143] (3) the specific prohibition against celebrating Mass in a bedroom has been removed.[144]

CHAPTER II
THE RESERVATION AND VENERATION OF THE MOST HOLY EUCHARIST
[cc. 934–944]

The custom of reserving the Eucharist originated in the early church primarily to provide for the administration of Viaticum. Other purposes for reservation included providing communion to those absent from the assembly, particularly the sick, and for the Liturgy of the Presanctified during Lent. The place of reservation varied according to period, locale, and circumstances; it included private houses, the dwellings of eremitical religious, and the sacristy or a similar place in a church. It was also the custom of many centuries for priests and monks to carry the Eucharist with them on journeys. By the end of the ninth century, regulations in some areas directed that the Eucharist be reserved within the church itself in proximity to the altar; this had become the rule in many places by the twelfth century. The practice of burning a continuous light, or sanctuary lamp, near the reserved Eucharist began toward the end of the twelfth century and became widespread by the sixteenth. The use of a tabernacle on the altar did not become a general practice in the Western church until the post-Tridentine period.[145]

The Council of Trent upheld the legitimacy of reserving the Eucharist for administration to the sick, and it also defended the adoration of the eucharistic species in general and the practice of eucharistic processions in particular.[146] Certain customs regarding the veneration of the Eucharist outside Mass had arisen during the late Middle Ages. Eucharistic processions—particularly on the feast of Corpus Christi—and visits to the Blessed Sacrament were derived from practices originating in the eleventh century. The first reliable evidence for exposition and benediction comes from the fourteenth century. It was only in the seventeenth and subsequent centuries that benediction became prevalent.[147]

In accordance with Eucharisticum mysterium 49–67, the revised Roman Ritual provides several forms of worship of the Eucharist outside Mass: (1) exposition of the Blessed Sacrament for a lengthy period or a brief period of adoration by religious communities; (2) a rite of eucharistic exposition and benediction; (3) eucharistic processions; it also has a section on eucharistic congresses. The canons of this chapter are based chiefly on the norms of this and of other parts of the section of the Roman Ritual entitled, "Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass"; the General Instruction of the Roman Missal is also a key source.

[141] Ecum Dir 137.

[142] CIC 823, §1.

[143] PM I, 8.

[144] CIC 822, §4; PM I, 7; Cum admotae I, 4, DOL 942; Actio pastoralis 4, DOL 2125.

[145] See A. King, Eucharistic Reservation in the Western Church (New York: Sheed and Ward, 1965).

[146] Sess. XIII, cap. 6, c. 7; cap. 5, c. 6.

[147] See N. Mitchell, Cult and Controversy: The Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass (New York: Pueblo, 1982).

Several principles specifically on eucharistic devotions from Eucharisticum mysterium provide the doctrinal foundation for the liturgical law and the canons of this chapter of the code. The chief principles are:

(1) The celebration of the eucharistic sacrifice is the origin and consummation of eucharistic worship outside it.

(2) The Eucharist is no less an object of adoration because it was instituted by Christ to be eaten.

(3) The primary and original purpose for reserving the Eucharist is the administration of Viaticum; the secondary reasons are the giving of communion and the adoration of the sacrament.

(4) The eucharistic presence of Christ is the real presence par excellence, but Christ is also present in the assembly of the faithful, in the word proclaimed, and in the person of the minister.

(5) Prayer before Christ the Lord sacramentally present, no less than the reception of the sacrament, should move the faithful to lead lives of witness and service in human society.[148]

The seven canons of this chapter treat obligatory and optional reservation of the blessed sacrament (c. 934), personal retention of the Eucharist (c. 935), religious and pious houses (c. 936), accessibility to churches (c. 937), the tabernacle (c. 938), the quantity and renewal of hosts and the vessels for reservation (c. 939), the sanctuary lamp (c. 940), exposition of the blessed sacrament (c. 941), lengthy exposition (c. 942), ministers of exposition and benediction (c. 943), and eucharistic processions (c. 944).

[148] Eucharisticum mysterium 3e, 3f, 49, 55, 13, DOL 1232e, f, 1278, 1284, 1242; HCWE 2, 3, 5, 6, 81.

Obligatory and Optional Reservation

Canon 934 — §1. The Most Holy Eucharist:

1° must be reserved in the cathedral church or its equivalent, in every parish church, and in a church or oratory connected to the house of a religious institute or society of apostolic life;

2° can be reserved in the chapel of the bishop and, with the permission of the local ordinary, in other churches, oratories, and chapels.

§2. In sacred places where the Most Holy Eucharist is reserved, there must always be someone responsible for it and, insofar as possible, a priest is to celebrate Mass there at least twice a month.

This canon specifies those sacred places in which the Eucharist must be reserved and those in which it may be reserved, and it establishes the conditions for eucharistic reservation. The first condition is that there be someone who has charge of the place where the Eucharist is reserved. This person need not have any ecclesiastical office or be a cleric, since the chief purpose of this law is to prevent the desecration of the blessed sacrament. The second condition is that a priest celebrate Mass in that place at least twice a month, insofar as possible. This ensures the frequent renewal of the consecrated hosts in accord with canon 939 and, more important, it reinforces the primacy of the eucharistic action and its intimate connection to the sacrament reserved. Although the phrase "insofar as possible" admits of exceptions, there still should be provision for the regular celebration of Mass even if it cannot always be done twice a month. Canon 1265, §1 of the former code required that Mass be celebrated at least once a week as a condition for reservation.

When the two conditions of paragraph two are met, the law mandates eucharistic reservation in the sacred places specified in paragraph one, section one, all of them places where there are active communities of the faithful and where there could be need for communion for the sick and dying.[149] The Eucharist may optionally be reserved, with permission of the local ordinary, in the sacred places mentioned in paragraph one, section two, also observing the conditions of paragraph two. The Eucharist may not be reserved outside a sacred place, i.e., outside a church, oratory, or private chapel that has been lawfully established by decree of the competent ordinary.[150] This applies also to small communities in informal houses of religious institutes and other pious houses which lack a proper oratory for eucharistic celebration but which have a small room for prayer and meditation. Such a space, unconnected to a sacred place, is unsuitable for eucharistic reservation because the reserved sacrament is severed from its ecclesial and liturgical context.

Personal Retention of the Eucharist

Canon 935 — No one is permitted to keep the Eucharist on one's person or to carry it around, unless pastoral necessity urges it and the prescripts of the diocesan bishop are observed.

The retention of the Eucharist by private persons was common in the early church, especially in times of persecution, but by the fifth or sixth centuries the practice had died out and was forbidden in places. In contrast to canon 1265, §3 of the 1917 code, which absolutely prohibited the personal retention of the Eucharist and the carrying of it on a trip, this canon allows some flexibility. Normally the blessed sacrament may not be kept in one's private possession, either on one's person or in a fixed place, except when in transit to bring communion to someone. However, there may be times when it is necessary for a priest, deacon, or other eucharistic minister to keep the sacrament in the home or other place outside the church, e.g., when the minister lives at a great distance from the church and needs access to the Eucharist for visits to the sick and Viaticum for the dying. In such cases of urgent pastoral need, the diocesan bishop may grant permission to reserve the Eucharist temporarily or as long as the urgent need remains. The bishop may also issue prescripts regulating the renewal of hosts, the tabernacle, and similar matters.

Religious and Pious Houses

Canon 936 — In the house of a religious institute or some other pious house, the Most Holy Eucharist is to be reserved only in the church or principal oratory attached to the house. For a just cause, however, the ordinary can also permit it to be reserved in another oratory of the same house.

The purpose of this canon is to prevent the duplication of places for eucharistic reservation in the same house. There should be only one focus for Christ's eucharistic presence in each religious house, seminary, etc.; duplicate reservation distorts the symbolic potential of Christ's eucharistic presence and diminishes its power. Duplicate reservation also suggests that the reserved Eucharist is a commodity that can be multiplied by the community for its own convenience, rather than the divine gratuitous gift that it is.

The Eucharist should be reserved only in the principal church or oratory attached to the house, namely, the church or oratory at which the Eucharist is celebrated, or in a special blessed sacrament chapel. If the members of the house worship in an oratory separate from the church or oratory attended by the faithful, the Eucharist may be reserved in each. If there is more than one distinct community under the same roof, there may be reservation in the oratory of each community.[151] In all other cases permission of the ordinary and a just cause are required for reserving the Eucharist in a second oratory of the same house. An example of such a cause would be a separate oratory in the infirmary for sick and aged religious.

[149] See also cc. 608, 1214, 1223, and 389.

[150] See the commentary on cc. 1214–1229.

[151] CodCom, interpretation, June 3, 1918, AAS 10 (1918) 346; CLD 1, 53.

Accessibility to Churches

Canon 937 — Unless there is a grave reason to the contrary, the church in which the Most Holy Eucharist is reserved is to be open to the faithful for at least some hours every day so that they can pray before the Most Blessed Sacrament.

This canon refers only to churches in the strict sense of canon 1214, not to oratories and other sacred places. In contrast to canon 1266 of the 1917 code, this canon, for a grave reason, allows exceptions to the rule that churches which reserve the Eucharist should be open to the faithful for at least some hours each day.[152] In some areas it is necessary to lock the church in order to prevent vandalism and burglary. This is a sufficiently grave reason to lock the church when it is not possible to arrange for parishioners or others to watch the church during the hours when it is open. "Some hours" means more than one hour.

The Tabernacle

Canon 938 — §1. The Most Holy Eucharist is to be reserved habitually in only one tabernacle of a church or oratory.

§2. The tabernacle in which the Most Holy Eucharist is reserved is to be situated in some part of the church or oratory which is distinguished, conspicuous, beautifully decorated, and suitable for prayer.

§3. The tabernacle in which the Most Holy Eucharist is reserved habitually is to be immovable, made of solid and opaque material, and locked in such a way that the danger of profanation is avoided as much as possible.

§4. For a grave cause, it is permitted to reserve the Most Holy Eucharist in some other fitting and more secure place, especially at night.

§5. The person responsible for the church or oratory is to take care that the key of the tabernacle in which the Most Holy Eucharist is reserved is safeguarded most diligently.

The canon regulates the place, construction, and custody of the tabernacle, somewhat simplifying canons 1268–1269 of the 1917 code. The norms largely repeat some of the liturgical laws on this matter found in the General Instruction of the Roman Missal 276–277 and the Rite of Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass 6, 9, and 10.

The Eucharist may be reserved in only one place in the church or oratory of each parish, religious house, or other sacred place approved for reservation.[153] If a blessed sacrament chapel is connected to the church, the Eucharist may be reserved only there and not also in the body of the church. Nor may it be reserved in another building of the parish, unless it be another sacred place at some distance from the main church.

Paragraph two must be read in conjunction with the liturgical laws which strongly recommend a separate blessed sacrament chapel as the most fitting place for eucharistic reservation.[154] If it is not possible to have a separate chapel for reservation, the Eucharist may be reserved in the sacred place where Mass is celebrated. Traditional options for placement of the tabernacle include inside a wall niche, on a pillar, or in a eucharistic tower.[155] In 1983 the Holy See eliminated from the Roman Ritual any mention of an altar as a possible place for eucharistic reservation.[156] Since 1977 it has been a requirement that new churches that are built have only one altar,[157] and the blessed sacrament is not to be reserved on the altar of celebration in newer churches.[158] Older

[152] See also Eucharisticum mysterium 51, DOL 1280.

[153] See the commentary at c. 936 for reasons for this law.

[154] GIRM 276, HCWE 9.

[155] BCL, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1978) 80.

[156] See Emendations in the Liturgical Books Following upon the New Code of Canon Law (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1984) 10.

[157] RDCA IV, 7.

[158] Cf. CB 49.

churches may retain the custom of reserving the Eucharist on a side altar or the old main altar, especially if this is necessary to preserve the architectural and artistic integrity of the old altar and its tabernacle.[159]

Paragraph three treats the design of the tabernacle. Wood, marble, and metal are traditionally acceptable materials for the construction of tabernacles, but the canon says that any solid and opaque material can be used. Like this canon, liturgical law leaves much leeway for determining the shape, size, and ornamentation of the tabernacle. Paragraphs four and five treat the custody of the tabernacle. A grave cause for removing the Eucharist from the tabernacle to a safer place, especially at night, would be a serious danger of desecration.

Quantity and Renewal of Hosts

Canon 939 — Consecrated hosts in a quantity sufficient for the needs of the faithful are to be kept in a pyx or small vessel; they are to be renewed frequently and the older hosts consumed properly.

This canon, a simplification of canons 1270 and 1272 of the 1917 code, treats the quantity and renewal of the reserved Eucharist and the vessels for it. The number of consecrated hosts which are to be reserved is dependent on the needs of the sick and other faithful who will be receiving communion outside Mass.[160] In order for the sign of communion to be expressed more clearly as a sharing in the sacrifice actually being celebrated, communion should not be given during Mass from the reserved elements but from the bread and wine consecrated at the Mass.[161] Therefore the quantity of reserved hosts should be kept to the minimum necessary for communion outside Mass, and this will also facilitate the requirement of frequent renewal.

The person in charge should see that the hosts do not spoil or become too hard and easily broken.[162] The frequency of renewal of the consecrated hosts depends on climatic and other conditions. As a rule, the hosts should be renewed at least twice a month insofar as possible (cf. c. 934, §2).

The hosts should be reserved in a ciborium or other suitable vessel such as a pyx. The vessel may be made from any materials that are prized in a region, including ebony or other hard woods, as long as they are suited to sacred use.[163] The consecrated wine should not be reserved except for communion of the sick. It should be kept in a properly covered chalice and placed in the tabernacle after Mass until it is needed. When it is brought to the sick or dying, it must be carried in a closed vessel to eliminate all danger of spilling.[164]

The Sanctuary Lamp

Canon 940 — A special lamp which indicates and honors the presence of Christ is to shine continuously before a tabernacle in which the Most Holy Eucharist is reserved.

The canon speaks only of a "special lamp" without specifying a wax candle or a lamp fueled by olive oil as did canon 1271 of the 1917 code. Nevertheless, liturgical law prefers an oil lamp or a lamp with a wax candle.[165] The oil may be of any kind, although the law has traditionally favored vegetable oil, especially olive oil. Under the former law the candle was to be made at least in part from beeswax, olive oil, or another kind of vegetable oil.[166] Ordinaries were able to permit substi-

[159] See J. Huels, More Disputed Questions in the Liturgy (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1996) 153–159.

[160] HCWE 7.

[161] SC 55, GIRM 56 h.

[162] GIRM 285.

[163] GIRM 292.

[164] HCWE 55; RAnointing 95; IDon 14.

[165] HCWE 11.

[166] SCRit, decr, December 13, 1957, AAS 50 (1960) 50; CLD 5, 613.

tutions for oil lamps and wax candles when these were unavailable or could not be obtained without grave inconvenience or expense. In such a case any oil, especially a vegetable oil, could be substituted; as a last resort, even an electric light could be used.[167] Such substitutions may now freely be made by the persons in charge of sacred places, in keeping with particular laws and customs.

Liturgical law states that the presence of the Eucharist in the tabernacle is to be shown also by a veil or in another suitable way determined by the competent authority.[168] In many places the custom has developed not to cover tabernacles, especially when they are artistically notable.

Exposition

Canon 941 — §1. In churches or oratories where it is permitted to reserve the Most Holy Eucharist, there can be expositions with the pyx or the monstrance; the norms prescribed in the liturgical books are to be observed.

§2. Exposition of the Most Blessed Sacrament is not to be held in the same area of the church or oratory during the celebration of Mass.

The liturgical laws governing exposition of the Eucharist are found chiefly in the Rite of Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass 82–100. The ritual contains a rite of simple exposition and a rite of exposition and benediction. Several principles from the introduction to the rite are noteworthy for understanding this canon:

(1) Exposition stimulates the faithful to spiritual union with Christ which culminates in sacramental communion.

(2) The arrangements for exposition must carefully avoid anything which might obscure the principal desire of Christ in instituting the Eucharist, namely, to be received as food, healing, and consolation.

(3) The celebration of the eucharistic mystery includes in a more perfect manner the spiritual communion to which exposition is intended to stimulate the faithful.[169]

The ritual distinguishes three kinds of exposition: that for a lengthy period, that for a brief period, and that for adoration by religious communities. Brief periods of exposition must always include time for readings of the word of God, hymns, prayers, and a period of silent prayer. Exposition merely for the purpose of giving the benediction is forbidden. There may never be exposition, whether lengthy or brief, in the same part of the church or oratory where Mass is being celebrated. Exposition should be interrupted during Mass, unless the Mass is celebrated in a chapel apart from the exposition and at least some of the faithful remain in adoration.[170]

Lengthy Exposition

Canon 942 — It is recommended that in these churches and oratories an annual solemn exposition of the Most Blessed Sacrament be held for an appropriate period of time, even if not continuous, so that the local community more profoundly meditates on and adores the eucharistic mystery. Such an exposition is to be held, however, only if a suitable gathering of the faithful is foreseen and the established norms are observed.

Canon 1275 of the former code had required an exposition of forty hours, but the 1983 code speaks only of an annual solemn exposition for an "appropriate period of time," which the liturgical law refers to as an "extended period of time." Liturgical planners are free to determine the length of this period in keeping with local custom. Exposition should not be held unless the partici-

[167] SCRit, decr Urbis et orbis, August 18, 1949, AAS 41 (1949) 476; CLD 3, 518.
[168] HCWE 11.
[169] HCWE 82–83.
[170] HCWE 83, 89.

pation of a reasonable number of the faithful is assured.[171] Exposition need not be continuous during the extended period, especially when it goes beyond one day, and the Eucharist may be replaced in the tabernacle at times which have been prearranged and duly announced. This may not be done more than twice in the day, e.g., at midday and at night.[172]

Parishes and other communities wishing to have perpetual adoration may do so, provided it is before the tabernacle and not the sacrament exposed. Permission of the local ordinary is needed for perpetual adoration before the blessed sacrament exposed. He may give permission to a pious association of the laity which has perpetual exposition as part of its constitution, but perpetual exposition may not take place in a parish church unless there is a separate blessed sacrament chapel and the sacrament is placed inside the tabernacle during Mass.[173]

Ministers

Canon 943 — The minister of exposition of the Most Blessed Sacrament and of eucharistic benediction is a priest or deacon; in special circumstances, the minister of exposition and reposition alone without benediction is the acolyte, extraordinary minister of holy communion, or someone else designated by the local ordinary; the prescripts of the diocesan bishop are to be observed.

The canon restates the liturgical law on the ministers of exposition and benediction.[174] The ordinary minister of exposition is a priest or deacon who may also bless the people with the sacrament at the end of the period of adoration. In the absence of a priest or deacon, an acolyte, special minister of communion, or another person deputed by the local ordinary may publicly expose the Eucharist for adoration and later repose it. These ministers may open the tabernacle, put the host in the monstrance, and place it or the vessel containing the Eucharist on the altar or place of exposition. At the end of the adoration they may replace the Eucharist in the tabernacle, but they may not give the blessing.

Canon 1274, §2 of the former code limited the minister of exposition and reposition to the priest or deacon, and only the priest could give the benediction. This law was derogated from in 1967 to permit deacons to give the blessing and in 1972 to allow acolytes to expose and repose the Eucharist.[175]

Eucharistic Processions

Canon 944 — §1. When it can be done in the judgment of the diocesan bishop, a procession through the public streets is to be held as a public witness of veneration toward the Most Holy Eucharist, especially on the solemnity of the Body and Blood of Christ.

§2. It is for the diocesan bishop to establish regulations which provide for the participation in and the dignity of processions.

There is little evidence for eucharistic processions before Pope Urban IV established the feast of Corpus Christi in 1264, but in the fourteenth century such processions became widespread. The Council of Trent approved this custom in response to Protestants who denied the legitimacy of various forms of eucharistic cult outside Mass.

The liturgical laws governing eucharistic processions are quite broad and allow great latitude for local customs provided that they are in accord with the directives of the diocesan bishop.[176] The intent of the canon is to encourage public processions of the Eucharist provided the bishop approves the practice. The bishop is to decide whether processions are advisable in today's conditions, whether [171] HCWE 86. A helpful collection of documents, in English translation, that treat solemn exposition is found in Liturgy Documentary Series 11: Solemn Exposition of the Holy Eucharist (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1996).

[172] HCWE 88.

[173] CDWDS, reply, BCLN 31 (1995) 213–214.

[174] HCWE 91.

[175] SDO V, 22, §3; MQ VI.

[176] HCWE 101.

they can be carried out with decorum and reverence, and whether they can truly be a sign of common faith and adoration.[177] These conditions are more likely to be met in a predominantly Roman Catholic culture where such processions remain solidly rooted in popular piety today.

The 1917 code had an entire title of six canons (CIC 1290–1295) devoted to the subject of eucharistic processions. The reduction to one canon in the present code is reflective of the actual decline in the popularity of public eucharistic processions in the contemporary life of the Church.

CHAPTER III THE OFFERING GIVEN FOR THE CELEBRATION OF MASS [cc. 945–958]

Historical Background

The custom of accepting Mass offerings arose in the Western church as a result of several key developments. In the early Church the faithful brought gifts to the Sunday assembly, especially the bread and wine for the Eucharist, and the excess was given to the Church's ministers and distributed to the poor. By the seventh or eighth century, gifts of money were frequently substituted and their purpose became chiefly the support of the clergy. Other contributing factors included the growth of votive Masses, which were offered for the intentions and desires (vota) of a group or an individual, and of private Masses, which were celebrated with only a server present out of a priest's personal devotion.

By the Carolingian period all of these developments had taken hold and contributed to the custom of the priest's accepting a single donation, or "stipend," for each Mass in return for remembering a special intention. This practice became widespread in the eleventh and twelfth centuries and remained popular thereafter. One of the reasons for its popularity was that it was one of the few ways that the faithful had to take a more active role in the liturgy.[178] From the Middle Ages until the liturgical reforms of the twentieth century, the liturgy was largely a clerical affair and the laity were silent spectators; most did not understand the Latin language, and the reception of communion was rare. Thus, to give an offering for the priest to remember one's intention at Mass became a way of participating more closely in the action of the priest.

Theological Considerations

Scholastic theologians of the Middle Ages attempted to provide a rationale for Mass offerings by devising a theory of the "threefold fruits of the Mass," of which the priest applies the "special fruit" for the intention of the donor, but this theory was never officially adopted as such by the Church. The Council of Constance in 1415 and Pope Pius VI in 1794 upheld the Mass stipend practice against adversaries who opposed it on theological grounds and who charged that it was simoniacal.[179]

The Council of Trent's teaching on the sacrificial nature of the Mass, which was enunciated in part to defend the system of Mass offerings and intentions, stressed that the Mass is an unbloody representation and commemoration of Christ's sacrifice on the cross. Through the Eucharist, Christians in all ages are able to participate sacramentally in Christ's unique sacrifice on the cross and the once-and-for-all redemption he won by that sacrifice. The sacrifice of the Mass is not a new sacrifice offered each time by the Church, but a memorial (anamnesis) of Christ's sacrifice on the cross. The fruits of the Mass, therefore, represent a sharing in the merits gained for humanity by Christ's redemptive death on the cross.

The pertinent dogmatic teaching of Trent is that Mass may be "offered for the living and the dead, for sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities."[180] Thus, the fruits of the Mass bring about in some way the remission of sins of both the living and the dead. In the theological introduction to its canons on the Mass, Trent taught:

[177] Ibid.

[178] See M. F. Mannion, "Stipends and Eucharistic Praxis," W 57 (1983) 194–214.

[179] Constance, sess. VIII, errors of J. Wycliff, nn. 19 and 25; Pius VI, const Auctorem fidei, August 28, 1794, nn. 30 and 54, Ench 2630, 2654.

> The fruits of that bloody sacrifice [of the cross], it is well understood, are received most abundantly through this unbloody one, so far is the latter from derogating in any way from the former. Wherefore, it is rightly offered not only for the sins, punishments, satisfactions and other necessities of the faithful who are living, but also for those departed in Christ but not yet fully purified.[181]

Canon 901 and several of the canons of this chapter speak of the "application of the Mass" for a specific intention. The Church does not have any firm doctrine on what it precisely means to "apply the Mass." In fact, the Council of Trent, which debated this issue extensively in three sessions, eliminated from its definitive text any specific mention of the words "apply" or "application" of the fruits of the Mass by the priest. Nor did the council adopt any particular theory about the way that the fruits of the Mass were received, whether this was ex opere operato or by way of intercession. This allowed room for the different opinions expressed by the council fathers as well as for further theological clarification and development. Trent was content to conclude, in the words of David Power, that "the Mass celebrated by a duly ordained priest, under whatever circumstances, is beneficial for those for whom it is offered, and that through this offering some grace of remission of sin flows."[182] That there is spiritual benefit for the Mass offering intention is the Church's belief; all that this entails, and how it is accomplished, are matters that remain in the realm of theological opinion.

The Mass offering system's greatest value for today is most likely as a vehicle for the remembrance of the dead. It may be seen as a way for the living to honor the memory of their beloved dead, to pray for them, and to stay in communion with them in a special way at the eucharistic celebration.

Discipline

Canons 945–958 principally reflect the discipline enacted by various popes over three centuries, including the 1974 apostolic letter of Paul VI, Firma in traditione.[183] Perhaps the most important change in the revised code's treatment of Mass offerings occurs in the title of this section which in the 1917 code was "Mass Alms or Stipends." No longer does the law refer to the donation for the application of Mass as a "stipend" (stipendium), but rather as an "offering" (stips) given by one of the faithful. The word "stipend" suggests a mercantile exchange of goods for services or the remuneration of a do ut facias contract. The word "offering," however, clearly signifies that it is given freely by the faithful primarily out of their concern for the Church and their desire to support its material needs. Mass offerings can be understood as gifts to the Church or its ministers on behalf of some intention, much as a donation or bequest is made to any charitable institution in the name of some person, living or deceased.

The fourteen canons of this chapter treat the following matters: offerings and intentions (c. 945), the donor (c. 946), exclusion of trafficking or trading (c. 947), separate and collective intentions (c. 948), lost offerings (c. 949), the procedure for an unspecified number of Masses (c. 950), the limit of one offering per day to be retained by each priest (c. 951), the amount of the offering (c. 952), the limit on the number of offer-

[180] Sess. XXII, c. 3, de ss. Missae sacrificio, September 17, 1562.

[181] Sess. XXII, Decr. de Missa, cap. 2.

[182] D. Power, The Sacrifice We Offer: The Tridentine Dogma and Its Reinterpretation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1987) 128; see also idem, The Eucharistic Mystery: Revitalizing the Tradition (New York: Crossroad, 1992) 250–263.

[183] Innocent XII, const Nuper, December 2, 1697; Pius X, decr Ut debita, May 11, 1904; CIC 824–844; Paul VI mp Firma in traditione, June 13, 1974, AAS 66 (1974) 308–311, DOL 287, CLD 8, 530.

ings that may be accepted (c. 953), excess Mass offerings (c. 954), the transferal and satisfaction of Mass obligations (c. 955), unsatisfied Mass obligations (c. 956), the exercise of vigilance (c. 957), and the Mass record (c. 958).

Offerings and Intentions

Canon 945 — §1. In accord with the approved practice of the Church, any priest celebrating or concelebrating is permitted to receive an offering to apply the Mass for a specific intention.

§2. It is recommended earnestly to priests that they celebrate Mass for the intention of the Christian faithful, especially the needy, even if they have not received an offering.

The canon says that the priest "is permitted" to receive Mass offerings. Thus a legal right is granted which cannot be denied or restricted without the consent of the priest. In some dioceses all Mass offerings are given to the parish or diocese and in return the priests receive a salary equal to or higher than their income had they kept the offerings. This is legitimate provided it is voluntary, i.e., provided that each priest is free to retain the Mass offerings rather than the additional salary.

In the recommendation of paragraph two the legislator has in mind the spiritual benefit that may come to the persons or concerns for whose intentions the Masses are celebrated, but it neglects the other benefits of the Mass offering system. Canon 946 and Firma in traditione, as will be seen, assert that Mass offerings also benefit the donors themselves by their sharing in the Church's support of its ministers and through an increased participation in Christ's self-offering. However, these worthy benefits cannot be achieved if there is no donation. It would seem that poor people would profit more if they gave some donation, even if very small.

The Donor

Canon 946 — The Christian faithful who give an offering to apply the Mass for their intention contribute to the good of the Church and by that offering share its concern to support its ministers and works.

The donor who gives the offering also participates in the eucharistic celebration because the donation concretizes the donor's own prayer on behalf of his or her intention. Moreover, the donor's financial contribution to the good of the Church, even though small, is a means of sharing in the Church's concern for the support of its ministers and works. This canon, new to the 1983 code, is taken from Paul VI's Firma in traditione. This document states that the donors of Mass offerings "associate themselves more closely with Christ's act of offering himself as victim and in so doing experience its effects more fully."[184] This does not occur automatically upon the giving of the offering, but depends upon the extent of the donor's own faith, devotion, and actual participation in the Eucharist.

Trafficking or Trading Excluded

Canon 947 — Any appearance of trafficking or trading is to be excluded entirely from the offering for Masses.

This canon, identical to canon 827 of the 1917 code, sums up numerous disciplinary measures enacted over the centuries, including a reform decree of the Council of Trent.[185] Since the acceptance of Mass offerings has frequently led to accusations of simony, the Church wishes to regulate the practice strictly to avoid all appearances of commercialism. According to canon 1385, those who illegitimately profit from Mass offerings are to be punished with a censure or another just penalty. Canon 947 and the following canons of this chapter are intended to preclude profiteering and other abuses connected with Mass offerings.

[184] DOL 2234.

[185] Sess. XXII, de observandis et evitandis in celebratione missae.

Separate and Collective Intentions

Canon 948 — Separate Masses are to be applied for the intentions of those for whom a single offering, although small, has been given and accepted.

This canon is worded somewhat differently than canon 828 of the 1917 code, but the meaning is the same: the celebrant and concelebrants each may accept only one offering for one Mass, even if a smaller amount than customary is accepted. Although the donor's intention can include more than one person, only one offering can be taken.

In 1991 the Congregation for the Clergy derogated from this canon to permit priests to accept several offerings for a "collective intention" at a single Mass. The following regulations must be observed if this practice is followed:

(1) the donors must be informed of and consent to the combining of their offerings before the Mass for the collective intention is celebrated;

(2) the place and time for the Mass must be announced;

(3) the practice may not be observed more than twice a week;

(4) the celebrant may keep for himself no more than the usual amount of a single Mass offering and must send any excess to his ordinary in keeping with canon 951, §1.[186]

Lost Offerings

Canon 949 — A person obliged to celebrate and apply Mass for the intention of those who gave an offering is bound by the obligation even if the offerings received have been lost through no fault of his own.

This rule was also found in canon 829 of the former code. Once an offering has been accepted, the priest is obliged to apply the Mass for the intention of the donor, and that obligation ceases only when the Mass has been celebrated. If a large number of Mass offerings has been lost or stolen, the provisions of canons 1308–1309 could be applied.

Unspecified Number of Masses

Canon 950 — If a sum of money is offered for the application of Masses without an indication of the number of Masses to be celebrated, the number is to be computed on the basis of the offering established in the place where the donor resides, unless the intention of the donor must be presumed legitimately to have been different.

Canon 1300 states the general principle that the intentions of the donor are to be observed, but this canon deals with a case when it is not possible to learn the intention of the donor as, for example, when a sum of money is left in a will for Masses to be celebrated without specification of the number of Masses. The general rule is that the number of Masses be based on the amount of a Mass offering established for the place where the donor resides.

One Offering per Day

Canon 951 — §1. A priest who celebrates several Masses on the same day can apply each to the intention for which the offering was given, but subject to the rule that, except on Christmas, he is to keep the offering for only one Mass and transfer the others to the purposes prescribed by the ordinary, while allowing for some recompense by reason of an extrinsic title.

§2. A priest who concelebrates a second Mass on the same day cannot accept an offering for it under any title.

A priest is free to accept an offering for each Mass at which he presides, but he may keep only one offering for himself each day. The other offerings go to his ordinary, namely, the local ordinary for the diocesan clergy and the major superior for members of clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life. All pastors and parochial vicars, not just diocesan priests, are bound to send the offering for additional Masses celebrated each day to the local ordinary.[187] This rule applies only to parish Masses for which offerings have been received through the parish. Thus, a religious priest who is pastor or parochial vicar and who binates with an offering received from the sacristan of his own religious institute should send that offering to his own ordinary, not to the local ordinary, since the intention of the donor was to benefit the institute, not the diocese. Moreover, a visiting priest in the parish is entitled to all offerings for the Masses he celebrates, including binations and trinations, which he then sends to his own ordinary, not the local ordinary, unless they are the same.

[186] Decr Mos iugiter, February 22, 1991, AAS 83 (1991) 436–446; BCLN 27 (1991) 13–16.

While the priest may not retain more than one offering each day, except on Christmas, he may be compensated for celebrating additional Masses by virtue of some extrinsic title. For example, the priest may be paid for his services in celebrating the Mass even though he may not keep personally the offerings from any extra Masses celebrated in one day. Unlike the 1917 code (CIC 824, §2), the present law permits pastors and others who are obliged to celebrate the Missa pro populo on Sundays and holy days to take an offering for another Mass which they celebrate that day.

A priest may not take another offering, even one on behalf of his ordinary, when he concelebrates on the same day that he celebrates or concelebrates another Mass.[188] The reason for this rule is to avoid the appearance that concelebration, an optional practice, might be done merely for the sake of taking an offering. The rule applies to a second Mass, i.e., any additional Mass (altera Missa), whether it comes first or second in sequence. For example, if a priest concelebrates a Mass in the morning and presides in the evening, he may take an offering only for the Mass in the evening (unless he had already concelebrated the morning Mass before he learned that it would be necessary to celebrate Mass again in the evening). If a priest presides at a concelebrated Mass and must also preside at one or more additional Masses, he may receive offerings for each Mass, though retaining only one for himself and giving the others to the cause prescribed by his ordinary.

Amount of Offering

Canon 952 — §1. It is for the provincial council or a meeting of the bishops of the province to define by decree for the entire province the offering to be given for the celebration and application of Mass, and a priest is not permitted to seek a larger sum. Nevertheless, he is permitted to accept for the application of a Mass a voluntary offering which is larger or even smaller than the one defined.

§2. Where there is no such decree, the custom in force in the diocese is to be observed.

§3. Members of all religious institutes must also observe the same decree or local custom mentioned in §§1 and 2.

This canon makes two significant changes in canons 831–832 of the former law. The competent authority for determining the amount of Mass offerings is no longer the local ordinary but the provincial council or the meeting of bishops of a province, a change which ensures uniformity of practice among neighboring dioceses of a province. A second change from the former law is the absence of any provision allowing the local ordinary to prevent priests from accepting an offering that is lower than the defined or customary amount. While a priest may not demand a larger amount than that defined or customary in the province, he may accept an offering in any amount that is freely given.

[187] CodCom, interpretation, Feb. 20, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1132; Pamplona ComEng, 1295.

[188] This rule was first established by the SCDW in 1972 and was affirmed by Paul VI in 1974. See In celebratione Missae 3b, DOL 1816; and Firma in traditione IIIa, DOL 2238.

The competence of the meeting of bishops of a province to issue a decree is an exception to the usual norm that the bishops at such meetings, as a group, lack the power of governance. This is an example of a special grant of legislative power by the supreme legislator to the bishops of a province, on a par with the exception mentioned in canon 434. The decision of the majority of the bishops would be binding on all (c. 119, 2°).

If there is no such decree, each priest may accept an offering in any amount according to the custom, i.e., the majority practice of the diocese. Moreover, the bishop has the power to enact his own law on this matter if the bishops of the province have not done so.

It does not seem that paragraph three is really necessary, since diocesan bishops and provincial councils have such authority without this law,[189] which authority also extends to priests belonging to societies of apostolic life and to personal prelatures.

Limitation on Offerings Accepted

Canon 953 — No one is permitted to accept more offerings for Masses to be applied by himself than he can satisfy within a year.

This rule is to prevent the possibility of an individual priest amassing many obligations, which might go unsatisfied in the event of his incapacity or death. The rule applies only to Mass obligations to be satisfied by oneself, not to the acceptance of offerings to be transferred to others.

Excess Mass Offerings

Canon 954 — If in certain churches or oratories more Masses are asked to be celebrated than can be celebrated there, it is permitted for them to be celebrated elsewhere unless the donors have expressly indicated a contrary intention.

The canon allows excess Mass offerings to be transferred from one place to another unless the donor has expressly indicated otherwise. When the one who accepts the offering agrees to have the Mass celebrated in that place, the Mass obligation cannot be satisfied elsewhere without the donor's permission or without the permission of the competent authority according to canon 1309. If a Mass offering has been accepted on the condition that it be celebrated in that place, this fact should be noted in writing along with the intention.

Transferal and Satisfaction of Mass Obligations

Canon 955 — §1. A person who intends to entrust to others the celebration of Masses to be applied is to entrust their celebration as soon as possible to priests acceptable to him, provided that he is certain that they are above suspicion. He must transfer the entire offering received unless it is certain that the excess over the sum fixed in the diocese was given for him personally. He is also obliged to see to the celebration of the Masses until he learns that the obligation has been accepted and the offering received.

§2. The time within which Masses must be celebrated begins on the day the priest who is to celebrate them received them unless it is otherwise evident.

§3. Those who entrust to others Masses to be celebrated are to record in a book without delay both the Masses which they received and those which they transferred to others, as well as their offerings.

§4. Every priest must note accurately the Masses which he accepted to celebrate and those which he has satisfied.

The rules of this canon are mostly self-evident, but a few words and phrases call for some explanation. In paragraph one, the words "as soon as possible" refer to the action of the person who entrusts the Mass obligations, i.e., the one who sends the offerings. In the case of a priest who has already accepted sufficient Mass obligations for a year's time (c. 953), he must send to one or more other priests the excess offerings as soon as possible. Or, in the case of transferring Mass obligations elsewhere (c. 954), this is to be done as soon as possible after it is determined that there are too many Masses to be celebrated in a given place.

[189] See cc. 391; 392; 445; 835, §1; 838, §4; 678, §1; 738, §2.

A priest who is above suspicion is anyone about whom there is no doubt that he will satisfy the Mass obligations received. This is to be presumed of all priests in good standing unless the contrary is evident. One may also presume that the Mass obligations have been accepted by the other priest if he has received and keeps the offerings. The time within which the Masses are to be celebrated is one year from the day on which the offerings were received (cf. c. 953), unless it is evident that one or more Masses are to be celebrated sooner.

Unsatisfied Obligations

Canon 956 — Each and every administrator of pious causes or those obliged in any way to see to the celebration of Masses, whether clerics or laity, are to hand over to their ordinaries according to the method defined by the latter the Mass obligations which have not been satisfied within a year.

This canon applies to anyone entrusted with seeing that Mass obligations are satisfied. The year is to be reckoned as 365 days from the acceptance of the Mass offering, unless the donor specified that the Masses in question had to be celebrated within the calendar year (c. 202, §1).

Vigilance

Canon 957 — The duty and right of exercising vigilance that Mass obligations are fulfilled belong to the local ordinary in churches of secular clergy and to the superiors in churches of religious institutes or societies of apostolic life.

The canon speaks of churches, and this should be understood in the technical sense of canon 1214. A church of the secular clergy means, for purposes of this canon, a church served by secular clergy; a church of a religious institute or society of apostolic life means, for purposes of this canon, not only churches owned by them, but also churches owned by a parish or diocese and served by clergy of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life. Although the bishop has jurisdiction over all churches, to which the faithful have the right to come, the Mass offerings received in them belong to the clergy themselves, not to the churches. Oversight of the finances of clergy of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life is the competence of the internal superiors of the institute or society and is part of the just autonomy that institutes and societies enjoy.[190] In parish churches served by members of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life, it would be advisable to keep a separate account or list of all binations and trinations of the pastor and parochial vicars, in respect to the offerings for the Masses that come by way of the parish or diocese, since this income would be subject to the local ordinary's jurisdiction (as above in the commentary under c. 951).

As for the oratories of clerical religious institutes and clerical societies of apostolic life, the major superiors have exclusive jurisdiction over the Mass accounts there. For oratories of lay religious institutes and lay societies of apostolic life, the local ordinary has jurisdiction.

Mass Record

Canon 958 — §1. The pastor and the rector of a church or other pious place which regularly receives offerings for Masses are to have a special book in which they note accurately the number of Masses to be celebrated, the intention, the offering given, and their celebration.

§2. The ordinary is obliged to examine these books each year either personally or through others.

[190] See cc. 586, 732, 628, 734, 397, §2.

In place of a book, it is becoming customary in some places to use a computer program for keeping the Mass offering account. The Mass offering records are to be examined each year by the ordinary, either personally or by others delegated by him, either at the time of the canonical visitation or at some other time.[191]

[191] See cc. 396, 397, 628, 734, 1301. See the commentary on the previous canon for the proper ordinary.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Books

Bugnini, A. The Reform of the Liturgy: 1948–1975. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1990.

Huels, J. M. Disputed Questions in the Liturgy Today. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1988. [The chapters related to the Eucharist treat: female altar servers, concelebration, Mass intentions, reducing the number of Masses, mixed marriages, and the Eucharist.]

———. The Interpretation of the Law on Communion under Both Kinds. CanLawStud 505. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1982.

———. More Disputed Questions in the Liturgy. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1996. [The chapters related to the Eucharist treat: unauthorized liturgical adaptations, preparation for the sacraments, daily Mass, sacramental sharing with other Christians, reception of sacraments by divorced and remarried persons, lay preaching at liturgy.]

———. One Table, Many Laws: Essays on Catholic Eucharistic Practice. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1986. [Essays on the interpretation of liturgical law, communion under both kinds, the matter of the Eucharist, reception of communion by the mentally handicapped, the internal forum solution, eucharistic sharing, Mass offerings.]

The Liturgy Documents: A Parish Resource. 3rd ed. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1991. [Contains twelve key documents on the Eucharist, each with an introduction by a different scholar.]

McManus, F., ed. Thirty Years of Liturgical Renewal: Statements of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy. Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1987, with introduction and commentaries. [Many of the statements are related to the Eucharist.]

McSherry, P. J. Wine as Sacramental Matter and the Use of Mustum. Washington, D.C.: National Clergy Council on Alcoholism, 1986.

Pearson, J. T. The Reservation and Veneration of the Blessed Sacrament. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1986.

Rau, S. Die Feiern der Gemeinden und das Recht der Kirche. Altenberge: Telos, 1990. [A doctoral dissertation on liturgical law; chapter 5 treats the 1983 code.]

Seasoltz, R. K. New Liturgy, New Laws. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1980. [Pages 84–111 and 131–141, in particular, are devoted to the Eucharist.]

Woestman, W. H. Sacraments: Initiation, Penance, Anointing of the Sick. Ottawa: Saint Paul University, 1996. [Pages 97–216 are on the Eucharist.]

Articles

Fuenmajor, A. "Sobre el destino de los estipendios de misas binadas o trinadas." IC 28 (1988) 201–211.

Green, T. J. "Sacramental Law Revisited—Reflections on Selected Aspects of Book IV of the Revised Code: De Ecclesiae munere sanctificandi." Stud Can 17 (1983) 277–330.

Hendriks, J. "Ad sacram communionem ne admittantur... Adnotationes in Can. 915." P 79 (1990) 163–176.

Huels, J. M. "Canonical Rights to the Sacraments." In Developmental Disabilities and Sacramental Access: New Paradigms for Sacramental Encounters, ed. E. Foley, 94–115. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1994.

———. "Communion under Both Kinds on Sundays—Is It Legal?" J 42 (1982) 70–106.

———. "Liturgy, Inclusive Language, and Canon Law." In Living No Longer for Ourselves: Liturgy and Justice in the Nineties, ed. K. Hughes and M. R. Francis, 138–152. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1991.

———. "Preparation for the Sacraments: Faith, Rights, Law." Stud Can 28 (1994) 33–58.

———. "Select Questions of Eucharistic Discipline." CLSAP 47 (1985) 48–65.

———. "Stipends in the New Code of Canon Law." In Living Bread, Saving Cup, ed. R. K. Seasoltz, 347–356. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1987.

Manzanares, J. "De stipendio pro missis ad intentionem 'collectivam' celebratis iuxta decretum Mos iugiter." P 80 (1991) 579–608.

Miralless, A. "Il pane e il vino per l'Eucaristia: sulla recente lettera della Congregazione per la Dottrina della Fede." N 31 (1995) 616–626.

Morrisey, F. G. "Denial of Access to the Sacraments." CLSAP 52 (1990) 170–186.

Mosso, D. "L'Eucharistia nel nuovo Codice." Rivista Liturgica 71 (1984) 268–282.

Provost, J. H. "NCCB Guidelines for Receiving Communion." W 61 (1987) 223–230.

Rincón Pérez, T. "El Decreto de la Congregación para el Clero sobre acumulación de estipendias." IC 31 (1991) 627–656.

———. "La faculdad para comulgar dos veces al día a tenor del c. 917." IC 24 (1984) 769–781.

Schmitz, H. "Taufe, Firmung, Eucharistie: Die Sakramente der Initiation und ihre Rechtsfolgen in der Sicht des CIC von 1983." AkK 152 (1983) 369–407.

Urtasun, C. "Perceptio Corporis et Sanguinis Domini. Quoties. Quomodo." P 74 (1985) 534–574.

Zielinski, P. "Pious Wills and Mass Stipends in Relation to Canons 1299–1310." Stud Can 19 (1985) 115–154.

Title IV
The Sacrament of Penance
[cc. 959–997]

The thirty-nine canons of this title form four chapters, the first three of which deal with the sacrament of penance or reconciliation, the fourth with indulgences. After an introductory canon, the title treats: (1) celebration of the sacrament (cc. 960–964); (2) the minister (cc. 965–986); and (3) the penitent (cc. 987–991), along with (4) indulgences (cc. 992–997). A disproportionate number of canons affect the priest (bishop or presbyter) who acts as an ordained minister of the Church in the sacrament, partly because of the detailed norms that govern the canonical faculty or capacity to minister. The additional six basic norms on indulgences, related to but carefully distinguished from sacramental reconciliation, will also be commented upon together with the special law on this institute, a law which is outside the code.

The canons of this title have force, like the rest of the code, for the Latin church only. The parallel Eastern discipline is governed by canons 718–736 of the Code of Canons of the Eastern (Catholic) Churches; the canons make up chapter 4 of title XVI. The canons on penance in the Eastern collection are not further subdivided into articles or sections.

The Eastern code is sometimes almost literally dependent on the Latin code, for example, with regard to general sacramental absolution or the broadening of the faculty to absolve. The Eastern code also includes a discipline suppressed in the Latin church's canons, namely, the reservation of absolution from certain sins (see CCEO 727–729). Of course the Eastern code includes nothing on indulgences, an institute foreign to the Eastern tradition.

Vatican II mandated a reform of the Roman rite for celebrating all liturgical services, including the sacrament of penance: "The rites and formularies for the sacrament of penance are to be revised so that they more clearly express both the nature and effect of the sacrament."[1] In this text of Sacrosanctum Concilium the reference to "nature" is to the social and ecclesial nature of sacramental reconciliation, a dimension that needed to be restored or recovered. This is obviously a primary, indeed necessary, aspect of all seven sacraments but one that is less apparent in the ordinary circumstances of individual or auricular confession of sins and their absolution.[2]

The conciliar constitution, treating penance also in a broader sense and in relation to the church year, introduces and stresses the same neglected ecclesial dimension: "The baptismal and penitential aspects of Lent are to be given greater prominence in both the liturgy and liturgical catechesis."[3] Hence:

> a. More use is to be made of the baptismal features proper to the Lenten liturgy; some of those from an earlier era are to be restored as may seem advisable.
>
> b. The same is to apply to the penitential elements. As regards catechesis, it is important to impress on the minds of the faithful not only the social consequences of sin but also the essence of the virtue of penance, namely, detestation of sin as an offense against God; the role of the Church is not to be neglected and the people are to be exhorted to pray for sinners.

[1] SC 72.

[2] AcSynVat 1, 2:567. See pp. 558–559 on the restoration of the laying on of the hand or hands, "even without physical contact," as "a sign of reconciliation and of restored communion with the Church" (Cyprian).

[3] SC 109.

> During Lent penance should be not only inward and individual, but also outward and social.[4]

The liturgical reform carried out this mandate, specifically in the 1973 Rite of Penance of the Roman Ritual. This includes not only the three rites and texts for the sacrament itself, described below, but also an appendix of models for communal penitential celebrations, including those that are seasonal in orientation.[5] These services are the occasion of conversion and reconciliation. In themselves they are kept distinct from the sacrament itself, but the possible combination of such freely developed penitential services with celebration of the sacrament is also contemplated:

> Sometimes these services will include the sacrament of penance. In such cases after the readings and homily the rite for reconciling several penitents with individual confession and absolution is to be used (Rite of Penance nn. 54–59) or, in those special cases for which the law provides, the rite for general confession and absolution (Rite of Penance nn. 60–63).[6]

The canons of this title of the code do not directly address the enhanced ecclesial dimension of the liturgical reform of penance except in passing. Nor is the nature of the sacrament of penance as public cult offered to God formally treated; this is left to the general affirmation about the seven sacraments in canon 840.[7] The discipline of the 1917 code is generally retained, especially the traditional norms of conduct affecting the ministers of the sacrament, bishops and presbyters, and the avoidance of misconduct and abuse. The major developments may be summarized in this way:

(1) The few norms for celebration (cc. 960–964) include new canons on general sacramental absolution when individual, auricular confession of sins has not preceded the absolution or reconciliation. Under this heading, too, the norms on the lawful place of celebration have been included and certain restrictions lifted. Nevertheless, most of the strictly liturgical law on the celebration of the sacrament remains outside the code, in accord with canon 2.

(2) Proposals that those ordained to the presbyterate should by the very fact of ordination be empowered to minister the sacrament were rejected in the process of recodification.[8] Instead, the requisite faculty over and above holy orders was retained, but one radical extension or enlargement was introduced in canon 967, §§2–3. This was done in accord with the basic pastoral purposes of the recodification. Thus, although the norms on faculties remain largely intact, most presbyters with a regular or habitual faculty to minister may exercise it everywhere unless canonically prohibited (see below).

(3) The chapter of the 1917 code on the reservation of sins (CIC 893–900) was abrogated, at the recommendation of the Apostolic Penitentiary.[9] Thus the whole canonical institute was abolished whereby the minister of the sacrament could be limited or restricted in his canonical and sacramental power of absolution with regard to certain reserved cases of sins. The institute of reservation of sins, which had been rigorously limited by the 1917 code to "very grave and atrocious" cases and hemmed

[4] SC 109–110; see cc. 1249–1253 on days of penance, although neither the social and ecclesial nor the liturgical elements of penance are stressed in those canons.

[5] RPenance, Appendix II, "Samples of Penitential Services," nn. 1–73. Another appendix gives a "Form of Examination of Conscience."

[6] RPenance 4, DOL 3109.

[7] Rel 224–225.

[8] Comm 10 (1978) 56.

[9] Rel 230–231.

in by restraints against excessive or abusive reservations,[10] was pastorally obsolescent or obsolete. Such a "reservation of sins," however, is found in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (cc. 727–730), as already noted.

Liturgical Reform

Because the canons are principally concerned with the extrinsic discipline affecting the celebration, minister, and penitent, it is necessary to refer to the Rite of Penance for a broader treatment of the canonical discipline of sacramental celebration. The 1973 reform of the ritual of the sacrament has three distinct rites for the celebration of sacramental reconciliation, all of them enhanced with prayers, biblical readings, and other elements as part of the general reform of the liturgical books of the Roman liturgy, all in fulfillment of Sacrosanctum Concilium 23–25 and 35, 1.

1. Rite for Reconciliation of Individual Penitents

The first rite, although historically and traditionally derivative, is treated as "ordinary," primary, and basic because it has been the common usage of the Western church in medieval and modern times. As the rite for individual or auricular confessions of sins followed by individual absolution, it is the celebration with which the canons are almost exclusively concerned.

2. Rite for Reconciliation of Several Penitents with Individual Confession and [Individual] Absolution

In its present form—as a communal celebration which constitutes a framework for individual confession and individual absolution—the "second" rite is an innovation. Aside from the individual absolution of sins which it includes, however, it follows the more venerable tradition of the general or communal reconciliation of penitents by the bishop on Holy Thursday; the understanding was that any individual confession of sins to presbyters had taken place earlier and traditionally prior to the Lenten observance, the period when "satisfaction" for at least public sins might be made. This older rite of reconciliation—expulsion of penitents on Ash Wednesday and their reconciliation on Holy Thursday—had been retained in the modern Roman Pontifical (1596) but had long been obsolete; the liturgical revision follows this tradition except that it requires individual confession and absolution in the course of the second rite.[11]

The canons of the code do not refer to this new second rite of the Roman Ritual, although it was this rite which Paul VI anticipated might become common:

> It [the second rite] combines the two values of being a community act and a personal act. It is a preferable form of reconciliation for our people when it is possible but it usually presupposes the presence of many ministers of the sacrament and this is not always easy. Still, we hope that especially for homogeneous groups—children, youth, workers, the sick, pilgrims, etc.—it may become the normal way of celebration, since it involves a more complete preparation and a more structured service.[12]

3. Rite for Reconciliation of Several Penitents with General Confession and Absolution

This third rite is also new. Prior to the publication of the Rite of Penance in 1973, general or communal absolution without previous individual confession of sins had to be celebrated according to the ritual for individual penance, with the liturgical texts simply changed to the plural. The present rite, however, is fully developed and elaborated: opening song, greeting of the assembly, and prayer; a full celebration of the liturgy of the word, followed by examination of conscience; general confession and general absolution; proclamation of praise and conclusion. The ritual and new canons 961–963 determine the limited conditions under which the third rite for reconciliation may be used.

[10] CIC 897; see also CIC 895, 898, 900.

[11] In the Roman Pontifical, part three, "De expulsione publice poenitentium ab ecclesia, in feria quarta cinerum"; "De reconciliatione poenitentium, quae fit in feria quinta Coenae Domini." An early redaction of the second rite in the liturgical reform of the RPenance followed the older tradition of communal absolution.

[12] Address, April 3, 1974, N 10 (1974) 225–227, DOL 3112. The text did not appear in AAS.

As a whole, the Rite of Penance is characterized by greater openness to adaptation and accommodation than several other sections of the Roman Ritual. This results from a recognition that (1) the public and ecclesial nature of penance is fundamentally the same as that of the other sacraments, but (2) the sacrament has nonetheless been celebrated ordinarily in quasi-private circumstances in which only two members of the Christian community are present, namely, the penitent and the minister.

With regard to ritual adaptation to circumstances, no matter which of the three rites is followed, it is for priests and especially pastors > in celebrating reconciliation with individuals or with a community to adapt the rite to the concrete circumstances of the penitents. They must preserve the essential structure and the entire form of absolution, but if necessary they may omit some parts of the rite for pastoral reasons or enlarge upon them, may select texts of readings or prayers, and may choose a place more suitable for the celebration according to the regulations of the conference of bishops, so that the entire celebration may be enriching and effective.[13]

Unlike the law on several other sacraments, there is no canon that directly addresses the required form of words for the sacrament of penance, as approved in the liturgical books. With certain variants for communal absolution, for the Latin church this formulary is:

> God the Father of mercies, / through the death and resurrection of his Son / has reconciled the world to himself / and sent the Holy Spirit among us / for the forgiveness of sins; / through the ministry of the Church / may God give you pardon and peace, / and I absolve you from your sins / in the name of the Father, and of the Son, / and of the Holy Spirit. / R. Amen.[14]

This is the integral text which may not be altered and is referred to as the "entire form of absolution" in the text on adaptation quoted above; the essential words begin "I absolve you..." and suffice in emergency circumstances, such as the imminent danger of death.

Although a restoration of the more traditional and venerable deprecative form of reconciliation was not included in the Rite of Penance,[15] the above formulary was newly introduced for the following reasons:

> The form of absolution indicates that the reconciliation of the penitent comes from the mercy of the Father; it shows the connection between the reconciliation of the sinner and the paschal mystery of Christ; it stresses the role of the Holy Spirit in the forgiveness of sins; finally, it underlines the ecclesial aspect of the sacrament, because reconciliation with God is asked for and given through the ministry of the Church.[16]

The introduction (praenotanda) to the Rite of Penance gives a summary but important treatment of the mystery of reconciliation in the history of salvation, the reconciliation of penitents in the Church's life, and the several offices and ministries of reconciliation, including the role of the Christian community as a whole:

[13] RPenance 40, DOL 3105.

[14] RPenance 46; 19; 21; DOL 3084, 3086.

[15] See A. Bugnini, ed., The Reform of the Liturgy (1948–1975) (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1990) 667–670.

[16] RPenance 19, DOL 3084.

> The whole Church, as a priestly people, acts in different ways in the work of reconciliation that has been entrusted to it by the Lord. Not only does the Church call sinners to repentance by preaching the word of God, but it also intercedes for them and helps penitents with a maternal care and solicitude to acknowledge and confess their sins and to obtain the mercy of God, who alone can forgive sins. Further, the Church becomes the instrument of the conversion and absolution of the penitent through the ministry entrusted by Christ to the apostles and their successors.[17]

Remission of Canonical Censures

The title on penance is concerned with the sacramental remission of sins. This is kept distinct from the remission of the canonical sanctions with which Book VI of the code is concerned—both the medicinal penalties or censures defined in canons 1331–1335 and the expiatory penalties of canons 1336–1338. Nevertheless, the remission or cessation of censures (excommunication, interdict, and the suspension of ordained ministers) may take place in connection with and on the occasion of sacramental reconciliation. The minister of the sacrament, if he is empowered by the law to remit censures (in particular by c. 1357), must on this occasion observe the norms of Book IV, title IV, the present series of canons on the sacrament itself.

While the act of remitting canonical censures differs clearly from the sacramental absolution of sins and is defined rather as the remission of an ecclesiastical penal sanction, the Roman Ritual makes special provision:

> The form of [sacramental] absolution is not to be changed when a priest, in keeping with the provision of law, absolves a properly disposed penitent from a censure latae sententiae. It is enough that he intend also to absolve from censures. Before absolving from sins, however, the confessor may [separately and distinctly] absolve from the censure, using the formula which is given below for absolution from censure outside the sacrament of penance.
>
> When a priest, in accordance with the law, absolves a penitent from a censure outside the sacrament of penance, he uses the following formula: By the power granted to me, / I absolve you / from the bond of excommunication (or suspension or interdict). / In the name of the Father, and of the Son, + / and of the Holy Spirit. The penitent answers: Amen.[18]

Thus two possibilities are envisioned for the celebration of the sacrament of penance for one who is also under canonical censure: (1) The minister, if the law permits him to do so, first remits the canonical censure in a distinct act—using the extra-sacramental formula already quoted—before the absolution from sin. (2) Alternatively, the minister of the sacrament, again if the law permits him to do so, remits the censure in the very act of absolving from sin, with or even without the specific formula.

Nature of the Sacrament

Canon 959 — In the sacrament of penance the faithful who confess their sins to a legitimate minister, are sorry for them, and intend to reform themselves obtain from God through the absolution imparted by the same minister forgiveness for the sins they have committed after baptism

[17] RPenance 8, DOL 3073. See Mt 18:18; Jn 20:23.

[18] RPenance, Appendix I, 1–2. The text of the first paragraph, as it appeared in the RPenance, has been altered slightly (omitting "Until other provision is made and as may be necessary, the present regulations which make recourse to the competent authority obligatory are to be observed") in the light of the recodification. See CDW, decr Promulgato Codice Iuris Canonici, September 12, 1983, N 20 (1983) 540–555 [cited as Variationes]; in English, Emendations in the Liturgical Books Following upon the New Code of Canon Law (Washington, D.C.: ICEL, 1984) 20.

and, at the same time, are reconciled with the Church which they have wounded by sinning.

The text of canon 959 expands considerably canon 870 of the 1917 code. It deliberately removes the description of absolution as "judicial" (but see c. 978, §1) and adds a specific mention of the several acts of the penitent: confession of sins, sorrow for the sins confessed, proposal or resolution to reform—the latter corresponding to the nature of penance as conversion or change. (For the act or acts of satisfaction, see c. 981.) Moreover, the text mentions, as the older law did not, that the forgiveness is from God (alone) and adds the concept of reconciliation with the church community, as intended by the conciliar fathers of Vatican II.[19]

This succinct doctrinal canon may and should be supplemented by the introduction to the Rite of Penance already mentioned. Later canons such as 987 also enlarge upon the disposition of the penitent who comes to celebrate the sacrament.

Subsequent to the code and in the aftermath of the 1983 ordinary assembly of the synod of bishops, John Paul II issued an important apostolic exhortation, with reflections upon "reconciliation and penance in the mission of the Church."[20] The document, however, did not alter the canonical discipline of the sacrament in such matters as general sacramental absolution, a matter much controverted at the 1983 synod, nor did it concentrate greatly upon the ecclesial dimension of the sacrament.

CHAPTER I
THE CELEBRATION OF THE SACRAMENT
[cc. 960–964]

This brief chapter of five canons treats in succession: (1) individual and integral confession of sins and absolution (c. 960); (2) general absolution without previous individual confession (cc. 961–963); and (3) the place for the celebration of the sacrament with individual confession (c. 964). Nothing is said directly about the liturgical celebration itself, aside from the penitent's confession of sins and the discipline affecting absolution or reconciliation; the norms for celebration are left to the Rite of Penance in the Roman Ritual. Nor is there reference to the second rite of reconciliation, namely, communal celebration of the sacrament with individual confession and individual absolution, or to communal penitential celebrations without sacramental reconciliation—both of which are significant elements in the reformed Roman liturgy of penance.

Canons 961–963 have been introduced in the light of the greater possibility of general sacramental absolution, to which the Roman Ritual devotes a full and lengthy rite described already: song and opening prayer, celebration of the word of God with homily, general confession and absolution, concluding thanksgiving, song or hymn, and blessing —but only "for cases foreseen in the law."[21]

Individual Reconciliation

Canon 960 — Individual and integral confession and absolution constitute the only ordinary means by which a member of the faithful conscious of grave sin is reconciled with God and the Church. Only physical or moral impossibility excuses from confession of this type; in such a case reconciliation can be obtained by other means.

The first clause of canon 960, in dealing with individual reconciliation of penitents, does so in contrast to the three canons that follow. The mention of integral confession of sins made by the penitent to the minister of the sacrament is based upon the teaching of the Council of Trent. Reflecting the developed Scholastic doctrine of the sacrament, the council anathematized those who held > that in the sacrament of penance for the remission of sins it is not necessary by divine

[19] SC 72; see the beginning of the commentary on this sacrament.

[20] Reconciliatio et Paenitentia, December 2, 1984, AAS 77 (1985) 185–275.

[21] RPenance 60–63.

> law to confess each and every mortal sin, which one recalls upon due and diligent prior reflection, even occult sins and those which are against the two final precepts of the decalogue, and the circumstances which change the species of the sin.[22]

Although there has been some dispute concerning the expression iure divino in this text, since the traditions of penitential discipline were so diverse in earlier centuries, the present canon does not depart from the expectation of the integrity and specificity of the confession of sins. The matter is taken up directly in canon 988, §1.

The statement of the canon has been rephrased somewhat from canon 901 of the 1917 code. The latter explained the meaning of integral confession as requiring mention of all sins of which the penitent is conscious and of the circumstances which make a specific change in the sin. This has been understood, again in accord with Tridentine teaching, not in reference to aggravating circumstances but only to circumstances which make the sin a violation of a specifically different precept or virtue.[23]

These elements of the canon anticipate what is determined in greater detail in chapter 3 about the penitent, especially canons 987–989. What is distinctive in the present canon is the limited acknowledgment that this primary manner of celebrating the sacrament (the "first rite for reconciliation"), with full and individual confession of sins prior to absolution or reconciliation, is the only ordinary means or mode by which a believer conscious of a grave sin committed after baptism is reconciled to God and the Christian community. This provides an opening to canons 961–963 on the exceptional, out-of-the-ordinary, mode of reconciliation.

In addition, the language of the first part of the canon reflects contemporary theology and the teaching of Vatican II, which have recovered the tradition that sacramental penance involves ecclesial reconciliation. This was of course more evident in antiquity and the early medieval period, for example, when one acknowledged his or her grave (and public) sins at the beginning of Lent and was reconciled publicly on Holy Thursday in the common assembly (as described above).

The second part of canon 960 introduces the common teaching of moral theology which recognizes excuses from individual and integral confession because of physical or moral impossibility, a matter that was not mentioned in this context by the 1917 code. These kinds of impossibility may embrace a variety of physical and moral (even psychological) incapacities on the part of the penitent, the latter's relationship to the only available ministers, circumstances of time or place, etc. The alternative means of sacramental reconciliation which are referred to include a less than complete individual confession of sins followed by individual absolution and, in addition, the exceptional mode regulated by the three canons which follow. Reconciliation with God and the Church may of course also be accomplished by means of sacraments other than penance, above all through the eucharistic celebration, as well as by non-sacramental penance and contrition.

The succinct statement of this canon is enlarged upon in the introduction to the Rite of Penance where, after a doctrinal exposition of the mystery of reconciliation, there is a section on "Reconciliation of Penitents in the Church's Life."[24] This part of the Roman Ritual deals successively with the Church itself as both holy and always in need of purification; penance in the Church's life and liturgy; reconciliation with God and with the Church; the traditional "parts" of the sacrament: contrition, confession, the act of penance or expiation, and the actual absolution or reconciliation; and the need for and benefit of sacramental penance as the celebration of the Church's faith, thanksgiving, and sacrifice.

Although the code fails to advert to the "second rite for reconciliation" spelled out at length in the [22] Sess. XIV, de poenitentia, c. 9.

[23] J. Abbo and J. Hannan, The Sacred Canons, 2 vols. (St. Louis: B. Herder, 1960) 2:28–29.

[24] RPenance 3–7, DOL 3068–3072.

Rite of Penance, that rite falls under canon 960 as an ordinary means of celebrating the sacrament, inasmuch as the individual and integral confession of sins and also individual absolution fall within it, that is, as the canon defines "ordinary."

Canon 720, §1 of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches is derived verbatim from Latin church canon 960. Similarly, in cases of general reconciliation (below), canon 720, §2 is substantially the same as Latin canon 961, §2; canon 720, §3 is derived from Latin canon 961, §2; and canon 721 from Latin canon 962. Latin canon 963, however, has no parallel in the Eastern code.

General Reconciliation

Canon 961 — §1. Absolution cannot be imparted in a general manner to many penitents at once without previous individual confession unless:

1° danger of death is imminent and there is insufficient time for the priest or priests to hear the confessions of the individual penitents;

2° there is grave necessity, that is, when in view of the number of penitents, there are not enough confessors available to hear the confessions of individuals properly within a suitable period of time in such a way that the penitents are forced to be deprived for a long while of sacramental grace or holy communion through no fault of their own. Sufficient necessity is not considered to exist when confessors cannot be present due only to the large number of penitents such as can occur on some great feast or pilgrimage.

§2. It belongs to the diocesan bishop to judge whether the conditions required according to the norm of §1, n. 2 are present. He can determine the cases of such necessity, attentive to the criteria agreed upon with the other members of the conference of bishops.

The immediate antecedent of the three new canons, 961–963, on general sacramental absolution without previous individual confession of sins is the 1973 Rite of Penance. This third rite, as given in the Roman Ritual, appears there to be an ordinary and usual mode of communal reconciliation. The introduction to the Rite of Penance, however, is based on the Normae pastorales issued in the preceding year by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith; this document[25] had severely restricted the "ordinary" celebration of the third rite. The norm of the Roman Ritual, prior to the promulgation of the code, was revised in the light of the 1972 pastoral norms and reads:

> Special, occasional circumstances may render it lawful and even necessary to give general absolution to a number of penitents without their previous individual confession.
>
> In addition to the danger of death, general absolution for many of the faithful who have confessed generically, but have been rightly disposed for penance, is lawful if there is a serious need. This means a case in which, given the number of penitents, not enough confessors are available to hear the individual confessions properly within a reasonable time, with the result that, through no fault of their own, the faithful would be forced to be for a long time [diu] without the grace of the sacrament [of penance] or without communion. Such a situation may occur in mission lands particularly, but in other places as well and in groups of people to whom the serious need mentioned clearly applies.
>
> When confessors can be made available, however, the procedure is not lawful solely on the basis of a large number of penitents, for example, at some great festival or pilgrimage.
>
> It belongs exclusively to the local Ordinary, after consultation with other members of the conference of bishops, to make the judgment on whether the conditions stated already are verified and therefore to decide when it is lawful to give general absolution.

[25] CDF, Normae pastorales circa absolutionem generali modo impertiendam, June 16, 1972, AAS 64 (1972) 510–514, DOL 3038–3051.

If, apart from the instances established by the local Ordinary, any other serious need arises for general absolution, a priest is bound first, whenever possible, to have recourse to the local Ordinary in order to give the general absolution. If this is not possible, he is to inform the same Ordinary as soon as possible of the need in question and of the fact of the absolution.[26]

The terms of this pre-codal law reflect in part the existing discipline of 1973, i.e., before the issuance of the Rite of Penance. During World War II, the Apostolic Penitentiary had issued an instruction on the subject, indicating that (1) general sacramental absolution is permissible for serious and urgent cause even in circumstances other than the danger of death; (2) local ordinaries are competent to permit this absolution; and (3) the (individual) rite for the sacrament of penance in the existing Roman Ritual should be followed but with the liturgical texts in the plural—since the ritual did not then contain a special rite for these circumstances.[27]

As already mentioned, the revised Rite of Penance does provide such a rite, relying upon the canonical discipline in force but including the substance of the 1972 pastoral norms of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith as part of the prenotes. (It also has a very brief rite for general absolution in emergency circumstances, such as the imminent danger of death, i.e., when none of the three rites can be used in its entirety.)

When the norms of the Roman Ritual quoted above are compared with canon 961, several changes are evident: (1) greater specificity concerning the danger of death as one of the reasons permitting the use of the third rite; (2) suppression (but not denial) of the ritual's positive observation concerning instances in mission lands and elsewhere where the serious need "clearly applies"; (3) restriction of the permission to diocesan bishops rather than local ordinaries; (4) requirement that the bishop's decision be made in the light of "criteria agreed upon" with the other members of the conference of bishops, if such criteria have been enacted (and not merely after consultation with the other bishops); and (5) omission of a possible judgment by a minister of the sacrament that general absolution may be given when recourse to the diocesan bishop is impossible.[28]

With regard to this last matter, the possible decision of the minister himself, the ordinary principles of moral theology about impossibility of recourse in situations of necessity may be applied.[29] The canonical obligation to report to the diocesan bishop after the fact no longer exists; it has been removed from the ritual along with specific mention of impossibility of recourse.

The other changes listed above, especially (3) and (4), are further restrictions placed by the canon upon the celebration of general reconciliation. This has been recognized in variants introduced into the Rite of Penance, so that its norms conform literally with the present canon.[30] The Apostolic See has repeatedly expressed concern lest the norms limiting general sacramental absolution be exceeded to the (further) diminution of auricular confession.[31]

The language of the canon, even with these further inhibitions, continues to permit the cele-

[26] RPenance 31–32, DOL 3096–3097.

[27] Apostolic Penitentiary, instr March 25, 1944, AAS 36 (1944) 155–156. The development of the third rite of penance, although introduced in the light of recommendations by the conciliar fathers of Vatican II, was closely tied to the discipline of this document. See Bugnini, 651–655.

[28] The dispositions of cc. 961–963 replace, to the extent necessary, the corresponding norms of the introduction to RPenance 31–34 (and also the Normae pastorales of 1972, from which cc. 961–963 likewise differ, as noted in the text). See CDW, Emendations 17–20 (note 18, above).

[29] Rel 228.

[30] See note 18, above.

[31] CDF, letter January 14, 1977, BCLN, November 13, 1977, 57–58, DOL 3127–3132. Paul VI, address April 3, 1974, N 10 (1974) 225–227, DOL 3110–3113.

bration of the third rite if the conditions are fulfilled. As Paul VI explicitly asserted, the enlarged possibility of general sacramental absolution was introduced "with our special approval and by our mandate."[32] With particular reference to the language of canon 961, the availability of confessors is a relative matter: it depends on the size of the congregation of penitents, the period of time needed for the proper celebration of the sacrament of penance (i.e., in accord with the third rite found in the revised ritual), the remoteness of the community and its size, which might deny freedom of choice of confessors or desired anonymity to penitents, etc.

The extended deprivation of sacramental grace mentioned in the canon as justifying general absolution refers to the grace of the sacrament of penance;[33] this deprivation may create a spiritual hardship for those not conscious of grave sin as well as for those who are conscious of grave sin and who would therefore be deprived not only of sacramental penance but also of sacramental communion. Finally, the lengthy period of time has to be understood relatively, as in other instances, in terms of a rather limited time, even a day's deprivation of the sacrament of penance.[34] In the United States, an interpretation of the meaning of "a long while" [diu] as "one month" was made by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in 1988, but no decree was issued to this effect.[35]

The canon balances carefully the exceptional character of the rite of general absolution with pastoral criteria, to be judged by the diocesan bishop in harmony with any criteria that may have been approved by the conference of bishops. The judgment of the bishop or the criteria of the conference may justify or require the celebration even though the serious need cannot be characterized as creating an emergency situation.

It is of course true that, even in the circumstances in which the law does not permit the celebration of general reconciliation without prior individual confession of sins, those conscious of grave sin may indeed receive divine pardon in view of the degree and kind of their contrition ("perfect contrition") apart from the sacrament itself.[36] Such persons are nonetheless deprived of the grace of the sacrament of penance[37] and share less perfectly in the dimension of ecclesial reconciliation. The same is true of those who are conscious of only lesser or venial sins, which may indeed be remitted in ways other than the sacrament; in the circumstances such persons are likewise deprived of sacramental reconciliation.

In the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, Latin code canons 960 and 961 are combined—in substantially the same language, with allowance for different hierarchical names—into canon 720 (960 in §1 of CCEO 720, 961 in §2). This Eastern dependence on the (new) discipline of the Latin church on general sacramental absolution is continued in the next canon: canon 721 of the Eastern code is derived from Latin canon 962—but with the single significant omission of any reference to validity in canon 721, §1.

Canon 962 — §1. For a member of the Christian faithful validly to receive sacramental absolution given to many at one time, it is required not only that the person is properly disposed but also at the same time intends to confess within a suitable

[32] Paul VI, address April 20, 1978, AAS 70 (1978) 328–332, DOL 3138–3139.

[33] "gratia sacramentali aut sacra communione diu carere cogantur."

[34] See E. F. Regatillo and M. Zalba, Theologiae Moralis Summa, III (Madrid: BAC, 1954) 917 (cited as Regatillo-Zalba).

[35] Approved, general meeting, June 1988; CDWDS indicated that the interpretation was not a decree and needed no recognitio: "Complementary Norms" (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1991) 12. See also CLD 11, 238–244.

[36] International Theological Commission, report "Penance and Reconciliation," 1983, C, II, 4, Origins 13 (1984) 513–524.

[37] The various redactions of this text (Normae pastorales, RPenance, and the schemata of the code) differ, but they always refer to the gratia sacramentalis of penance and distinguish it from (the deprivation of) holy communion, a deprivation which affects only those conscious of the continuing guilt of grave sin. See also the commentary on c. 988, §2, below.

period of time each grave sin which at the present time cannot be so confessed.

§2. Insofar as it can be done even on the occasion of the reception of general absolution, the Christian faithful are to be instructed about the requirements of the norm of §1. An exhortation that each person take care to make an act of contrition is to precede general absolution even in the case of danger of death, if there is time.

Canon 962, §1 makes a twofold demand: (1) suitable disposition and (2) intent to confess (later) the serious sins that cannot be confessed at the time of general sacramental absolution.

The disposition to which paragraph one refers includes the inner conversion which "embraces sorrow for sin and the intent to lead a new life... expressed through confession made to the Church, due expiation, and amendment of life. God grants pardon through the Church, which works by the ministry of priests."[38] The Rite of Penance, even prior to the 1983 recodification, had specified these dispositions in relation to general sacramental absolution, namely, that those present "repent individually of their sins, have the intention of refraining from them, are resolved to rectify scandal or injuries they may have caused..."[39] The purpose of paragraph one of the canon is to repeat, under pain of invalidity of the absolution (which the Roman Ritual had not mentioned), a resolution or disposition special to the exceptional circumstances of general sacramental reconciliation. This disposition includes the intent to confess individually in due time the grave sins which could not be confessed individually on the occasion of general absolution.

The due time to which paragraph one refers for individual confession is further specified in the next canon ("as soon as possible") and, more generally, by the traditional precept of at least annual confession of grave sins, as found in canon 989.

[38] RPenance 6, DOL 3071; on the Church's ministry, see the revised formula of the sacrament, at the beginning of the commentary on this title.

[39] RPenance 33, DOL 3098.

Next, the norm of paragraph two of canon 962 may be seen as a specification of canon 988, §1, which speaks of the fundamental obligation to confess grave sins committed after baptism that have not yet been confessed in individual or auricular confession. In this way the usual ecclesiastical or canonical discipline is maintained. The mention of "even in the case of danger of death, if there is time" is applicable to the short rite of absolution[40] rather than to the complete and lengthy third rite of reconciliation of several penitents with general confession and absolution.

Canon 962, §2 is derived immediately from a similar injunction in the Rite of Penance and the specific norm that, after the homily of the third rite, there be a brief instruction or monitio concerning the requisite and special dispositions of penitents. The act of contrition, which is called simply a "general confession," follows this pattern in the full rite of general absolution:

> The deacon, another minister, or the priest then [after the homily and instruction] calls upon the penitents to show their intention by some sign (for example, by bowing their heads, kneeling, or giving some other sign determined by the conference of bishops). They should also say together a form of general confession (for example, the prayer I confess to almighty God), which may be followed by a litany or a penitential song. Then the Lord's Prayer is sung or said by all...
>
> Then the priest pronounces the invocation that expresses prayer for the grace of the Holy Spirit to pardon sin, the proclamation of victory over sin through Christ's death and resurrection, and the sacramental absolution given to the penitents.[41]

For the United States, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops decreed in 1974 that the sign of penance before general sacramental absolution should be determined and announced by the minister, namely, an "appropriate external sign of penance to be shown, e.g., kneeling, bowing of the head, bowing deeply, standing (if the penitents have been kneeling), a gesture such as the sign of the cross, etc."[42]

[40] RPenance 64–65.

[41] RPenance 35, DOL 3100.

Canon 963 — Without prejudice to the obligation mentioned in can. 989, a person whose grave sins are remitted by general absolution is to approach individual confession as soon as possible, given the opportunity, before receiving another general absolution, unless a just cause intervenes.

This canon contains a precept distinct from that of canon 989, in which the annual confession of grave sins is prescribed as a minimum. In other words, the present norm may oblige even before the lapse of a year's time, i.e., as soon as possible after the celebration of general sacramental reconciliation. Since the divine and ecclesial sacramental reconciliation has already taken place, the norm must be considered an ecclesiastical law specifying when the intention to confess individually (c. 962) should be fulfilled.

Nonetheless, the language of the canon recognizes, as did the Rite of Penance and the Normae pastorales which preceded it, that there may be a just cause which may excuse from individual confession "as soon as possible." This just cause may be the same as the one which justified the general sacramental absolution in the first place, such as the remoteness of the area and the lack of ministers of the sacrament, so long as that condition or cause continues. There is of course no obligation to confess sins which are not grave, as canon 988, §1 makes clear, however much the confession of venial sins may be recommended (c. 988, §2).

The Eastern code departs from the Latin discipline on general sacramental absolution by omitting anything comparable to the above canon 963.

[42] BCLN 1965–1975 (December 1974) 450; see R. Keifer and F. R. McManus, The Rite of Penance: Commentaries; I, Understanding the Document (Washington, D.C.: Liturgical Conference, 1975) 128–129.

Place of Celebration

Canon 964 — §1. The proper place to hear sacramental confessions is a church or oratory.

§2. The conference of bishops is to establish norms regarding the confessional; it is to take care, however, that there are always confessionals with a fixed grate between the penitent and the confessor in an open place so that the faithful who wish to can use them freely.

§3. Confessions are not to be heard outside a confessional without a just cause.

The final form of this canon is the result of several variant redactions during the recodification process. In particular, canons 909–910 of the former code had singled out the confessions of women for special restrictions, indicating that the confessional for their celebration of the sacrament should be in an open and conspicuous place, while permitting the sacrament to be celebrated for male penitents even in private homes. In some places, moreover, it was customary and acceptable for the confessions of men to take place regularly in rooms, sacristies, and other areas without the use of a special confessional. It was (and is) always understood, finally, that in many circumstances such as sickness the sacrament is properly celebrated in any appropriate or available place.

In the revised Roman Ritual the prescriptions of the 1917 code were referred to as continuing in force,[43] but it was left to the conferences of bishops to make further (and different) determinations "about the place proper for the ordinary celebration of the sacrament of penance" and to priests and especially pastors to "choose a place more suitable for the celebration according to the regulations of the conference of bishops, so that the entire celebration may be enriching and effective."[44] In the light of this, with the development of chapels or rooms of reconciliation as alternatives to the modern style of confessional (or in combination with such a confessional), the conference of bishops in 1974 decreed for the United States that it is > considered desirable that small chapels or rooms of reconciliation be provided in which penitents might choose to confess their sins through an informal face-to-face exchange with the priest, with the opportunity for appropriate spiritual counsel. It would also be regarded as desirable that such chapels or rooms be designed to afford the option of the penitent's kneeling at the fixed confessional grille in the usual way, but in every case the freedom of the penitent is to be respected.[45]

[43] RPenance 12, DOL 3077.

[44] RPenance 38b, DOL 3103; 40, DOL 3105.

A further elaboration was later given by the United States Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, which recommended:

> A room or rooms for the reconciliation of individual penitents may be located near the baptismal area (when it is at the entrance) or in another convenient place. Furnishings and decoration should be simple and austere, offering the penitent a choice between face-to-face encounter or the anonymity provided by a screen, with nothing superfluous in evidence beyond a simple cross, table and bible. The purpose of this room is primarily for the celebration of the reconciliation liturgy; it is not a lounge, counseling room, etc. The word "chapel" more appropriately describes this space.[46]

Early drafts of the recodification left the matter generally to the conference of bishops, with the requirement that there be available a confessional with a fixed screen or grille. Later in the process a norm was introduced or reintroduced to require that the confessions of women take place in a confessional with a fixed screen "except by reason of infirmity or other necessity."[47] In the final promulgated text, the present form of paragraph three appears without any reference to or restriction upon the confessions of women.

The reasoning behind paragraph one of this canon is that the sacrament, even though celebrated regularly in a rather individualized and private rite, is an ecclesial celebration for which the place of the communal liturgical assembly, namely, a church or oratory, is appropriate.

The provision of the confessional or confessional seat is retained in paragraphs two and three. The common form of booth, with a place for the penitent (either open to public view or enclosed but separate from the seat of the minister), is not prescribed, unless by particular law. Confessionals in one or other of these styles, e.g., with or without a door or doors, with or without curtains or drapes, were introduced after the Council of Trent and spread widely in the Latin church.[48] The canon, however, prescribes only that the seat of the confessor be in an open place and that there be a screen or grille between the penitent and the confessor; no norm is given concerning the style or form of the fixed dividing barrier.

The purpose of this norm is of course to afford the penitent anonymity if he or she desires and to make certain that there is no suspicion of impropriety in the confessor-penitent relationship. The chapel or room of reconciliation in which a "confessional" area with a fixed screen is incorporated fully satisfies the norm. If the chapel or room does not itself incorporate an area with a fixed screen, the latter must be available elsewhere.

In accord with paragraph three, the use of the usual confessional remains prescribed, but the confession may take place elsewhere for a just cause, namely, a lesser reason than the "necessity" earlier intended by the codifiers. The value

[45] BCLN 1965–1975 (December 1974) 450.

[46] Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (Washington, D.C.: USCC: 1978), n. 81.

[47] Comm 10 (1978) 68–69.

[48] On the introduction of such confessionals, and the several styles, see J. B. O'Connell, Church Building and Furnishing: The Church's Way (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1955) 72–73.

of opportunities for informal face-to-face exchange and for spiritual counsel cited by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (above) is a just cause for that body's encouragement of and preference for the chapels or rooms in which the penitent remains free to choose face-to-face confession or the anonymity provided by the confessional screen. As is obvious, the "just cause" also includes the very many circumstances outside churches and oratories, whether homes or hospitals or entirely secular places, where the hearing of confessions is reasonably requested.

A different and much simpler discipline concerning the place of celebration of penance is followed in the Eastern churches. Canon 736 of the Eastern code states that the proper place is a church, but, with due regard for particular law on the matter in case of infirmity or other just cause, the celebration may take place outside a church (§2).

CHAPTER II
THE MINISTER OF THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE
[cc. 965–986]

The first half of this chapter deals directly with the priest as minister of this sacrament and with his faculty to minister. After an introductory canon, the acquisition of the faculty (cc. 966–969) is treated, along with special qualifications in those who may have the faculty and the terms of the faculty itself (cc. 970–973), and finally the cessation of the faculty (cc. 974–975).

The other eleven canons of the chapter deal with several matters closely related to the exercise of the sacramental ministry of reconciliation by priests: (1) special cases of absolution (cc. 976–977); (2) the manner of receiving the confession of sins, granting absolution, and imposing an act of penance or satisfaction (c. 978–981); (3) the false denunciation of confessors (c. 982); (4) confidentiality, including above all the sacramental seal (cc. 983–985); and (5) the duty or responsibility to exercise the ministry of reconciliation (c. 986).

There is relatively little on the canonical faculty to minister in the revised Roman Ritual, except for a brief pastoral exhortation to priests[49] and a basic statement in which the priest's ministry is placed in an ecclesial context:

> The whole Church, as a priestly people, acts in different ways in the work of reconciliation that has been entrusted to it by the Lord . . .
>
> The Church exercises the ministry of the sacrament of penance through bishops and presbyters. By preaching God's word [newly introduced as a formal element of the actual rite of sacramental reconciliation] they call the faithful to conversion; in the name of Christ and by the power of the Holy Spirit they declare and grant the forgiveness of sins.
>
> In the exercise of this ministry presbyters act in communion with the bishop and share in his power and office as the one who regulates the penitential discipline.
>
> The competent minister of the sacrament of penance is a presbyter who has the faculty to absolve in accordance with canon law.[50]

Thus the role of the minister is asserted to include both declaring and granting the forgiveness of sins. This is in accord with the teaching of the Council of Trent, which repudiated any assertion that ecclesial reconciliation was merely a matter of declaring God's forgiveness or was void of judgmental (as well as other) dimensions.[51] The relationship of the presbyter to the bishop, who is the moderator of the liturgy and of the penitential discipline in the local church, is expressed in two ways: fundamentally as communion within the presbyterate headed by the bishop and canonically as possession of the faculty to reconcile or absolve sinners. There is concern in the new redaction of canons, however, not to speak of the sacramental exercise of the faculty as jurisdiction, as was done in the past, even though the actual concession of the faculty by law or otherwise is an exercise of the executive power of governance.

[49] RPenance 10, DOL 3075.

[50] RPenance 8–9, DOL 3073–3074. On the bishop of the particular church as moderator of penitential discipline, see LG 26.

[51] Sess. XIV, de poenitentia, c. 9.

The faculty to minister this sacrament to penitents is generally referred to in the canons as the faculty to "hear" confessions, although such terminology refers to only part of the rite. The terminology always has to be understood as referring to the authorization to minister the sacrament, to absolve from sins as well as to receive ("hear") the confession of sins.

A similar usage is found in the canonical reference to the minister as "confessor," which is regularly retained in the canons. It corresponds also to the popular and even traditional practice of referring to the sacrament as "confession" rather than penance or reconciliation, although the revised ritual is careful to retain "penance" and to introduce "reconciliation."[52] The popular and canonical emphasis upon the confessional dimension of the sacrament has been explained as reflecting a modern concentration upon this aspect, which was less prominent in ancient and medieval times:

> The form of the acts of the penitent was also subject [in the historical development of the sacrament] to a noteworthy change. It often happened that one of these was emphasized so much that the others were relegated to the background. Public penance in the primitive Church stood under the sign of public satisfaction which lasted for a set period of time; private penance in the Middle Ages and in the modern period, on the other hand, underlined the importance of contrition; in our own time, the accent is more on confession.[53]

The accent on confession is indeed greater in the canons of this chapter and the next. The ritual's emphasis, on the other hand, is on divine and ecclesial reconciliation as well as on contrition, confession, and satisfaction.

The present chapter 2 introduces a more generous recognition of confessional faculties than in the past, as already mentioned at the beginning of the commentary on the sacrament of penance. More important, it suppresses jurisdictional language in relation to the exercise of confessional faculties.

A certain analogy with the sacrament of confirmation is possible: over and above sacramental ordination and participation in the ordained presbyterate, some faculty or capacity or concession is needed by the minister in both cases. The analogy with confirmation is supported by canon 144, §2, which applies the institute of supplied executive power of governance or jurisdiction equally to both sacraments or, more precisely, to the concession which permits the valid exercise of the ministerial office in these instances. The pastoral purpose of that canon is clear enough: to give assurance to ministers and penitents who might otherwise succumb to scrupulosity in regard to validity of the respective sacrament.

In the case of confirmation, the addition to the power of holy orders has been variously explained; in the case of penance, the addition to the power of holy orders has been explicitly described in the past as an augmentation of jurisdiction or the power of governance.[54] The recodification, however, carefully avoids jurisdictional language in this connection. At the same time, it is clear that the church authority which is the ultimate source of the faculty to absolve or reconcile [52] The preference of the revisers of the ritual of Paul VI is evident in the use of the term "reconciling" in the name of each of the three rites of the sacrament.

[53] International Theological Commission, report, 1983, B, IV, 6, 5, Origins 13 (1984) 520.

[54] E.g., Regatillo-Zalba, 280; see CIC 872–881; these canons regularly speak of jurisdiction.

is a person, ordinarily the bishop, who himself exercises a power of governance or jurisdiction in the act of conferring the faculty.

The minister of reconciliation in these canons is the priest (bishop or presbyter) who may absolve from sins in the celebration of the sacrament of penance. Insofar as the remission of canonical sanctions is concerned, see canons 1354–1363 and, with specific reference to confessors and the remission of certain censures, canon 1357. In itself distinct from the remission of sins, this discipline has been explained briefly above, at the beginning of the commentary on the present title on the sacrament of penance.

Sacerdotal Ministry of Reconciliation

Canon 965 — A priest alone is the minister of the sacrament of penance.

Canon 966 — §1. The valid absolution of sins requires that the minister have, in addition to the power of orders, the faculty of exercising it for the faithful to whom he imparts absolution.

§2. A priest can be given this faculty either by the law itself or by a grant made by the competent authority according to the norm of can. 969.

In the first of the canons of this chapter, the Latin sacerdos is used to refer to both bishops and presbyters. The text follows the Council of Trent, which condemned the teaching of those who held that > priests are not the only ministers of absolution but it was said to each and every Christian: "Whatever you declare bound on earth shall be held bound in heaven, and whatever you declare loosed on earth shall be held loosed in heaven" and "For those whose sins you forgive, they are forgiven; for those whose sins you retain, they are retained."[55]

As already suggested, the faculty or capacity to absolve or remit sins through the celebration of sacramental reconciliation is understood as rooted in holy orders—and thus is a power for which episcopal or presbyteral ordination is necessary—but it is also understood as requiring a distinct, additional concession which permits the valid exercise of the ministry on behalf of God and the Church. This is the sense of canon 966.

Vatican II refrained from using the medieval distinction between the power of orders and the power of jurisdiction (now alternatively and preferably called the power of governance or governing).[56] Nonetheless, the distinction between the power of orders and the capacity to exercise that power is retained in relation to sacramental absolution, while avoiding any reference to jurisdiction exercised in the act of reconciling or absolving. The concept, for example, of ordinary or delegated confessional jurisdiction has been suppressed.

In principle, the determination of the faculty to absolve is based on the relationship of the minister to the penitents, namely, the particular members of the faithful who seek reconciliation. Thus, in succeeding canons the faculty is related either to the office of ministry which the priest has in respect to the penitents or to the governing power which the grantor of the faculty has in respect to the penitents.

Next, in paragraph two of canon 966 the distinction between ordinary and delegated jurisdiction, the categories employed by canon 872 of the 1917 code, has been replaced by a distinction between a faculty from the law and a faculty from a concession or grant.

In cases of error or doubt concerning the possession of the faculty of canon 966, the Church supplies the faculty, in accord with canon 144, §2, as explained above. See the commentary on canon 144, §1, which speaks of instances of "factual or legal common error and in positive and probable doubt of law or of fact." In effect, canon [55] Sess. XIV, de poenitentia, c. 10. The biblical texts are Mt 18:18 and Jn 20:23.

[56] See LG 18–29 (chap. 3); the jurisdictional terminology is used only once (LG 23) in treating the hierarchical constitution of the Church.

144, §2 employs the institute of supplied jurisdiction (now called and limited to supplied executive power of governance) to the faculty of the minister of the sacrament of penance, although it is not considered a jurisdictional faculty as such.

Faculty from the Law

Canon 967 — §1. In addition to the Roman Pontiff, cardinals have the faculty of hearing the confessions of the Christian faithful everywhere in the world by the law itself. Bishops likewise have this faculty and use it licitly everywhere unless the diocesan bishop has denied it in a particular case.

§2. Those who possess the faculty of hearing confessions habitually whether by virtue of office or by virtue of the grant of an ordinary of the place of incardination or of the place in which they have a domicile can exercise that faculty everywhere unless the local ordinary has denied it in a particular case, without prejudice to the prescripts of can. 974, §§2 and 3.

§3. Those who are provided with the faculty of hearing confessions by reason of office or grant of a competent superior according to the norm of cann. 968, §2 and 969, §2 possess the same faculty everywhere by the law itself as regards members and others living day and night in the house of the institute or society; they also use the faculty licitly unless some major superior has denied it in a particular case as regards his own subjects.

Here as elsewhere, the faculty to "hear" confessions is understood as the faculty to exercise the power of orders to "absolve" penitents from their sins. This usage is without prejudice to the natural meaning of hearing a confession of sinful actions, which may be done by anyone. Here and in succeeding canons it is simply a canonical usage referring to the sacerdotal ministry of presiding over all the elements of the sacrament of penance.

A certain distinction is made in paragraph one. The Bishop of Rome himself, who is also the head of the college of bishops, and the cardinals, as the principal ministers of the Roman diocese, absolve both validly and licitly everywhere and without restriction. Bishops other than the Roman Pontiff, whether diocesan bishops or not, are also members of the same college of bishops, and they likewise absolve validly everywhere. It is illicit, however, for them to absolve if the diocesan bishop (explicitly) prohibits the use of the universal faculty in a particular case.

A substantial reform of the discipline of confessional faculties is found in paragraph two of canon 967. The text anticipates what is determined in detail in succeeding canons and makes a broad, general determination in favor of those presbyters whose faculty is derived from their office or granted by the local ordinary—of the place of their incardination or, if they are incardinated elsewhere or are religious or others who lack diocesan incardination, from the ordinary of their place of domicile. An additional condition is that the faculty thus held or granted is habitual or regular, that is, not conceded for a particular occasion or for particular circumstances or for the benefit of a particular group alone. Once they possess the faculty in the stated circumstances, such presbyters may validly and licitly absolve the Christian faithful everywhere unless in a particular case the local ordinary refuses to permit this; they have this extended or universal faculty from the law, i.e., from canon 967, §2.

A local ordinary may not, in contravention of the common law, refuse to permit all priests from other dioceses or priests in general to exercise the faculty, as conceded here, but for cause (not specified in the canon) he may deny it to an individual presbyter or on an individual occasion. The presumption always favors the right of the minister, who possesses the faculty according to the terms described here, to exercise it everywhere.

The pastoral and practical advantages of this broadening of the discipline are evident, and the concession is related to recent, limited developments: for the convenience of penitents and ministers alike, some bishops had already agreed to concede confessional faculties to all the priests of the same province or region who had the faculty within their own particular church. An underlying reason for such concessions, including the one made in the canon, is a more authentic recognition of the communion of local or particular churches—over and above the evident pastoral convenience.

Nothing is said expressly in paragraph two concerning the validity of sacramental absolution by a presbyter who has been denied the right to exercise his faculty by a local ordinary. According to the principle set down in canon 10, an express determination of the law is needed to render an act invalid, and thus the priest in these circumstances would at first appear to act validly but illicitly.

Nevertheless, canon 974, §§2–3, to which reference is made, equates this denial or refusal by the local ordinary with the revocation of the faculty in that ordinary's territory. It is stated in canon 974, §2 that the presbyter whose faculty is revoked by a local ordinary (other than the ordinary of his place of incardination or domicile) loses the faculty but only in the territory of the revoking ordinary. As paragraph two of canon 967 indicates, its terms must be understood in conjunction with the later canon, both as to loss of the faculty (c. 974, §2) and the notification of the presbyter's own ordinary or superior (c. 974, §3). Moreover, a comparison with paragraph three of the present canon, to be discussed next, supports the position that the presbyter who is denied the faculty by a particular local ordinary absolves invalidly in the latter's territory.

The third and final paragraph of canon 967 extends a somewhat similar concession, by operation of the law, to confessors who are superiors or who have received the faculty from a competent superior of a religious institute or society of apostolic life, if it is a clerical institute of pontifical right or status. In this case, however, the faculty is limited to the absolution of penitents who are members of the institute or society or who live regularly ("day and night") in some house of the institute or society. As in paragraph two, the faculty may be exercised everywhere in respect to the penitents who are mentioned; it is exercised illicitly but validly if in a particular case the competent major superior denies the right to absolve.

A comparison of paragraphs two and three reveals that the cases are indeed analogous, but, according to the fundamental principle affecting confessional faculties, the concession within institutes and societies is restricted to the benefit of those penitents who are subject in some way—as members or as those living in religious or similar communities—to the authorities of the individual institute or society. More notably, in paragraph three it is clear that the absolution given in contravention to the will of a major superior is valid if illicit, whereas in paragraph two this more generous expression is not present.

Faculty from Office

Canon 968 — §1. In virtue of office, a local ordinary, canon penitentiary, a pastor, and those who take the place of a pastor possess the faculty of hearing confessions, each within his jurisdiction.

§2. In virtue of their office, superiors of religious institutes or societies of apostolic life that are clerical and of pontifical right, who have executive power of governance according to the norm of their constitutions, possess the faculty of hearing the confessions of their subjects and of others living day and night in the house, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 630, §4.

The preceding canon indicates at least in general terms those whose faculty to absolve comes from the law. Canon 968 determines those who have the faculty, again from the law, in virtue of an office which they hold.

The enumeration in paragraph one includes the local ordinaries named in canon 134, §§1–2 (over and above bishops, already covered by c. 967, §1) for the particular church, as the latter is defined in canon 368; the canon penitentiary of canon 508, again for the particular church; and the pastor and those who take the place of a pastor, as determined in the canons of Book II, title III, chapter 6

(cc. 515–552), for the parish or quasi-parish. Since the officeholders so enumerated have the faculty to absolve from the law and on a habitual basis, they possess it elsewhere and indeed everywhere in accord with canon 967, §2.

In canon 968, §2, a similar determination is made in favor of superiors of clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life of pontifical right, but it is limited to the celebration of the sacrament for their members and for those who live regularly in their religious houses, that is, day and night. Again, canon 967, §3 provides that the superiors in question have the same faculty throughout the institute or society. Superiors are reminded, however, that canon 630, §4 prohibits them from hearing confessions of the members subject to their authority "unless the members request it on their own initiative."

Faculty from Concession

Canon 969 — §1. The local ordinary alone is competent to confer upon any presbyters whatsoever the faculty to hear the confessions of any of the faithful. Presbyters who are members of religious institutes, however, are not to use the faculty without at least the presumed permission of their superior.

§2. The superior of a religious institute or society of apostolic life mentioned in can. 968, §2 is competent to confer upon any presbyters whatsoever the faculty to hear the confessions of their subjects and of others living day and night in the house.

The two paragraphs of canon 969 rest on the principle or rule already stated: the concession of the faculty to absolve (namely, to those presbyters who do not have it in virtue of their office or by the operation of the law itself) depends upon a power residing in the grantor over those for whom the presbyter ministers the sacrament. Thus, although the faculty to absolve is no longer considered a governing or jurisdictional power, its concession to another demands (executive) power of governance[57]—ordinary or delegated—in the grantor, and this power is in respect to the penitents rather than to the minister.

In paragraph one of canon 969, the usual situation in the particular church is envisioned in which the diocesan bishop (or one equated in law to a diocesan bishop)[58] or other local ordinary grants the faculty. The terms or conditions under which this is to be done are determined in subsequent canons (especially cc. 970–973), and paragraph one requires only that, while they may possess the faculty by concession of the respective local ordinary, presbyters who are members of religious institutes should not use it without the permission of their own superior. This permission they may presume unless the contrary is established.

Although the language of canon 874, §1 of the 1917 code, to which this canon corresponds, has been simplified, there is no restriction placed on the extent of the faculty: it is applicable for the benefit of all members of the faithful who fall within the authority of the grantor of the faculty. The required "special jurisdiction to hear, validly and licitly, the confessions of any women religious and novices whatsoever" of canon 876 of the 1917 code has simply been suppressed. Moreover, as already noted, once a presbyter receives the faculty from the local ordinary of his place of incardination or domicile on a habitual or regular basis, he possesses the faculty everywhere, in accord with canon 967, §2 and with the restriction mentioned there.

In paragraph two the same principle is applied to determine who, in addition to the local ordinary, may grant the faculty to presbyters in the case of penitents who are (1) members of a religious institute or of a society of apostolic life of pontifical right or (2) not members of the particular institute or society, but who live in the house of the institute or society. The rationale for the norm is convenience, illustrated by a reference in the 1917 code to those who dwell regularly in the religious house "by reason of service, education, hospitality, or illness" (c. 514, §1).

[57] See cc. 135–144.

[58] Canon 381, §2 collated with c. 368.

The period of one's stay in the house of an institute or society need not be protracted—a single day suffices—in order to render operative the terms of the canon by which the superior may grant the faculty or, in the usual situation, by which the presbyter who has received such a faculty from his superior may exercise it to minister to an individual.[59]

The common law does not limit the concession of this faculty to major superiors, as defined in canon 620, but the constitutions may do so, since by cross reference paragraph two incorporates the full terms of canon 968, §2: "superiors of religious institutes or societies of apostolic life that are clerical and of pontifical right, who have executive power of governance according to the norm of their constitutions." As in the parallel case of paragraph two of the present canon, once a presbyter—whether a member of the institute or society or not—receives the faculty, he possesses it throughout the institute or society, in accord with canon 967, §3 and with the restriction mentioned there.

Qualifications of Ministers

Canon 970 — The faculty to hear confessions is not to be granted except to presbyters who are found to be suitable through an examination or whose suitability is otherwise evident.

The form of examination, written or oral, is not prescribed, nor is its precise content (moral and sacramental theology, with some attention to the presbyter's pastoral capabilities). In addition to the requisite knowledge, the minister must of course satisfy the other expectations of the law, such as the discretion and prudence mentioned in canon 979, the integrity of character which confidentiality demands (cc. 983–984), etc., along with a willingness to observe the canons and the liturgical law on the sacrament.

[59] Abbo-Hannan, Sacred Canons 1:524.

On the other hand, in countries like the United States where it is usual that all priests be conceded the faculty upon ordination without restriction as to the persons to be absolved or as to the occasions for the celebration of the sacrament, the evidence of qualifications for presbyteral ordination may serve the same purpose as the examination referred to here. See canons 1050–1052, especially canon 1051 concerning the testimonial to and inquiry into an ordinand's doctrine, piety, morals, suitability, and state of physical and psychological health. In other circumstances, it is for the local ordinary to determine the form of examination and the persons to conduct the examination (the former office of synodal examiners having been suppressed in the recodification); in the case of externs or religious he may be satisfied, for example, with the evidence of qualifications or other recommendation submitted by the respective ecclesiastical superiors.

Concession to Externs

Canon 971 — The local ordinary is not to grant the faculty of hearing confessions habitually to a presbyter, even one having a domicile or quasi-domicile in his jurisdiction, unless he has first heard the ordinary of the same presbyter insofar as possible.

The canon has in mind the common situation in which the local ordinary confers the (habitual) faculty upon diocesan presbyters incardinated elsewhere or upon presbyters who are members of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life. It does not demand that the priest have a domicile or quasi-domicile within the territory of the local ordinary—although it is only in the case of the concession to presbyters who do have a domicile in the grantor's territory that the terms of canon 967, §2 become operative. In the present canon, consultation with the presbyter's own ordinary is required, if possible, before the concession of the faculty. Even if the presbyter's own ordinary advises against the grant, the local ordinary may concede the faculty, provided the other canons, and especially canon 970, are observed; in the case of a religious, however, although the local ordinary may grant the faculty, the presbyter should not use it "without at least the presumed permission" of his superior, in accord with canon 969, §1.

The norm of canon 874, §2 of the 1917 code has been suppressed: on the one hand, it obliged local ordinaries not to give the faculty to religious who had not been formally presented by their own superior; on the other hand, it required local ordinaries not to deny the faculty, without grave cause, to religious thus presented.

Period of Concession

Canon 972 — The competent authority mentioned in can. 969 can grant the faculty to hear confessions for either an indefinite or a definite period of time.

The distinction here between an indefinite and a definite period of time is somewhat different from the concept of a habitual or regular concession of the faculty in the following canon and in canon 967, §2. The grant of the faculty for an extended period of time, but still limited ("definite"), may be considered a habitual faculty, as of course is any concession for an indefinite or unlimited period.

A limitation of time may be in relation to a specified period, for example, for a year or for a specified number of months; such a limitation may be more likely in the case of presbyters who are not incardinated in the diocese of the grantor or in the case of religious who serve during a protracted but not indefinite period in the diocese. The limitation of time may also be in such terms as "for as long as you remain in the diocese." If no such limitation is expressed, the concession is presumed to be for an indefinite period, and this is usual in the case of members of the local diocesan presbyterate, whose incardination is permanent or indefinite.

It is clear, moreover, that such simple cessation of the faculty because of the terms of its concession renders subsequent absolutions invalid, unless the presbyter has the faculty under another title.

Concession in Writing

Canon 973 — The faculty to hear confessions habitually is to be granted in writing.

This canon represents a somewhat stricter norm than the corresponding canon 879, §1 of the former code, which demanded only an express concession of the faculty whether in writing or orally ("for the valid hearing of confessions"). The revision makes a written grant obligatory if the faculty is to be habitual in character, but the requirement of a written concession is not necessary for the validity of the faculty. The canon is of course not retroactive in the case of those who have received the faculty by oral concession prior to the effective date of the code.

Canon 879, §2 of the 1917 code, which prohibited any charging of a fee or payment for the faculty, has been suppressed, but such a charge would be considered simoniacal.

Revocation and Cessation

Canon 974 — §1. The local ordinary and the competent superior are not to revoke the faculty to hear confessions habitually except for a grave cause.

§2. When the faculty to hear confessions has been revoked by the local ordinary who granted it as mentioned in can. 967, §2, a presbyter loses the faculty everywhere. If some other local ordinary has revoked the faculty, the presbyter loses it only in the territory of the one who revokes it.

§3. Any local ordinary who has revoked the faculty of some presbyter to hear confessions is to inform the proper ordinary of incardination of the presbyter or, if he is a member of a religious institute, his competent superior.

§4. If the proper major superior of a presbyter has revoked the faculty to hear confessions, the presbyter loses the faulty to hear the confessions of members of the institute everywhere. If some other competent superior has revoked the faculty, however, the presbyter loses it only with regard to the subjects in the jurisdiction of that superior.

Canon 975 — Besides by revocation, the faculty mentioned in can. 967, §2 ceases by loss of office, excardination, or loss of domicile.

The direct concern of canon 974, the first of these two canons, is the possible revocation of the faculty for cause. Although not specified here, the faculty also ceases, as is evident, either upon loss of office, if in accord with canon 968 the minister possesses the faculty by reason of his office, or upon completion of the period, if in accord with canons 969–973 he possesses it by concession and the concession has been made for a definite period of time.

With regard to revocation for cause, canon 974, §1 omits any mention of "suspension" of the faculty and so removes any possible dispute about validity or invalidity of the exercise of a suspended faculty. In effect, any kind of suspension must now be equated with revocation; a subsequent concession of the faculty, after the reasons for revocation have ceased, is treated as a new grant and is necessary for the validity of absolution.

The grave cause for revocation includes such matters as the transgression of the norms of the subsequent canons on the proper conduct of the minister, if the transgression is serious, or the loss of the qualifications mentioned in canon 970.

Both paragraphs two and four of canon 974, the meaning of which is evident, are new norms made necessary by the introduction of the concession of the faculty by law in canon 967, paragraphs two and three respectively, namely, the universal exercise of a habitual or regular faculty. On the other hand, paragraph three of canon 974 simply imposes upon local ordinaries an obligation of notification should they, for serious cause, revoke the faculty of an extern or of a member of a religious institute. The prescriptions of canon 880, §§2–3 of the 1917 code, concerning revocation or similar action in the case of a pastor, of the canon penitentiary, or of all the confessors of a religious house have been omitted as unnecessary or otherwise covered; a proposed paragraph five of canon 974, on loss of the faculty because of deprivation of office and the like, was not introduced.[60]

Finally, canon 975 again treats the specific case of canon 967, §2, in which ministers "can exercise that faculty everywhere unless the local ordinary has denied it in a particular case." If the ministers who enjoy this faculty habitually in virtue of office or by grant of the ordinary of the place of incardination or the place where they have a domicile lose that office, incardination, or domicile respectively, they also lose the faculty in other places—i.e., by revocation, loss of office, excardination, or loss of domicile. (The rather analogous case of canon 967, §3 is not mentioned in canon 975 because, in the situation in question, the loss of the faculty comes about by revocation, a matter specifically covered in canon 974, §4.)

Absolution in Danger of Death

Canon 976 — Even though a priest lacks the faculty to hear confessions, he absolves validly and licitly any penitents whatsoever in danger of death from any censures and sins, even if an approved priest is present.

As noted at the beginning of the commentary on this chapter, the second half of the norms, beginning with canon 976, deals with the exercise of the ministry by the priest (bishop or presbyter) who has the requisite faculty and with certain special cases and abuses.

Canon 976 is derived from canon 882 of the 1917 code, from which it does not differ substantially. The absolution from the ecclesiastical sanction of censure in the internal forum of the sacrament of penance has been mentioned at the beginning of the commentary on this title: it is distinct from the absolution of sins and in ordinary situations requires that the minister have a special faculty to remit a censure or censures.

[60] Comm 10 (1978) 63.

The present canon, however, is all embracing: it attributes to every ordained priest the capacity to remit censures as well as to absolve from sins if a penitent is in danger of death. As understood in other contexts,[61] the danger of death does not mean that the person need be at the point of death or in extremis. As is clear, the final clause of canon 976 assures to the penitent in danger of death complete freedom in the choice of the available ministers of the sacrament. Finally, the revised canon has suppressed the norm that the absolution of an accomplice in these circumstances would be valid but illicit (CIC 884)[62] or that the penitent upon recovery would in certain circumstances be obliged to have further recourse (CIC 2252).

For the case of the penitent in danger of death seeking reconciliation from a minister who is not a Catholic, see canon 844, §2.

Absolution of an Accomplice

Canon 977 — The absolution of an accomplice in a sin against the sixth commandment of the Decalogue is invalid except in danger of death.

As noted under the preceding canon, the norm of canon 977 no longer declares illicit the absolution of an accomplice who is in danger of death.[63] In all other cases it is both illicit and invalid for a priest to absolve an accomplice, female or male, from a sin against the sixth commandment in which he and the penitent have been accomplices. There is no further restriction under pain of invalidity of absolution if the minister absolves an accomplice from other sins—whatever may be the impropriety. The matter is treated in detail by moral and pastoral theologians.

In addition to the prohibition in this canon, see canon 1378, §1 for the sanction for such a transgression, namely, automatic (latae sententiae) excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See.

Ministry of the Confessor

Canon 978 — §1. In hearing confessions the priest is to remember that he is equally a judge and a physician and has been established by God as a minister of divine justice and mercy, so that he has regard for the divine honor and the salvation of souls.

§2. In administering the sacrament, the confessor as a minister of the Church is to adhere faithfully to the doctrine of the magisterium and the norms issued by competent authority.

Canon 979 — In posing questions, the priest is to proceed with prudence and discretion, attentive to the condition and age of the penitent, and is to refrain from asking the name of an accomplice.

Canon 980 — If the confessor has no doubt about the disposition of the penitent, and the penitent seeks absolution, absolution is to be neither refused nor deferred.

The three canons quoted above form a unit to describe and direct the exercise of the ministry of reconciliation by priests.

Canon 978, §1 gives equal weight to the minister's role as judge and as healer. The Roman Ritual enlarges upon the conduct of the minister, placing the judgmental role in a somewhat secondary position:

> In order that he may fulfill his ministry properly and faithfully, understand the disorders of souls and apply the appropriate remedies to them, and act as a wise judge, the confessor must acquire the needed knowledge and prudence by constant study under the guidance of the Church's magisterium and especially by praying fervently to God. For the discernment of spirits is indeed a deep knowledge of God's working in the human heart, a gift of the Spirit, and an effect of charity....

[61] See c. 1004, §1.

[62] Benedict XIV, apconst Sacramentum poenitentiae, June 1, 1741, Document III among the documents appended to the 1917 code.

[63] Ibid.

By receiving repentant sinners and leading them to the light of the truth, the confessor fulfills a paternal function: he reveals the heart of the Father and reflects the image of Christ the Good Shepherd. He should keep in mind that he has been entrusted with the ministry of Christ, who accomplished the saving work of human redemption by mercy and by his power is present in the sacraments.[64]

The second paragraph of canon 978 is new and reflects the text of the ritual. The magisterium referred to is presumed to be the official or episcopal magisterium, as exercised by the pope and the other bishops, singly or together, in ordinary or more solemn mode. Attention has to be given to the gradations in the weight of such teaching; see canons 749–750, 752–754. What was once understood to be the magisterium of theologians is not mentioned as such in the canons, although common adherence of the Christian faithful under leadership of the sacred magisterium is affirmed as an element in holding to the one deposit of faith (c. 750).

In some ways the concern for orthodox doctrine, especially as regards moral teaching, in the context of sacramental confession and ministerial counsel differs from the concern for orthodoxy in preaching, catechesis, or other teaching. On the occasion of the sacrament of penance, and specifically on the occasion of auricular confession, there is a special importance in avoiding any disturbance of the penitent's conscience by the aberrant opinions of the minister, whether these are rigid or lax. The mention of the norms issued by authority refers to the juridical norms emanating, for example, from the diocesan bishop or the conference of bishops or found in the common law.

Canon 979 which follows is a simpler version of canon 888, §2 of the 1917 code: the priest "is to avoid entirely any inquiry concerning the name of the [penitent's] accomplice, pressing anyone with prying or useless questions, above all those concerned with the sixth commandment, and especially imprudent questions addressed to young persons about matters of which they are ignorant." Though now stated more briefly, the intent of the norm and exhortation in canon 979 remains the same as before.

Although inquiry in the course of sacramental confession about the identity of an accomplice was not uncommon in some places during the eighteenth century, it could easily lead to violation of confidentiality, as demanded in canons 983–984, and was therefore condemned as a serious abuse on the part of confessors.[65]

Finally, canon 980 affirms the presumption that the penitent has confessed his or her sins in good faith and has the requisite disposition. This does not restrict the judgmental authority of the minister in the case of the penitent who refuses to express sorrow or resolution of amendment of life. Even in these circumstances, however, the minister should make every effort to move and assist the penitent toward the proper disposition, namely, a true conversion of life.

A 1997 curial document may supplement canons 978–980 for confessors in cases involving aspects of married life and the sacrament of reconciliation.[66]

[64] RPenance 10 a and c, DOL 3075; on the presence of Christ, see SC 7.

[65] Among the sources of CIC 888, §2: Benedict XIV, ency Suprema, July 7, 1745; apconst Ubi primam, June 2, 1746; Ad eradicandum, September 28, 1746; Apostolici ministerii, December 9, 1749; CICFontes 360, 370, 373, 405, respectively. These documents and Sacramentum poenitentiae (appended to CIC) indicate the extreme seriousness of violations or potential violations of the discipline of this sacrament, and specifically of the sacramental seal.

[66] PCF, "Vade Mecum for Confessors Concerning Some Aspects of the Morality of Conjugal Life," March 1, 1997, Origins 26 (1997) 617, 619–625.

Penances or Acts of Satisfaction

Canon 981 — The confessor is to impose salutary and suitable penances in accord with the quality and number of sins, taking into account the condition of the penitent. The penitent is obliged to fulfill these personally.

The act or acts of the penitent called satisfaction or, commonly, the "penance" had to take place, in the ancient tradition and specifically in the case of grave and public offenses, during the period between the act of confession and the later reconciliation and absolution. In the development of the sacrament the act came to be postponed until after the sacramental absolution; instead the imposition of the act of satisfaction and its acceptance (i.e., the stated or implied will to fulfill the penance) suffice before sacramental reconciliation. The doctrine is expressed in the Rite of Penance of the Roman Ritual in this language:

> True conversion is completed by expiation for the sins committed, by amendment of life, and also by rectifying injuries done. The kind and extent of the expiation must be suited to the personal condition of penitents so that they may restore the order they have upset and through the corresponding remedy be cured of the sickness from which they have suffered. Therefore, it is necessary that the act of penance really be a remedy for sin and a help to renewal of life. Thus penitents, "forgetting the things that are behind" (Phil 3:13), again become part of the mystery of salvation and press on to the things that are to come.[67]

Aside from the kind of restitution or reparation for the evil that has been directly done by the sinful act of the penitent, the choice of the act or satisfaction is left to the discretion of the minister (who may, according to circumstances, leave the further choice of a specific and appropriate act to the penitent). It may be a charitable or other virtuous action, prayer, or fasting, but its correspondence to the extent and character of the sins confessed and the particular capacity of the individual penitent must be judged by the confessor.

The present canon follows canon 887 of the former law with slight changes of language. In the 1917 code there was explicit mention of the penitent's "willing acceptance" of the penance or act of satisfaction directed by the confessor. Although this has been suppressed, the refusal of the penitent to perform the proposed penance would, in the case of the confession of grave sins, be reason for the minister not to absolve. In both the former and the revised law the mention of "suitable penances" and the "condition of the penitent" suggests that the confessor not excessively burden the penitent whose resolution seems weak or who is otherwise limited and, of course, the penitent who is sick or dying.

This whole matter is further explained in the Rite of Penance:

> A penitent who has been the cause of harm or scandal to others is to be led by the priest to resolve to make due restitution.
>
> Next, the priest imposes an act of penance or expiation on the penitent; this should serve not only as atonement for past sins but also as an aid to new life and an antidote for weakness. As far as possible, therefore, the penance should correspond to the seriousness and nature of the sins. This act of penance may suitably take the form of prayer, self-denial, and especially service to neighbor and works of mercy. These will underline the fact that sin and its forgiveness have a social aspect.[68]

[67] RPenance 8c, DOL 3071. See Trent, sess. XIV, de poenitentia, cap. 8; Paul VI, apconst Indulgentiarum doctrina, January 1, 1967, nn. 2–3, AAS 59 (1967) 5–24, DOL 3156–3157.

[68] RPenance 18, DOL 3083.

False Denunciation of Confessors

Canon 982 — Whoever confesses to have denounced falsely an innocent confessor to ecclesiastical authority concerning the crime of solicitation to sin against the sixth commandment of the Decalogue is not to be absolved unless the person has first formally retracted the false denunciation and is prepared to repair damages if there are any.

Both the crime of solicitation, as here defined, and the false denunciation with which canon 982 is concerned are the subject of canonical sanctions as well. The priest who is guilty of the crime of solicitation "in the act, on the occasion, or under the pretext of confession" is to be punished according to canon 1387 (suspension, prohibitions, and deprivations in accord with the seriousness of the offense and, in more serious cases, dismissal from the clerical state). The penitent, female or male, who falsely accuses a confessor of this crime before ecclesiastical authority is punished, in accord with canon 1390, §1, with a latae sententiae interdict and, if a cleric, by suspension as well. (With regard to the different question of the validity of absolution of an accomplice, see c. 977.)

Canon 982 itself deals only with the absolution from sin of a penitent who confesses having committed false denunciation. The condition for absolution is twofold: (1) In this instance the law requires that the act of satisfaction—here formal retraction of the denunciation before an ecclesiastical authority—must have taken place before the confessor may absolve. (2) It is not necessary that other elements of damage to the falsely denounced confessor be repaired before absolution, but the penitent must declare himself or herself prepared to make such reparation.

Formerly the absolution from false denunciation was the only instance of an absolution from sin reserved by the common law to the Apostolic See, and canon 894 of the 1917 code on this matter appeared in the now suppressed chapter on the reservation of sins. The reservation has ceased in virtue of the present canon and has been replaced by the stated conditions for absolution.

A related canon of the 1917 code, on the obligation of reporting an actual case of solicitation to the local ordinary or to the Apostolic See, has been suppressed, and the relevant constitution of Benedict XIV, Sacramentum poenitentiae,[69] is no longer a part of the common law. These changes, however, do not alter the gravity or nature of the sin of solicitation or of false denunciation, as treated by moral theologians in the light of the teaching of Benedict XIV.

Confidentiality of Confession

Canon 983 — §1. The sacramental seal is inviolable; therefore it is absolutely forbidden for a confessor to betray in any way a penitent in words or in any manner and for any reason.

§2. The interpreter, if there is one, and all others who in any way have knowledge of sins from confession are also obliged to observe secrecy.

Canon 984 — §1. A confessor is prohibited completely from using knowledge acquired from confession to the detriment of the penitent even when any danger of revelation is excluded.

§2. A person who has been placed in authority cannot use in any manner for external governance the knowledge about sins which he has received in confession at any time.

The two canons, 983 and 984, deal with distinct aspects of the confidentiality which the minister—and others who may obtain similar knowledge from the celebration of this sacrament—must maintain with regard to matters learned from the individual confession of sins by penitents. Canon 983 is concerned with any kind of betrayal of a penitent, whose confession of sins is said to be under or protected by an inviolable sacramental seal, and this even if he or she has not been absolved. It is any betrayal of a person who has simply confessed in the context of the sacrament.

[69] June 1, 1741. See note 62, above, and CIC 904.

Canon 984 is next concerned with other use of knowledge obtained in the course of the individual celebration of the sacrament, even when there is no disclosure of a person's sins, that is, without any betrayal of sacramental confidentiality.

The two canons, it should be noted, do not touch upon extra-sacramental confidentiality, to which the ordained minister is bound as is any recipient of confidences, but bound even more so when the relationship of the minister to the individual is analogous to that of a professional counselor or other professional person.

First, canon 983, §1 gives a definition of the seal of the sacrament. In order to stress the gravity of the violation of the norm, without entering into the question of the gravity of the moral guilt (which is left to moral theologians), the canon uses the strong word nefas (criminal, abominable). Neither the canon nor earlier interpretations admit exceptions to the norm; this is the intent of the emphasis: "in any way... in words or in any manner and for any reason." No distinction is made among the matters confessed, whether the sinful action itself or attendant circumstances, or the acts of satisfaction or penances imposed, etc. The secrecy to be maintained concerning the penitent and his or her confession of sins is properly described as total.

In another context, that of ecclesiastical sanctions, without lessening the obligatory force of canon 983, §1, a distinction is made between direct and indirect violations of sacramental confidentiality. A direct violation, namely, one in which the penitent's identity becomes known or may readily become known (e.g., from the circumstances described or by implication) is punished by the latae sententiae excommunication of the minister, with remission of the canonical penalty reserved to the Apostolic See, in accord with canon 1388, §1. The same canon states that an indirect violation of the seal, namely, when there is only some slighter possibility or danger that the penitent may be betrayed, "is to be punished according to the gravity of the delict." Canon 983, §1 proscribes both direct and indirect violations of sacramental confidentiality.

The sacramental seal is also referred to briefly but forcefully in the ritual: "Conscious that he has come to know the secret of another's conscience only because he is God's minister, the confessor is bound by the obligation of preserving the seal of confession absolutely unbroken."[70]

The obligation of the canon is not affected by a contrary disposition of civil law in jurisdictions where communications to an ordained minister, whether sacramental or extra-sacramental, are not considered privileged at law.[71]

Since canon 990 permits (but does not oblige) penitents to confess their sins through interpreters, the latter are mentioned explicitly in paragraph two of canon 983, although the inviolability of the sacramental secrecy extends equally to all who, deliberately or indeliberately, accidentally or in any other way, come to a knowledge of sins from confession. Canon 889, §2 of the 1917 code has been somewhat rephrased so that the obligation of confidentiality which persons other than the minister have is no longer called the sacramental seal.

In this case, that of a person other than the minister himself, the canonical sanction differs from that incurred by the minister, as described above. Other persons who betray a penitent "are to be punished with a just penalty, not excluding excommunication," in accord with canon 1388, §2.

In canon 984, the second of the two related canons, other use of knowledge gained from a penitent's confession of sins may be permitted—or, according to a more prudent judgment, tolerated—only if there is no danger of revelation (i.e., of the matters disclosed in the confession and the identity of the penitent) and if no harm will come to the penitent from the confessor's use of information. Any other use of such knowledge, even if it does not constitute a direct or indirect violation of the sacramental seal of canon 983, §1, is entirely prohibited by canon 984, §1.

[70] RPenance 10d, DOL 3075.

[71] See Origins 26 (1997) 537, 539–545, for a ruling of the 9th U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, dated January 27, 1997, in which the confidentiality of sacramental confession is upheld at civil law.

The sense of paragraph one of canon 984 is that the confessor may come to the knowledge of various types of incidental information in the course of a confession or confessions. Such information may not be disclosed or even used in any way that may be detrimental to the penitent; an instance might be the use of such information in a way advantageous to the confessor, always excluding any hurt or disadvantage to the penitent.

An older instruction of the Holy Office counseled against even references in the course of preaching to matters learned in confession: even though all danger of disclosure or injury might be absent, the broad confidence of penitents in the inviolability of the sacramental secrecy might be lessened.[72] As an example, a preacher might legitimately employ information learned from confession for illustrative purposes, provided there is no possibility that the transgression might be linked to a given individual penitent; even in this case, however, if the preacher does indicate that the source of the information is a confession, he might weaken the confidence of his hearers in the inviolability of the sacramental seal.

In paragraph two of canon 984 the prohibition against the use of knowledge about sins, as distinct from any other knowledge, is directed toward ecclesiastical authorities of all kinds, lest they employ such knowledge, quite apart from any disclosure of sins, in external governance. As is evident from a reading of the text, the norm is applicable whether the action of the superior is to the advantage or disadvantage of the penitent.

Restriction of Confessors

Canon 985 — The director of novices and his associate and the rector of a seminary or other institute of education are not to hear the sacramental confessions of their students residing in the same house unless the students freely request it in particular cases.

The purpose of the prohibition contained in the present canon is clear: to assure the freedom of choice of a confessor by penitents, in accord with canon 991, in the case of special relationships which might be intimidating to a penitent or might create a needless burden for a penitent. Canon 985 does relax somewhat the norm of canon 891 of the former law, which it otherwise follows: the 1917 code permitted the persons named in the canon to hear confessions only if requested "spontaneously, in particular cases, and for a grave and urgent cause." The third of these conditions has been suppressed.

Canon 240, §2 deals with a related matter in the formation of ordained ministers, namely, that the opinion of spiritual directors and confessors may never be sought when it is a question of admission to orders or dismissal from seminaries. In addition, canon 630, §4 simply prohibits religious superiors from hearing the confessions of those subject to their authority unless requested upon the penitent's own initiative.

Responsibility for the Ministry of Reconciliation

Canon 986 — §1. All to whom the care of souls has been entrusted in virtue of some function are obliged to make provision so that the confessions of the faithful entrusted to them are heard when they reasonably seek to be heard and that they have the opportunity to approach individual confession on days and at times established for their convenience.

§2. In urgent necessity, any confessor is obliged to hear the confessions of the Christian faithful, and in danger of death, any priest is so obliged.

The canon corresponds to canon 892 of the 1917 code, except that a moral distinction of obligations, out of justice (CIC 892, §1) or out of charity (CIC 892, §2), has been omitted; the distinction is not necessarily a matter for canonical determination. The norms of canon 986 are of course an application of ministerial obligations determined in canon 843, §1 to the sacramental ministry of penance. In addition, paragraph one reflects a recent pastoral concern that more generous opportunities for auricular confession be available. Thus there is new language in the text: "and that they [the Christian faithful] have the opportunity to approach individual confession on days and at times established for their convenience." The obligation of paragraph one rests with those who have the care of souls, and it is an obligation to make provision for the sacrament even though they may not in every case celebrate the sacrament personally with penitents.

[72] June 9, 1915, ME 29 (1917) 199–201.

A similar but briefer statement appears in the Rite of Penance: "The confessor should always show himself to be ready and willing to hear the confessions of the faithful whenever they reasonably request this."[73] More directly, the pastoral norms on penance (1972) had stated: "To enable the faithful to fulfill without difficulty the obligation of individual confession, steps are to be taken to ensure that there are confessors available in places of worship on days and at times assigned for the convenience of the faithful."[74]

Although the practice of establishing fixed times for the celebration of individual reconciliation is required by paragraph one, this practice does not completely satisfy the obligation of those mentioned in that paragraph: it is also an obligation to hear the confessions of any of the faithful who reasonably seek this at times other than those scheduled. It has to be presumed that such requests are reasonable.

In addition, the otherwise appropriate practice of scheduling appointments for individual confessions does not excuse from the requirement of the designated "days and...times established for their [the faithful's] convenience," for example, before Sundays and feasts and on penitential occasions (below). The scheduled times should not be during the eucharistic celebration, and the following norms of the liturgical law are pertinent:

> The reconciliation of penitents may be celebrated in all liturgical seasons and on any day. But it is right that the faithful be informed of the day and hours at which the priest is available for this ministry. They should be encouraged to approach the sacrament of penance at times when Mass is not being celebrated ["so that the administration of the sacrament may be unhurried and that people will not be impeded from active participation in the Mass"] and preferably at the scheduled times.
>
> Lent is the season most appropriate for celebrating the sacrament of penance. Already on Ash Wednesday the people of God hear the solemn invitation, "Turn away from sin and be faithful to the Gospel." It is therefore fitting to have several penitential services during Lent, so that all the faithful may have an opportunity to be reconciled with God and their neighbor and so be able to celebrate the paschal mystery in the Easter triduum with renewed hearts.[75]

The tradition of celebrating the sacrament of reconciliation in the week before Easter, in particular on Holy Thursday before the beginning of the Easter triduum, should also be taken into account.

In paragraph two of this canon a distinction is made between a confessor and any other priest. The confessor referred to is a bishop or, if he has the necessary faculty, a presbyter. Thus the terms of the canon are that any confessor is obliged to hear confessions in cases of urgent necessity.

[73] RPenance 10b, DOL 3075.

[74] N. IX, DOL 3047. See also n. XII: Priests "are to extol its ['devotional' confession's] great benefits for the Christian life and to make it clear that they are always ready to hear such confessions whenever the faithful request," DOL 3050.

[75] RPenance 13, DOL 3078; the words quoted in brackets are the explanation given in SCRit, instr Eucharisticum mysterium, May 25, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 539–573, n. 35, DOL 1264.

"Any priest" includes those who lack the faculty to absolve and describes the obligation in danger of death, in conformity with canon 976.

CHAPTER III
THE PENITENT
[cc. 987–991]

Only five canons treat the member of the faithful who confesses his or her sins and seeks absolution: a single canon on the penitent's disposition (c. 987) is followed by two canons on the obligation to confess (cc. 988–989), a canon on the possibility or option of confessing with the intervention of an interpreter (c. 990), and a final canon on the penitent's freedom of choice in the selection of a minister (c. 991).

On the matter of "ecumenical" sharing of sacraments, and specifically the sacrament of penance, with Christians of other churches and ecclesial communities, see canon 844, §§1–4.

The canons correspond rather closely to the chapter of the 1917 code (CIC 901–907) entitled "The Subject of the Sacrament of Penance," with some omissions: (1) canon 902, which defined "sufficient but not necessary matter" for the sacrament, namely, mortal sins already confessed and venial sins—the definition remains accurate but is not needed canonically; (2) canon 904, as already noted in the commentary on canon 982, so that the canonical obligation to denounce a confessor guilty of the crime of solicitation in confession is now suppressed; and (3) canon 907, which stated that one could not satisfy the precept of confessing sins by a sacrilegious or voluntarily null confession.

The norms of this chapter—aside from oblique references to general confession and absolution—are for individual confessions of sins. For norms affecting the penitent in the case of general absolution without prior specific confession of sins, see canons 961–963. The exposition of the Roman Ritual, over and above what is said about the penitential ministry of the whole Church (quoted at the beginning of the commentary on this title of the code), may serve as introduction to the canons:

> The parts that penitents themselves have in the celebration of the sacrament are of the greatest importance.
>
> When with the proper dispositions they approach this saving remedy instituted by Christ and confess their sins, their own acts become part of the sacrament itself, which is completed when the words of absolution are spoken by the minister in the name of Christ.
>
> In this way the faithful, even as they experience and proclaim the mercy of God in their own life, are celebrating with the priest the liturgy of the Church's self-renewal.[76]

In this connection, the reform of the rite of individual confession, as decreed by Vatican II in Sacrosanctum Concilium 72, embraces liturgical elements not found in the 1614 Roman Ritual. These directly affect the penitent and make the celebration a prayerful act of public worship as well as a healing source of grace for the penitent:

> (1) A less formal welcome to the penitent has been introduced so that the priest may greet penitent Christians "with fraternal charity and, if need be, address them with friendly words." The sign of the cross is followed by some form of exhortation by the priest to the penitent to have confidence in God. Then "penitents who are unknown to the priest are advised to inform him of their state of life [for example, if they are married persons, ordained ministers, or religious], the time of their last confession, their difficulties in leading the Christian life, and anything that may help the confessor in the exercise of his ministry."[77]
>
> (2) A brief reading of the word of God by the priest or the penitent is an optional part of

[76] RPenance 11, DOL 3076.
[77] RPenance 16, DOL 3081.

the rite at this point: "For through the word of God Christians receive light to recognize their sins and are called to conversion and to confidence in God's mercy."[78]

(3) After the confession of sins and acceptance of penance, a distinct prayer for forgiveness, in the penitent's own words or in some set form of prayer, is singled out in the revised rite as a distinct ritual element: "Next, through a prayer for God's pardon the penitent expresses contrition and the resolution to begin a new life. It is advantageous for this prayer to be based on the words of Scripture."[79] For this reason, examples or models of such a prayer are given in the Rite of Penance.[80]

(4) After the prayer of sorrow and for forgiveness and after the form of absolution (explained above at the beginning of this commentary on the sacrament), accompanied by the ritual laying on of the minister's hands (or at least right hand), the celebration concludes with a proclamation of praise by the minister and the penitent ("Give thanks to the Lord, for he is good." R. "His mercy endures for ever.") and a liturgical dismissal. Finally, "the penitent continues the conversion thus begun and expresses it by a life renewed according to the Gospel and more and more steeped in the love of God, for 'love covers a multitude of sins' (1 Pt 4:8)."[81]

Because the sacrament of penance, as a liturgical celebration even in the case of individual confession, involves priest and penitent in a dialogue, the canons on the penitent have to be understood in the context of the preceding chapter on the minister. In that chapter, for example, the minister's imposition of an act of penance or satisfaction, in accord with canon 981, must be understood as coupled with the penitent's acceptance of this act and resolution to carry it out.

Disposition of the Penitent

Canon 987 — To receive the salvific remedy of the sacrament of penance, a member of the Christian faithful must be disposed in such a way that, rejecting sins committed and having a purpose of amendment, the person is turned back to God.

As is evident, the canon, which was newly redacted for the recodification, can give only a succinct statement of the requisite conditions of disposition that the penitent must have, just as Sacrosanctum Concilium 11 can speak only in general about the disposition of all who celebrate the liturgy. Under the consideration of the parts of the sacrament prior to the act of absolution and reconciliation, the ritual enlarges upon the requisite elements—both of spiritual disposition and of submission to the Church's ministry:

> The most important act of the penitent is contrition, which is "heartfelt sorrow and aversion for the sin committed along with the intention of sinning no more."[82] "We can only approach the Kingdom of Christ by metanoia. This is a profound change of the whole person by which we begin to consider, judge, and arrange our life according to the holiness and love of God, made manifest in his Son in the last days and given to us in abundance" (see Heb 1:2; Col 1:19 and passim; Eph 1:23 and passim).[83] The genuineness of penance depends on this heartfelt contrition. For conversion should affect a person from within toward a progressively deeper enlightenment and an ever-closer likeness to Christ.
>
> The sacrament of penance includes the confession of sins, which comes from true

[78] RPenance 17, DOL 3082.
[79] RPenance 19, DOL 3084.
[80] RPenance 45, 85–92.
[81] RPenance 20, DOL 3085.

[82] See Trent, sess. XIV, de poenitentia, cap. 4.
[83] Paul VI, apconst Paenitemini, February 17, 1966, AAS 58 (1966) 179, DOL 3017–3030.

knowledge of self before God and from contrition for those sins. However, the inner examination of heart and the outward accusation must be made in the light of God's mercy. Confession requires on the penitent's part the will to open the heart to the minister of God and on the minister's part a spiritual judgment by which, acting in the person of Christ, he pronounces his decision of forgiveness or retention of sins in accord with the power of the keys.

True conversion is completed by expiation for the sins committed, by amendment of life, and also by rectifying injuries done. The kind and extent of this expiation must be suited to the personal condition of the penitents so that they may restore the order that they have upset and through the corresponding remedy be cured of the sickness from which they suffered [see c. 981]. Therefore, it is necessary that the act of penance really be a remedy for sin and a help to renewal of life. Thus penitents, "forgetting the things that are behind" (Phil 3:13), again become part of the mystery of salvation and press on to the things that are to come.[84]

Finally, the ritual attempts to balance the more evident effects of the sacrament upon the penitent as an individual and the ecclesial significance referred to in canons 959–960:

Just as the wounds of sin are varied and multiple in the life of individuals and the community, so too the healing that penance provides is varied. Those who by grave sin have withdrawn from communion with God in love are called back in the sacrament of penance to the life they have lost. And those who, experiencing their weakness daily, fall into venial sins draw strength from a repeated celebration of penance to reach the full freedom of the children of God....

In order that this sacrament of healing may truly achieve its purpose among the faithful, it must take root in their entire life and move them to more fervent service of God and neighbor.

The celebration of this sacrament is thus always an act in which the Church proclaims its faith, gives thanks to God for the freedom with which Christ has made us free (see Gal 4:31), and offers its life as a spiritual sacrifice in praise of God's glory, as it hastens to meet the Lord Jesus.[85]

Obligation of the Penitent to Confess

Canon 988 — §1. A member of the Christian faithful is obliged to confess in kind and number all grave sins committed after baptism and not yet remitted directly through the keys of the Church nor acknowledged in individual confession, of which the person has knowledge after diligent examination of conscience.

§2. It is recommended to the Christian faithful that they also confess venial sins.

Canon 989 — After having reached the age of discretion, each member of the faithful is obliged to confess faithfully his or her grave sins at least once a year.

The first of these two canons is derived from canons 901–902 of the 1917 code, but with considerable reworking of the texts and, as already noted, without an explicit definition of "sufficient but not necessary matter" for the sacrament.[86]

In paragraph one of canon 988 the phrase "in kind and number" has been added to the earlier text, in order to make explicit the obligation of the penitent to inform the minister of the nature and number of grave sins being confessed so that he may make his judgment with sufficient knowledge. The phrase in question replaces the norm of canon 901 of the 1917 code, which required the penitent to "explain in confession the circumstances which may change the species of sin." The penitent is not directly obliged to indicate the circumstances of the sins in themselves, provided that he or she expresses clearly the nature and kind of sin that is confessed.

[84] RPenance 6, DOL 3071.

[85] RPenance 7, DOL 3072.

[86] See Comm 10 (1978) 70–71.

The reference to sins "not yet remitted directly through the keys of the Church," i.e., through the power and ministry of the Church, indicates the precise nature of the confessional obligation. Divine forgiveness for the sin may already have taken place; the contrition of the penitent may have been such that he or she has indeed been pardoned by God. Nevertheless, the obligation remains to submit oneself to the power and ministry of the Church in the sacrament of reconciliation. Moreover, although grave sins forgotten and thus omitted at the time of confession are indirectly remitted, the canon indicates that these too must be confessed when remembered and thus be submitted for "direct remission."

No judgment is made in the canon (or elsewhere in the law) whether such grave sins may be few or many; the distinction is at another level, namely, that grave sins committed after baptism must at some point be confessed. See the commentary on canon 960 for the law's recognition that there may be a physical or moral impossibility which excuses from the obligation expressed here in paragraph one of canon 988.

Finally, the phrase "nor acknowledged in individual confession" has been added to the original language to emphasize, in accord with canons 962, §1 and 963, that, despite the generic confession of sins before general sacramental absolution, the obligation of individually confessing grave sins remains—although they have already been remitted in the sacrament of penance in the rite of general absolution.[87]

The norm of canon 988, §1 is expressed in the ritual in less juridic terms but to the same effect: "To obtain the saving remedy of the sacrament of penance, according to the plan of our merciful God, the faithful must confess to a priest each and every grave sin that they remember after a diligent examination of conscience."[88]

According to canon 916, those conscious of grave sin not yet confessed are not to celebrate Mass or receive Holy Communion "without previous sacramental confession unless there is a grave reason and there is no opportunity to confess; in this case the person is to remember the obligation to make an act of perfect contrition which includes the resolution of confessing as soon as possible."

It is not for canon law to determine what sins, including transgressions of the ecclesiastical law itself, are grave and what sins are non-grave or venial.[89] A contemporary statement of the International Theological Commission is to the point:

> Already in the parenesis and the practice of the early Christian communities distinctions were made:
>
> a. sins which exclude from the Kingdom of God, such as leading an immoral life, idolatry, adultery, pederasty, avarice, and so on (cf. 1 Cor 6:9f.), and which also lead to exclusion from the community (cf. 1 Cor 5:1–13);
>
> b. the so-called daily sins (peccata quotidiana).
>
> The fundamental difference between grave and non-grave sins is taught by the entire tradition of the Church, even if important differences in terminology [e.g., grave, mortal, lethal, etc.] and in the appraisal of individual sins occur.[90]

A careful distinction is drawn between the two paragraphs of canon 988. Any canonical obliga-

[87] Ibid.

[88] RPenance 7a, DOL 3072; see Trent, sess. XIV, de poenitentia, cc. 7–8.

[89] See Rel, 234.

[90] Report, 1983, C, III, 2, Origins 13 (1984) 523; see also, on the canonical avoidance of distinctions between "grave" and "mortal" sins, Comm 10 (1978) 70.

tion to confess is limited to grave sins, in accord with paragraph one. But in paragraph two there is a recommendation that venial sins (and, as is understood, grave sins that have already been directly remitted) be confessed, either in so-called confessions of devotion or in connection with the confession of a grave sin.

The Rite of Penance enlarges upon this recommendation:

> The frequent and careful celebration of this sacrament is also very useful as a remedy for venial sins. This is not a mere ritual repetition or psychological exercise, but a serious striving to perfect the grace of baptism so that, as we bear in our body the death of Jesus Christ, his life may be seen in us ever more clearly [see 2 Cor 4:10]. In confession of this kind, penitents who accuse themselves of venial faults should try to be more closely conformed to Christ and to follow the voice of the Spirit more attentively.[91]

It is in accord with this understanding of the sacrament, as remedy for sins both grave and lesser, that penitents are encouraged to repeat at least generically the confession of past venial (or even grave) sins and to follow on occasion the practice of a general confession, in the sense of a confession of the sins of one's life or of an extended period of one's life.

The forgiveness of venial sins may of course be sought and obtained in many non-sacramental ways, aside from the Eucharist or penance, through both individual and communal acts, none of which is excluded by the exhortation of canon 988, §2. This recommendation of paragraph two, however, is based upon an understanding of the altogether distinct nature of sacramental reconciliation with God and the Church, a special appreciation of the doctrine of sacramental grace, and the teaching of Vatican II. In another context, while praising extra-liturgical communal and individual acts of devotions, the council asserted that the liturgy (above all, the Eucharist and the other sacraments) "by its very nature far surpasses any of them."[92] Similarly, without denigrating any of the other means or occasions of divine forgiveness, canon 988, §2 urges the celebration of the sacrament of penance even in the case of the confession of venial sins only.

For related norms concerning ordained ministers, see canon 276, §2, 5°; concerning students for the ordained ministry, see canon 246, §4; concerning religious, see canon 664; concerning members of secular institutes, see canon 719, §3. Also related to canon 988 is the reference in canon 914 to sacramental confession preceding the first communion of children who have reached the use of reason. If the child is conscious of grave sin, he or she is bound by canon 988, §1 (and c. 916); otherwise, in the absence of any consciousness of grave sin, canon 914 may be understood in the light of canon 988, §2, namely, as a recommendation but without any canonical obligation to confess.

The second of the above canons, canon 989, specifies the time when the obligation of canon 988, §1 is to be fulfilled, but without suggesting that it is desirable to postpone the confession of a grave sin for a period of an entire year. The canon is rephrased from canon 906 of the 1917 code, itself based upon the norm introduced by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215.[93] The former norm was somewhat more specific, defining the age of discretion in terms of attaining the use of reason; in effect, the possible obligation begins when one becomes capable of committing grave sin. The present law states, in canon 97, §2, that "with the completion of the seventh year... [one] is presumed to have the use of reason." Once that presumption is fulfilled and the age of discretion is attained, if one then should commit a grave sin, the canon requires that he or she confess at least within a year. The

[91] RPenance 7b, DOL 3072.

[92] SC 13.

[93] Const. 21: "Each member of the faithful, of both sexes, after he or she has reached the years of discretion, is to confess individually [solus] all his or her sins at least once a year."

failure of the earlier law to make clear that this obligation of annual confession is applicable only in the case of grave sins has now been corrected in the text of canon 989.[94]

The canon is entirely distinct from the precept of Easter communion in canon 920 (now somewhat mitigated as to time or liturgical season of fulfillment), which obliges once a person has completed his or her Christian initiation through receiving the Holy Eucharist.

Confession through an Interpreter

Canon 990 — No one is prohibited from confessing through an interpreter as long as abuses and scandals are avoided and without prejudice to the prescript of can. 983, §2.

The canon permits, but does not require, that a penitent make use of the service of an interpreter if the minister, for example, does not know or know well the penitent's language. The choice remains that of the penitent. If the penitent is unwilling to use the services of an interpreter, the integral confession of sins may be morally impossible, in accord with canon 960. The cross reference to canon 983, §2 is concerned with the obligation of secrecy incurred by an interpreter.

Freedom to Choose a Confessor

Canon 991 — Every member of the Christian faithful is free to confess sins to a legitimately approved confessor of his or her choice, even to one of another rite.

The final canon of the chapter articulates and assures a right of the Christian believer to a free choice of a confessor or, put negatively, not to be obliged to confess to a confessor designated by an ecclesiastical superior and not to be coerced in any way in the choice of a minister of individual confession. See canon 240, §1 for an application of this norm in seminaries, canon 630 for an application in religious communities.

Since in this matter there is no disciplinary distinction of rites, one bound by the Code of Canon Law for the Latin church may celebrate the sacrament of penance with a minister of any of the Eastern (Catholic) churches. It was proposed that the canon should speak only of a legitimately approved confessor of another Catholic rite.[95] Such a qualification of the text was unnecessary and was therefore omitted; the question of confession to and absolution from a minister of another church or ecclesial community is adequately covered by canon 844, §2.

CHAPTER IV
INDULGENCES
[cc. 992–997]

The six canons of this chapter are a major simplification of the former discipline on indulgences. This simplification, however, was mostly achieved by eliminating from the code norms which in some instances are still in force (below). The revised canonical discipline about indulgences—found principally in the apostolic constitution Indulgentiarum doctrina of 1967[96] and the norms of the Enchiridion indulgentiarum of 1968[97]—is still in effect for the Latin church. (The Eastern churches do not have a corresponding institute in their tradition, even though those churches in full communion with the Roman See may have adopted, under Latin influence, a parallel discipline. The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches does not have any canons corresponding to chapter 4 of title IV on indulgences.)

The few canons on the subject remaining in the revised code are simply basic norms: (1) defini-

[94] See RPenance 34, DOL 3099, where the mention of annual confession is also referred explicitly to "all those grave sins not hitherto confessed one by one."

[95] Rel 234.

[96] Paul VI, apconst, January 1, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 5–24, DOL 3155–3187.

[97] Apostolic Penitentiary, June 29, 1968 (Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1968), DOL 3193–3228.

tions of indulgences (cc. 992–993); (2) applicability of indulgences (c. 994); (3) right to grant indulgences (c. 995); (4) capacity to gain indulgences (c. 996); and (5) canonical prescriptions outside the code (c. 997).

The chapter on indulgences appears within the title on the sacrament of penance because of their historical development in the medieval period as a parallel to the remission of canonical penances and with some relationship to sacramental reconciliation. Because of both controversy and serious abuse, however, indulgences are now carefully and absolutely distinguished from sacramental reconciliation itself and from the forgiveness of sins. While the act of piety or prayer to which an indulgence is attached may indeed be an act of reconciliation with God and the Church, in the refined doctrine elaborated in late medieval and modern times an indulgence is understood as a remission of temporal or purgatorial punishment still due after the forgiveness of sins. For this reason the definitions of indulgences speak of remission of punishment for sins already forgiven insofar as culpability or guilt is concerned; the indulgence itself is never a remission or absolution of sin.

A short time before the conclusion of Vatican II in 1965, the conciliar fathers heard reports from the conferences of bishops on a document about indulgences that had been drawn up by the Apostolic Penitentiary.[98] This draft was not intended for conciliar debate or action but only as a means of general consultation in preparation for a papal document on the subject. The reactions of the bishops to the proposed simplification of the canonical discipline were mixed, and the apostolic constitution of Paul VI which appeared at the beginning of 1967 included a doctrinal and historical exposition preceding its twenty norms in order to introduce changes "that are suited to the times and take into account the wishes of the conferences of bishops."[99] The norms, which otherwise left intact canons 911–936 of the 1917 code, were summarized by Paul VI as > concerned mainly with three points: to fix a new measure for partial indulgences [in place of the medieval measure in years, days, and so-called quarantines]; to lessen the number of plenary indulgences; to reduce and organize into a simpler and worthier form the matters related to indulgences attached to objects and places ("real" and "local" indulgences).[100]

A rationale for limiting the number of plenary indulgences was given by the pope: "The usual receives scant attention; the plentiful is not highly valued. Also many of the faithful need time sufficient for a right preparation to gain a plenary indulgence." Similarly, the suppression of the very terms, "real" and "local" indulgences, was explained as making it clear "that the Christian's acts are the subject of indulgences, not things and places; these are merely the occasions for gaining indulgences."[101] "An [indulgenced] act sometimes has a connection with a particular object or place."[102]

These steps to elevate the doctrine and practice of gaining indulgences to a spiritual and religiously virtuous plane, while eliminating the apparently mechanistic or quantitative elements, were carried forward in the 1968 publication of a radically reduced collection or enchiridion of indulgences (formerly called a raccolta) by the Apostolic Penitentiary.[103] This collection of indulgenced acts and prayers was preceded by thirty-six norms, embracing both the papal norms of the year before and a revision of the remainder of canons 911–936 of the 1917 code. The norms of the 1968 enchiridion remain in force, as will be mentioned again in the commentary on canon 997.

Of specific historical interest are the suppression of the so-called toties quoties plenary indulgences,[104] understood as available with unlimited

[98] AcSynVat 4, 6:131–197, 292–307, 315–335.

[99] ID 12, DOL 3166.

[100] Ibid.

[101] Ibid.

[102] ID, norm 12, DOL 3179; EI 7, DOL 3199.

[103] See note 97, above.

[104] ID, norm 19, DOL 3185; EI 30, DOL 3222.

frequency, and the suppression of the "privileged" altar, to which plenary indulgences for the dead were attached on the occasion of eucharistic celebrations. Instead, "like a devoted mother, the Church in its special concern for the faithful departed establishes that in every sacrifice of the Mass suffrages are most lavishly offered on behalf of the dead; any privilege in this matter is suppressed."[105]

Within the Roman Curia, the tribunal of the Apostolic Penitentiary is competent concerning the concession and use of indulgences (except in matters of doctrine in which the Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith has oversight), in accord with Pastor bonus.[106] Thus from time to time the Penitentiary may make new concessions of indulgences related to certain prayers or actions. In addition, it may issue general concessions, for example, to permit the gaining of certain plenary indulgences by persons who are unable to be present for papal blessings given by bishops, "provided they follow the rites with pious mental intention while they are being transmitted live by television or radio" with the usual conditions (below).[107]

Definitions of Indulgences

Canon 992 — An indulgence is the remission before God of temporal punishment for sins whose guilt is already forgiven, which a properly disposed member of the Christian faithful gains under certain and defined conditions by the assistance of the Church which as minister of redemption dispenses and applies authoritatively the treasury of the satisfactions of Christ and the saints.

Canon 993 — An indulgence is partial or plenary insofar as it partially or totally frees from the temporal punishment due to sins.

[105] ID, norm 20, DOL 3186; EI 21, DOL 3213.
[106] PB 120.
[107] Decree, December 14, 1985, OssRomEng, December 23–30, 1985; CLD 11, 246–247.

The first of these two canons gives a definition from Paul VI's 1967 constitution on indulgences. It follows canon 911 of the 1917 code: "All shall hold in high esteem indulgences or remission before God of the temporal punishment due to sins whose guilt has already been removed. This remission is granted by the ecclesiastical authority from the treasury of the Church, for the living by way of absolution [of penalty or punishment], for the dead by way of suffrage." In canon 993, the text is more carefully nuanced to summarize the doctrinal exposition in the apostolic constitution, which offers the following statement of the Church's purpose in this institute:

> An indulgence has certain features in common with other methods and means of taking away the remnants of sin, but at the same time is clearly distinct from the others.
>
> This means that in the case of an indulgence the Church, using its power as minister of Christ the Lord's redemption, not only offers prayers, but authoritatively dispenses to the faithful rightly disposed the treasury of expiatory works of Christ and the saints for the remission of temporal punishment.
>
> The purpose intended by ecclesiastical authority in granting indulgences is not only to help the faithful to pay the penalties due to sin, but also to cause them to perform works of devotion, repentance, and charity —especially works that contribute to the growth of faith and the good of the community.[108]

Although not expressed in the canon, the underlying doctrine on indulgences, often articulated in the past almost exclusively in terms of the authoritative intervention of church authority, is equally or more significantly the doctrine of the communion of saints:

[108] ID 8, DOL 3162.

> The life of each of God's children is in Christ and through Christ conjoined with the life of all other Christians....
>
> This is the basis of the "treasury of the Church." The treasury of the Church is not to be likened to a centuries-old accumulation of wealth. It means rather the limitless and inexhaustible value that the expiation and merits offered by Christ have in the eyes of God for the liberation of all humanity from sin and for the creation of communion with the Father.... Added to this treasure is also the vast, incalculable, ever increasing value in God's eyes of the prayers and good works of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the saints....
>
> The union between those who are still pilgrims and their brothers and sisters who have died in the peace of Christ is therefore not broken, but rather strengthened by a communion in spiritual blessings.[109]

The second of the two canons, canon 993, is also derived from the papal document of 1967.[110] It radically changes the measure of indulgences, formerly related to the period of days or years of canonical penances (or, until recent years, the "quarantines" or Lenten periods) or indeed to a specified period of punishment in purgatory. On the contrary, the partial character of most indulgences is now defined indefinitely, i.e., simply as less than the full or plenary indulgence or remission of temporal punishment. A further authoritative elaboration of this concept is as follows: "Any of the faithful who, being at least inwardly contrite, perform a work carrying with it a partial indulgence, receive through the Church the remission of temporal punishment equivalent to what their own act already receives."[111] In this language there is an effort to maintain the medieval and traditional doctrine of remission of punishment but to relate it directly to the goodness of the act or work for which the indulgence is conceded.

The requisite conditions are stated more forcefully in the current law with regard to the plenary indulgence, which except in the case of persons on the verge of death may be gained only once on any single day. These conditions attempt to avoid any mere multiplication of acts or, as it were, frequent and repeated "total" remissions of temporal punishment:

> The requirements for gaining a plenary indulgence are the performance of the indulgenced work and the fulfillment of three conditions: sacramental confession; eucharistic communion; prayer for the pope's intentions. A further requirement is the exclusion of all attachment to sin, even venial sin.
>
> Unless this unqualified disposition and the three conditions are present, the indulgence will be only partial....
>
> Several plenary indulgences [on different days] may be gained on the basis of a single sacramental confession; only one may be gained, however, on the basis of a single communion and prayer for the pope's intention.
>
> The condition requiring prayer for the pope's intentions is completely satisfied by reciting once the Our Father and Hail Mary for his intentions; nevertheless all of the faithful have the option of reciting any other prayer suited to their own devotion and their reverence for the pope.[112]

[109] ID 5, DOL 3159.
[110] ID, norm 2, DOL 3168; EI 2, DOL 3194.
[111] ID, norm 5, DOL 3171; EI 6, DOL 3198.
[112] ID, norms 7, 9, 10, DOL 3173, 3175, 3176; EI 26, 28, 29, DOL 3218, 3220, 3221.

Applicability of Indulgences

Canon 994 — Any member of the faithful can gain partial or plenary indulgences for oneself or apply them to the dead by way of suffrage.

The text of the canon needs no interpretation. The concept of applying indulgences for the dead was explained by Paul VI: "The faithful who apply indulgences as suffrages for the dead are practicing charity in a superior way and with their thoughts on the things of heaven are dealing more virtuously with the things of earth."[113]

The traditional reference to indulgences for the dead as granted only by way of suffrage, prayer, or petition indicates that the Church asserts no power of authoritative declaration concerning the extent of purgatorial punishment remitted for those who have already died.

An evident corollary of this canon is that "no one gaining an indulgence may apply it to other living people."[114]

Right to Grant Indulgences

Canon 995 — §1. In addition to the supreme authority of the Church, only those to whom this power is acknowledged in the law or granted by the Roman Pontiff can bestow indulgences.

§2. No authority below the Roman Pontiff can entrust the power of granting indulgences to others unless the Apostolic See has given this expressly to the person.

Since the 1967 norms of Paul VI on indulgences did not suppress all the canons of the 1917 code on the subject, it was only in the following year that canons 911–924 of the former code were revised.

Thus the general reference in paragraph one of canon 995 can be explained by listing those permitted by the 1968 law to grant indulgences:

Diocesan bishops and their equivalents in law possess from the outset of their pastoral office the right to:

§1. grant partial indulgences to persons or in the places subject to their jurisdiction;

§2. bestow the papal blessing with a plenary indulgence, using the prescribed formulary, three times a year on solemn feasts that they will designate, even if they only assist at the solemn Mass.

Metropolitans may grant partial indulgences in their suffragan dioceses just as in their own.

Patriarchs [of the Eastern Catholic churches] may grant partial indulgences in every place, even those exempt, of their patriarchate, in churches of their own rite outside the boundaries of their patriarchate, and everywhere in the world in favor of their own people. Archbishops major [of the Eastern Catholic churches] have the same power.

Cardinals possess the power to grant partial indulgences in every place or institution and in favor of those persons subject to their jurisdiction or protection. They may do so elsewhere, but only regarding indulgences to be gained by the people present on each occasion.[115]

None of the persons listed above may communicate or delegate the power to grant indulgences to others, as decreed in paragraph two of canon 995. The mention of Eastern patriarchs or other hierarchs in the norms of the Enchiridion indulgentiarum, moreover, must be understood only in the case of Eastern Catholic churches which have assimilated the Western institute of indulgences.

[113] ID 8, DOL 3162.
[114] EI 3, DOL 3195.
[115] EI 11–14, DOL 3203–3206.

Capacity to Gain Indulgences

Canon 996 — §1. To be capable of gaining indulgences, a person must be baptized, not excommunicated, and in the state of grace at least at the end of the prescribed works.

§2. To gain indulgences, however, a capable subject must have at least the general intention of acquiring them and must fulfill the enjoined works in the established time and the proper method, according to the tenor of the grant.

This canon states the fundamental requisites in the person who is desirous of gaining a plenary or partial indulgence. According to paragraph one, catechumens may not gain indulgences.[116]

In addition, it has been usual to recommend to the faithful that they have a general intention of gaining all indulgences available to them in order to satisfy one of the requirements of paragraph two of this canon.

These conditions are in addition to the dispositions mentioned above in the commentary on canon 993.

Special Laws on Indulgences

Canon 997 — As regards the granting and use of indulgences, the other prescripts contained in the special laws of the Church must also be observed.

Earlier redactions of this canon referred to the 1968 Enchiridion indulgentiarum by name, but this reference was too particularized.[117] There is a certain parallel between this canon and canon 2, since it incorporates by reference extra-codal norms on indulgences as canon 2 affirms the canonical force of all the extra-codal laws on liturgical celebration. See canons 335, 344, and 346, where there is also reference to special law outside the code.

As already noted, the principal current, universal law on indulgences was established by Paul VI's 1967 constitution Indulgentiarum doctrina. With the exception of some interim provisions, however, the twenty norms of Paul VI were included among the thirty-six norms of the 1968 enchiridion. With regard to the latter, it should be pointed out that, aside from the reform of the canonical discipline of indulgences, the collection itself was radically changed. This was done principally by a large-scale reduction in the number of indulgenced works and prayers. There are now some seventy such indulgences, a few of which are attached to good works in broad terms, for example, to acts of charity for those in need; the majority of the listed indulgences are attached to traditional and devotional prayers. (As mentioned before, from time to time the Apostolic Penitentiary may add to the number of indulgenced acts or prayers.)

The following are the principal norms of the 1968 enchiridion, those not mentioned already and not touched directly by the canons. They remain in effect in virtue of canon 997:

> 15. §1. No book, booklet, or pamphlet listing indulgences granted is to be published without the permission of the local Ordinary or local [Eastern] Hierarch.
>
> §2. The publication, in no matter what language, of an authentic collection of prayers and devotional works to which the Apostolic See has attached indulgences requires the express permission of the same Apostolic See...[118]
>
> 32. An indulgence annexed to any prayer may be gained no matter what the language of recitation, provided the accuracy of the translation is supported by a declaration either of the Apostolic Penitentiary or of one of the Ordinaries or Hierarchs in the region where the language of the translation is in general use.[119]

[116] See c. 1170 on blessings for catechumens (and persons who are not Catholics).

[117] For a contrary opinion, see Rel, 235.

[118] DOL 3207.

From the second of these norms, n. 32, it is clear that devotional prayers, even if they carry indulgences, are carefully distinguished from liturgical prayers and other liturgical texts in the vernacular, for which the approbation is conceded solely by the respective conference of bishops for the churches of its territory, in accord with canon 838, §§2–3; such decrees of the conferences must be reviewed or confirmed by the Apostolic See. Nevertheless any diocesan bishop or other (local) ordinary of a region where the language of the prayer text is one of those in general use may declare that a vernacular translation of an indulgenced prayer, originally in Latin or some other language, is accurate.

As far as English versions of indulgenced prayers are concerned, there are often several texts in legitimate use, texts which have been approved or accepted at different periods. Some are variants of traditional or archaic forms; others are in modernized form or in new and contemporary translation. No uniformity of such devotional prayers is required, although on occasion liturgical texts will have indulgences attached for devotional use; in such cases the texts will already have a single official version for a given territory, with the canonical approbation and confirmation referred to above.

A new translation of the devotional prayers to which indulgences are now attached has been provided for members of the conferences of bishops in countries where English is spoken. Prepared by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy, these alternatives to the (various) translations already in use are available for inclusion in devotional books, along with other contemporary translations.[120] The publication of all such texts for the use of the church community is governed by canon 826, §3, which requires the permission of a local ordinary for the publication of "books of prayers for the public or private use of the faithful." Such books (or booklets, pamphlets, leaflets, etc.; see c. 824, §2) ordinarily contain both indulgenced texts and other devotional material.

The other, related norm of the enchiridion quoted above (n. 15) is distinct from but in harmony with what has been said. In norm 15, §1, books (or other publications) listing indulgences are required to have the permission of the local ordinary, just as is required by canon 826, §3 for all prayer books, whether for public or private use. In paragraph two of the same norm 15, however, any authentic collection of (all the) prayers and devotions to which the Apostolic See has attached indulgences requires express permission of that See, namely, a permission given by the Apostolic Penitentiary.[121] In effect, this refers to any integral and official version, in any language, of the Enchiridion indulgentiarum itself; it does not refer to the publication of the indulgenced prayers in other kinds of collections, listing of the indulgences or indulgenced prayers, publication of prayers or indulgences from sources other than the Apostolic See, etc., for all of which local ordinaries remain competent.

[119] DOL 3224.

[120] A Book of Prayers (Washington, D.C.: ICEL, 1982).

[121] EI 9, DOL 3201.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material on canons 959–997 can be found after the commentary on canon 1007.

TITLE V
THE SACRAMENT OF THE ANOINTING OF THE SICK
[cc. 998–1007]

After an introductory canon, the other nine canons of this title treat in separate chapters the celebration of the sacrament of the anointing of the sick (cc. 999–1002), the minister of anointing (c. 1003), and those to be anointed (cc. 1004–1007).

Without entering into complex historical, liturgical, and theological questions concerning this sacrament, the conciliar fathers of Vatican II proposed in 1963 to reform and strengthen its discipline as well as its ritual celebration:

> "Extreme unction," which may also and more properly be called "anointing of the sick," is not a sacrament for those only who are at the point of death. Hence, as soon as any one of the faithful begins to be in danger of death from sickness or old age, the fitting time for that person to receive this sacrament has certainly already arrived.
>
> In addition to the separate rites of the sick and for viaticum, a continuous rite shall be drawn up, structured so that the sick person is anointed after confessing and before receiving viaticum.
>
> The number of anointings is to be adapted to the circumstances; the prayers that belong to the rite of anointing are to be so revised that they correspond to the varying conditions of the sick who receive the sacrament.[1]

Several distinct pastoral and doctrinal questions were addressed in this decision of the council:

(1) The nature of the sacrament—a healing anointing of those seriously ill—had been compromised by the almost universal pastoral practice which treated it principally as the sacrament for the dying, or even exclusively for those whose death was imminent and almost certain. This in turn had diluted or distorted the significance of eucharistic Viaticum as the sacrament of the dying; the name of extreme, final, or last anointing and the inclusion of anointing among "last rites" had contributed to this confusion. On the Eucharist as Viaticum, see canons 921–922.

(2) The medieval practice and doctrine of anointing clearly distinguished sacramental anointing from other anointings of the sick and also distinguished anointings of the sick by ordained ministers from anointings by lay persons, practices that were common in the earlier period. The close association of anointing with (final) penance helped in turn to create a requirement that the gravity or perilous situation of the sick person had to be certain or proved. Modern ecclesiastical documents which spoke to the contrary and permitted or encouraged a broader use of the sacrament, while recognizing the more common usage, were not widely accepted in church practice.[2]

Prior to Vatican II, a certain recovery of much older traditions had been initiated, especially when particular rituals returned to the sequence of anointing before Viaticum.[3] (This is the "continuous rite" mentioned in Sacrosanctum Concilium 74, quoted above. It was added to the revised Roman Ritual in fulfillment of the conciliar mandate.) Such rituals accepted the fact that in many circumstances the person to be anointed might in fact be close to death or even at the point of death, but they moved in the direction of celebrating anointing much earlier, that is, as soon as the seriousness of the illness becomes evident.

[1] SC 73–75. For a commentary on these articles, see F. R. McManus, "The Sacrament of Anointing: Some Ecumenical Considerations," in Miscellanea Liturgica in onore di S. E. il Cardinale Giacomo Lercaro, II (Rome: Desclée, 1967) 809–840.

[2] This was true of papal letters which sought to encourage the celebration of the sacrament without any scruple over the perilous state of the sick person: Benedict XV, aplett Sodalitatem, May 31, 1921, AAS 13 (1921) 345; Pius XI, aplett Explorata res, February 2, 1923, AAS 15 (1923) 105.

[3] E.g., Collectio Rituum ad Instar Appendicis Ritualis Romani pro Omnibus Germaniae Dioecesibus (Ratisbon:

(3) Although not directly touched in the conciliar constitution or in the canons, an underlying question is the relation of the sacrament, as understood in medieval and modern times, to the anointing described in the letter of James: "Is there anyone sick among you? Let him send for the presbyters of the Church and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. The prayer of faith will save the sick man and the Lord will raise him up. If he has committed any sins, they will be forgiven him."[4] Before the medieval period this text was very broadly understood in reference to various anointings, for example, by Pope Innocent I (401–417): "There is no doubt that these words [of the letter of James] are to be understood of the faithful who are sick, and who can be anointed with the holy oil of chrism, which has been prepared by the bishop, and which not only priests but all Christians may use for anointing, when their own needs or those of their family demand."[5]

The healing effect of this anointing is mentioned first in the biblical text, without primary reference to the conditional effect of the forgiveness of sins. Nevertheless, the integral healing (physical and spiritual) and raising up by the Lord and indeed the relationship to sickness (physical healing) were relegated both in pastoral practice and in theory to a secondary place: emphasis was placed almost entirely upon spiritual healing of sin and sinfulness and upon final "anointing for glory." This was in contradiction to the (ancient) prayers for anointing retained in the 1614 Roman Ritual; their lack of suitability, on the occasion when the person is not anointed until all human hope of survival is gone, is one of the reasons for the reform decreed in the conciliar text quoted above.

(4) Sacrosanctum Concilium does no more than recover a simpler and older tradition. By declaring that it is "certainly" and "already" time for the sacrament when the person "begins" to be in danger, it deliberately leaves open the question whether a wider extension can legitimately develop. In this, the language does not propose or insinuate any trivialization of the sacrament or its indiscriminate celebration in cases of lesser or slight illness. In the period after Vatican II papal and curial documents, to be mentioned under canon 1004, §1, entertained and supported a further development in full harmony with the conciliar decision.

The Roman rite for the sacrament of the anointing of the sick (simply called "the oil of the sick" in some Eastern churches) is given, in revised form, in the Rite of Anointing and Pastoral Care of the Sick. This section of the Roman Ritual not only deals with anointing and other elements of sacramental and pastoral ministry to the members of the Christian community who are sick but also includes rites for the sacrament for the dying, namely, the Eucharist as Viaticum. The introduction (praenotanda) has an important treatment of sickness in relation to the paschal mystery of the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus.[6]

For countries where English is spoken, the several conferences of bishops have approved, and the Apostolic See has confirmed, the liturgical book, Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anoint- Pustet, 1950) 50–64; Collectio Rituum ad Instar Appendicis Ritualis Romani pro Dioecesibus Statuum Foederatorum Americae Septentrionalis (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1954) 64–82.

[4] Jas 5:14–15.

[5] Ep. 25, 8, PL 20:559; trans. P. Palmer, Sacraments and Forgiveness, Sources of Christian Theology, II (Westminster: Newman, 1959) 283.

[6] RAnointing (1972) 1–7, DOL 3321–3327.

ing and Viaticum.[7] The title reflects both the breadth of the Latin edition, concerned with the total ministry of the Church to its sick members, and the distinct significance of the two sacraments: (1) anointing for the sick who are not literally "dying" (but also for the sick who are close to death and could not be anointed earlier, at a more fitting time) and (2) Viaticum for the dying. A rearranged format, along with additional pastoral notes and newly composed prayers, also supports more clearly the necessary distinctions made in the conciliar reform of the sacramental celebration of anointing of the sick.

In the Eastern churches, the actual rite of anointing differs considerably from that of the Roman and other rites of the Latin church, in particular in the tradition of anointing of an individual Christian by several priests. The canonical discipline of the sacrament is much the same and may be found, in succinct form, in six canons of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (CCEO 737–742).

Nature of Anointing of the Sick

Canon 998 — The anointing of the sick, by which the Church commends the faithful who are dangerously ill to the suffering and glorified Lord in order that he relieve and save them, is conferred by anointing them with oil and pronouncing the words prescribed in the liturgical books.

This text replaces the former name of the sacrament (extreme or final unction or anointing), adds a brief doctrinal exposition of the nature of the sacrament, and eliminates the specific mention of olive oil. The development is based upon the conciliar constitution already quoted; the doctrinal language of the canon was also used in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (1964):

> By the sacred anointing of the sick and the prayer of priests the entire Church commends the sick to the suffering and glorified Lord, asks that he lighten their suffering and save them (see Jas 5:14–15); the Church exhorts them, moreover, to contribute to the welfare of the whole people of God by associating themselves freely with Christ's passion and death (see Rom 8:17; Col 1:24; 2 Tm 2:11–12; 1 Pt 4:13).[8]

This conciliar text was quoted by Paul VI in the apostolic constitution on the revised rite of the sacrament of anointing, in which the required use of blessed olive oil was modified:

> Since olive oil, which has been prescribed until now for the valid celebration of the sacrament, is unobtainable or difficult to obtain in some parts of the world, we have decreed, at the request of a number of bishops, that from now on, according to circumstances, another kind of oil can also be used, provided it is derived from plants and is thus similar to olive oil.[9]

Parallel to the norms about the essential formula for other sacraments, canon 998 speaks of the words prescribed in the liturgical books. In this case the same apostolic constitution of Paul VI altered, for the Latin church, the medieval form then found in the Roman Ritual ("May the Lord forgive you by this holy anointing and his most loving mercy whatever sins you have committed by the use of your sight . . ."): "We have thought fit to modify the sacramental form in such a way that, by reflecting the words of James, it may better express the effects of the sacrament."[10]

The revised form—the first clause of which is said by the minister while anointing the forehead

[7] This English language ritual is arranged to include not only the section of the Roman Ritual cited in the preceding note but also excerpts from other rites, as appropriate.

[8] LG 11.

[9] Sacram unctionem infirmorum, November 30, 1972, AAS 65 (1973) 5–9, DOL 3317. See ROils 3, DOL 3863.

[10] Sacram unctionem infirmorum, DOL 3318; also RAnointing 25, DOL 3345.

of the sick person, the second while anointing the hands—is: "Through this holy anointing / may the Lord in his love and mercy help you / with the grace of the Holy Spirit. / R. Amen. May the Lord who frees you from sin / save you and raise you up. / R. Amen."[11] The form explicitly invites the two responses, "Amen." This is the integral formula referred to in canon 1000, §1 and replaces the formulas for the anointing of each of the senses. While giving a certain priority to spiritual healing (in the reference to grace and in the clause "who frees you from sin"), the formula is completed by the petition that the Lord may "save you and raise you up."

Parallel to but different from canon 998 is the introductory canon in the Eastern law on anointing (CCEO 737). The defining description of the sacrament (§1) expresses more expansively the effects of anointing: forgiveness of sins and strengthening "by hope of eternal reward." The faithful are then said to be disposed "to correct their lives and are helped to overcome their infirmity or patiently to suffer it" [ad infirmitatem superandam patienterve sufferandam adiuvantur]. This concluding phrase appears to be better nuanced than the Latin law, indicating more clearly the potential of physical healing or recovery in addition to the spiritual effects.

The same canon, in its second paragraph, requires that the rite of anointing by several priests, already mentioned above, be preserved so far as possible in the churches sui iuris where it is the custom.

CHAPTER I
THE CELEBRATION OF THE SACRAMENT
[cc. 999–1002]

This first chapter includes the determination of the minister of the blessing of oil for the sick (c. 999), a general canon on the rite of anointing (c. 1000), and norms affecting both the responsibility to see to the celebration of the sacrament (c. 1001) and the case in which several or many sick persons are to be anointed together (c. 1002).

Blessing of Oil

Canon 999 — In addition to a bishop, the following can bless the oil to be used in the anointing of the sick:

1° those equivalent to a diocesan bishop by law;

2° any presbyter in a case of necessity, but only in the actual celebration of the sacrament.

The canon speaks in terms of what is considered the usual situation: the use of oil blessed by the diocesan bishop at the annual Chrism Mass, celebrated ordinarily on Holy Thursday, in accord with the rite of the Roman Pontifical.[12]

Although there is a special significance to the use of oils blessed by the bishop who presides over the local church and is its principal moderator of liturgical celebration and discipline,[13] this canon does not exclude the possibility that another bishop may be deputed to bless the oils. The Roman Ritual adds that the minister of anointing "should make sure that the oil remains fit for use and should replenish it from time to time, either yearly when the bishop blesses the oil on Holy Thursday or more frequently if necessary."[14]

As indicated in canon 368 together with canon 381, §2, the law equates with the diocesan bishop those persons who preside over portions of the flock (particular churches) that are not formally constituted as dioceses: territorial prelatures and abbacies, vicariates and prefectures apostolic, and apostolic administrations established in a sta-

[11] Ibid.; also Pastoral Care 94 (n. 124).

[12] ROils 9–10, DOL 3869–3870.

[13] Canon 835, §1.

[14] RAnointing 22, DOL 3342.

ble manner. Like diocesan bishops, they bless the oil for the sick, ordinarily in the Chrism Mass, and require no additional concession or faculty to do this.

The second category of ministers of the blessing of oil is treated differently, namely, for cases when oil blessed by the bishop is not available.[15] Blessing of the oil by the minister of the sacrament during the actual celebration is considered not uncommon by the ritual, which provides alternatives: either the blessing by the minister of anointing or a prayer of thanksgiving over the oil if it has already been blessed by the bishop.[16] This practice of blessing by the minister himself is followed in some other, non-Roman rites; it has a certain parallel in the blessing of the baptismal water in the course of the celebration of that sacrament[17] and as in that case allows for a fuller liturgical catechesis about the oil.[18]

Canon 999 permits the minister to bless the oil for the sick only "in a case of necessity" but does not determine the nature or degree of this necessity, given the fact that the minister may already judge the practice to be liturgically and spiritually suitable. The ritual explains that, in this case, the minister "may bring the unblessed oil with him, or the family of the sick person may prepare the oil in a suitable vessel. If any of the oil is left after the celebration of the sacrament, it should be absorbed in cotton or cotton wool and burned."[19] The canon does lessen the degree of necessity stressed in the ritual, which speaks of "true necessity,"[20] but still looks upon the blessing of the oil by the minister as exceptional.

In this connection, the reference to the actual celebration of the sacrament has been added to the canon for clarity. It is only a bishop or a presbyter whose office is equated with that of a diocesan bishop who blesses the oil of the sick during the Chrism Mass, i.e., apart from the celebration of the sacrament of anointing.

The Eastern churches have a different and simpler discipline about the minister who may bless the oil of the sick. It does not require any kind of necessity for the minister of the sacrament to carry out this blessing. Canon 741 of the Eastern code says only that he blesses the oil "unless the particular law of the Church sui iuris determines otherwise."

See canon 847 for norms concerning the holy oils in general, norms which are not repeated here. Older authors discussed related questions: the possibility of using other blessed oils for anointing the sick and the validity or invalidity of the sacrament if unblessed oil were used, as well as the addition of unblessed oil in smaller quantities (as a kind of blessing by contact). These questions no longer arise, since some kind of plant oil should be readily available for the minister himself to bless during the sacramental celebration, whenever needed.

Manner of Anointing

Canon 1000 — §1. The anointings with the words, order, and manner prescribed in the liturgical books are to be performed carefully. In a case of necessity, however, a single anointing on the forehead or even on some other part of the body is sufficient, while the entire formula is said.

§2. The minister is to perform the anointings with his own hand, unless a grave reason warrants the use of an instrument.

Although the entire rite for the anointing of the sick—including introductory rites and brief liturgy of the word, laying on of hands, and concluding prayers—is of significance, the canon concentrates on the anointing with oil and the required sacramental form. On the latter, see the commentary above on canon 998.

The Roman Ritual of 1614 had prescribed the anointing of eyes, ears, nose, hands, feet, and

[15] RAnointing 21, DOL 3341.
[16] RAnointing 75–75bis; Pastoral Care 92–93 (n. 123).
[17] See RBaptC 54–55, 223–224.
[18] RCIA 215; RBaptC 54–55.
[19] RAnointing 22, DOL 3342.
[20] RAnointing 21, DOL 3341; ROils 8, DOL 3868.

(until prohibited by CIC 947, §2) loins. The 1925 edition of that ritual, revised somewhat in its prenotes in the light of the 1917 code, also permitted the anointing of the feet to be omitted for a reasonable cause (in accord with CIC 947, §3). The same edition added or restored a ritual laying on of hands[21] because of the repeated examples of this healing gesture in the New Testament.[22] Vatican II decreed that, in the course of the revision of all the Roman liturgical rites, "the number of the anointings is to be adapted to the circumstances."[23] Thus, in the revised ritual of Paul VI the anointings were simplified, as described in the canon, and the accompanying formula altered for the Latin church (above).

The conferences of bishops remain free, in the preparation of particular rituals for their territories, to make further adaptations of the anointings: "Depending on the culture and traditions of different peoples, the number of anointings may be increased and the places to be anointed may be changed."[24]

Although paragraph one of this canon retains a reference to the order or sequence of anointings, it is now ordinarily a matter of anointing forehead and hands only. In effect the present canon allows the anointing of the hands to be omitted in case of necessity, e.g., if the person is in imminent danger of death (when Viaticum should be given immediately after the single anointing), if there is some physical obstacle to the anointing of the hands, if there is a large number of persons to be anointed and time is short, etc. Similarly, paragraph one recognizes the situation in which even the single anointing of the forehead is not possible, e.g., if in case of accident the head is not accessible, and indicates that another part of the body be anointed "because of the particular condition of the sick person."[25] It says nothing, however, about the style of anointing, e.g., the use of sufficient oil so that the sacramental sign may be perceived as an authentic gesture of healing, as contemporary authors urge.[26]

The serious reason which, according to paragraph two of the canon, may permit the minister to use an instrument to avoid direct physical contact with the body of the sick person may be the danger of infection or even extreme repugnance in some cases. Ordinarily, however, whatever the sick person's condition, the minister will be able to take the same safeguards against infection as do nurses and doctors in their ministry to the sick.[27]

Responsibility to the Sick

Canon 1001 — Pastors of souls and those close to the sick are to take care that the sick are consoled by this sacrament at the appropriate time.

The thrust of this canon is to establish the responsibility for celebrating the sacrament of the anointing of the sick at an opportune time. This time is related to the question, treated in canons 1004–1006, of those who may and should be anointed. Vatican II explicitly defined the appropriate, proper, and ideal time: "As soon as any one of the faithful begins to be in danger of death from sickness or old age, the fitting time for that person to receive this sacrament has certainly already arrived."[28] Thus, in order to broaden the interpretation of the sacramental discipline of anointing,[29] the conciliar fathers determined that—leaving open the possibility of an even earlier time —it is certainly opportune at the very beginning of serious illness.

The responsibility at this point in the Christian's illness rests with those who have the pas-

[21] Title VI, c. 2, n. 11.

[22] See Mk 6:5; 16:18; Lk 13:11–13; Acts 9:12, 17; 28:8; Rituale Romanum (1925), title VI, c. 2, n. 7.

[23] SC 75.

[24] RAnointing 24, DOL 3344.

[25] RAnointing 23, DOL 3343.

[26] See L. Bouyer, Rite and Man (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1963) 212.

[27] See J. Abbo and J. Hannan, The Sacred Canons, 2 vols. (St. Louis: B. Herder, 1960) 2:69.

[28] SC 73. Emphasis added.

[29] AcSynVat II, 2:568–569, 5:653–654.

toral office and those who are close to the sick person by family relationship, friendship, or the ministry of healing (such as nurses and doctors). The canon does not mention, since it is sufficiently obvious, that the sick person himself or herself should ask for the sacrament if those who have the responsibility of caring and healing are negligent.[30]

Anointing of Several Persons

Canon 1002 — The communal celebration of the anointing of the sick for many of the sick at once, who have been suitably prepared and are properly disposed, can be performed according to the prescripts of the diocesan bishop.

This canon, which did not appear in early drafts of the recodification, does not refer to the communal celebration of the sacrament for a single person (or of a very few persons). It is always desirable that at least some small community of the Christian people assemble and participate;[31] this dimension of communal celebration is always stressed in the revised ritual.[32]

The canon is instead concerned with cases in which there are several or many persons to be anointed together in a single rite, and it is based on the new Roman Ritual: "The local Ordinary has the responsibility of supervising celebrations at which sick persons from various parishes or hospitals may come together to receive the sacrament."[33] (The text of the canon employs "diocesan bishop" rather than "local Ordinary," a change which indicates the role of the bishop as president and moderator of the liturgy in the particular church.)[34]

Directions are provided in the ritual itself for the "Celebration of Anointing in a Large Congregation," suited to occasions such as large gatherings whether of a diocese, city, parish, or society for the sick or smaller groups in hospitals, nursing homes, and the like.[35] The first contemporary exemplar of large-scale celebrations of the sacrament was a gathering at Lourdes in 1969, at which a trial use of the rite was allowed.[36]

A pastoral note is added in English-language editions of the ritual: "In particular, the practice of indiscriminately anointing large numbers of persons on these occasions simply because they are ill or have reached an advanced age is to be avoided. Only those whose health is seriously impaired by sickness or old age are proper subjects for the sacrament."[37] For more on this issue, see the commentary on canon 1004.

CHAPTER II
THE MINISTER OF THE ANOINTING OF THE SICK
[c. 1003]

Canon 1003 — §1. Every priest and a priest alone validly administers the anointing of the sick.

§2. All priests to whom the care of souls has been entrusted have the duty and right of administering the anointing of the sick for the faithful entrusted to their pastoral office. For a reasonable cause, any other priest can administer this sacrament with at least the presumed consent of the priest mentioned above.

§3. Any priest is permitted to carry blessed oil with him so that he is able to administer the sacrament of the anointing of the sick in a case of necessity.

The first two paragraphs of this canon distinguish between validity and licitness: the ministration of the anointing of the sick may be done validly by any priest (bishop or presbyter) and only by a priest. At the same time, out of respect

[30] RAnointing 13, DOL 3333.
[31] In accord with SC 26–27 and c. 837.
[32] RAnointing 35–36, DOL 3355–3356.
[33] RAnointing 17, DOL 3337.
[34] Canon 835, §1.
[35] RAnointing 83–85.
[36] N 6 (1970) 13–33; CLD 7, 687.
[37] Pastoral Care 78.

for those exercising the pastoral office in a particular place or community, the law declares that not every priest acts lawfully in the celebration of the sacrament. Those who have the pastoral office called the "care of souls," moreover, have not only the right but also the duty to celebrate the sacrament with the sick entrusted to their care.

In the last stages of the revision, an unsuccessful effort was made to remove the words valide (much debated in the process of revision) and omnis et solus from the text of paragraph one, which follows canon 938, §1 of the 1917 code closely. The omission was proposed on the grounds that the statement cannot be supported historically, at least for the first eight centuries; the new Roman Ritual does not refer to validity in this connection; and the Council of Trent simply used the expression "proper minister" in regard to the priest.[38] The redacting commission preferred to retain the 1917 text. The Latin text has sacerdos, to include both bishops and presbyters.

This canon precludes, at least for the present time and discipline, the celebration of the sacrament by deacons, although this concession is widely desired in the United States, Germany, and other countries. The restriction is partly because of a desire to retain the relationship of the sacrament to the anointing mentioned in the letter of James, which speaks of presbyters or elders, who are understood to be those in positions of authority in the local Christian community.[39] The anathema of Trent, concerned with those who held that lay persons could administer anointing, did not speak directly to the question of validity, nor did it have any direct bearing upon the possibility of anointing by deacons.[40] The extent to which the question may remain open to future development depends upon the complex relation of sacramental anointing to other kinds of anointing, whether by lay persons or by the ordained, referred to in the commentary at the beginning of this title of canons.

In paragraph two the obligation of those who have the pastoral office (pastors, parochial vicars, chaplains, etc.) to administer the sacrament is coupled with a right. This right excludes other priests, if they do not have a reasonable cause, from intervening in this sacramental ministry to the sick of a given parish or community. It is generally not difficult to presume the permission of those who have the pastoral responsibility, but this presumption should not result in a needless repetition of the sacrament, in accord with the limitation prescribed in canon 1004, §2.

The ritual enlarges upon the ministry of the priest in relation to anointing of the sick. The ministers > have the pastoral responsibility both of preparing and helping the sick and others who are present, with the assistance of religious and laity, and of celebrating the sacrament.

>
> The local Ordinary [now, the diocesan bishop] has the responsibility of supervising celebrations at which sick persons from various parishes or hospitals may come together to receive the sacrament.

> Other priests also confer the sacrament of anointing with the consent of the minister mentioned [bishops, pastors, vicars, priests responsible for the sick or aged in hospitals, and superiors of clerical religious institutes]. Presuming such consent in a case of necessity, a priest need only inform the parish priest (pastor) or hospital chaplain later.

> When two or more priests are present for the anointing, one of them may say the prayers and carry out the anointings, saying the sacramental form. The others may take the remaining parts, such as the introductory rites, readings, invocations, etc. Each priest may lay hands on the sick person.[41]

[38] Rel, 237; Trent, sess. XIV, de extr. unctione, c. 3.

[39] Jerome Biblical Commentary (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1968) 377; K. Condon, "The Sacrament of Healing," in T. Worden, ed., Sacraments in Scripture (Springfield, Ill.: Templegate, 1966) 176–179.

[40] Trent, sess. XIV, de extr. unctione, c. 4.

Given the reduction in the number of anointings, it is not feasible to follow the Eastern usage, in which several priests participate in the several anointings of a single person; as noted above and in the commentary on canon 1002, if there are several or many sick persons, a number of priests may perform the anointings. The ritual, moreover, treats at length the offices and ministries to the sick of non-ordained Christians.[42]

The keeping of the oil of the sick in a suitable and worthy manner is required by canon 847, §2. In particular, the prohibition of keeping of the oils in the parochial residence, mentioned in the former law, is effectively replaced by the concession of paragraph three of canon 1003. This change had been anticipated along the same lines in a decree of 1965, which gave local ordinaries power to allow priests "the permission to carry the oil of the sick with them, especially when using the various means of transportation to travel."[43] As is evident from canon 999, this 1965 concession and that of canon 1003, §3 are now less significant since any priest may bless any (plant) oil in case of necessity when he is to minister the sacrament of anointing of the sick.

CHAPTER III
THOSE ON WHOM THE ANOINTING OF THE SICK IS TO BE CONFERRED
[cc. 1004–1007]

The four canons of this final chapter on anointing give, first, the basic norm for the celebration and even repetition of the sacrament (c. 1004), then special cases of doubtful capacity to receive the sacraments (cc. 1005–1006) and of persons who persist in public circumstances of sinful life (c. 1007).

In particular, the chapter, while providing adequate clarity for canonical purposes, represents a development and broadening with regard to those who may and should be strengthened spiritually, physically, and psychologically by anointing, both the changes directly sought by Vatican II and the further changes found in postconciliar papal and curial documents. As commented upon at the beginning of the title on anointing of the sick, this reflects the contemporary sense of the Church to enlarge the occasions when the sacrament may and should be celebrated.

The anointing of the sick is one of the three sacraments governed by canon 844 so far as interconfessional sharing is concerned; see paragraphs two to four of that canon.

Those to Be Anointed

Canon 1004 — §1. The anointing of the sick can be administered to a member of the faithful who, having reached the use of reason, begins to be in danger due to sickness or old age.

§2. This sacrament can be repeated if the sick person, having recovered, again becomes gravely ill or if the condition becomes more grave during the same illness.

From one viewpoint, paragraph one of canon 1004 simply determines which Christian believers are eligible to receive the anointing of the sick. The reference to "member of the faithful" must not be understood to exclude those persons of other churches and ecclesial communities covered by canon 844, §§3–4.

From another viewpoint, by the phrase, "begins to be in danger," paragraph one specifies what is called in canon 1001 the appropriate time to celebrate this sacrament, namely, at the beginning of serious illness or of old age. The reference to the Christian's having reached the use of reason is a concern because of the aspect of anointing as consummating or completing Christian penance,[44] namely, in the divine forgiveness of (personal) sin; on this question, however, see the commentary on canon 1005, below.

[41] RAnointing 17–19, DOL 3337–3339.

[42] RAnointing 32–37, DOL 3352–3357.

[43] SCRit, decr Pientissima Mater Ecclesia, March 4, 1965, AAS 57 (1965) 409, DOL 3314; see also SCC, general directory Peregrinans in terra, April 30, 1969, AAS 61 (1969) 3605, DOL 2616.

The nature of the illness is not addressed in the canon, only its seriousness. This leaves open to further development the question of serious psychological illness. Although the sacrament has ordinarily been associated with physical impairment, the gravity and even peril or danger of some psychological disorders are undeniable, and thus English-language rituals, without attempting to give a final resolution to this issue, have the following pastoral note: "Some types of mental illness are now classified as serious. Those who are judged to have a serious mental illness and who would be strengthened by the sacrament may be anointed."[45]

During the process of drafting paragraph one of this canon, it was planned to add, in slightly adapted form, but explicitly, the following norms from the revised ritual:

> A sick person may be anointed before surgery whenever a serious illness is the reason for the surgery.
>
> Elderly people may be anointed if they have become notably weakened even though no serious illness is present.
>
> Sick children may be anointed if they have sufficient use of reason to be strengthened [confortari] by this sacrament.[46]

It was determined, however, that these paragraphs should be deleted from the draft of the canon because the matter was already regulated adequately by the revised ritual, i.e., by the liturgical law. In the final stages of consideration by the codifying commission, attempts to add these references and to add the mention of danger "of death" to paragraph one of this canon were not successful.

Thus it becomes important to refer to the introduction to the section of the Roman Ritual on the sacrament. This took as its starting point the conciliar intent to improve pastoral practice and, without replacing those traditions of anointing that were judged sound, to expand the potential occasions for its celebration in the Christian community.[47]

Both in the ritual and in the apostolic constitution introducing it, the degree of gravity or seriousness of the illness is left somewhat open, without explicit mention of the relationship of this seriousness to death, which may be a rather remote danger. This was done not to minimize the seriousness of the condition which calls for the celebration of the sacrament but to remove all hesitation about when it will be proper and fruitful to celebrate the sacrament. It also serves to correct what are now considered abuses[48] or aberrations in the tradition: to reserve the sacrament for cases of persons in extremis, to postpone the celebration until there is a high likelihood or near certainty of death, to insist upon medical confirmation of the possibility or even proximity of death, or to consider the anointing in itself or primarily the sacrament of the dying.

The Council of Trent, reflecting the problematical traditions and the pastoral practice of the period, recognized in effect two possibilities, giving primacy to anointing as the sacrament of the sick but attributing to it a secondary "name" of sacrament of the departing[49] because of the fre-

[44] RAnointing 6, DOL 3327 (following the Tridentine teaching on anointing, in the places cited above in notes 38 and 40).

[45] Pastoral Care 27 (n. 53).

[46] RAnointing 10–12, DOL 3330–3332.

[47] AcSynVat II, 5:654, where the conciliar commission speaks of, and seeks, an interpretatio latior.

[48] In submitting the matter to the conciliar fathers for their vote, the commission on the liturgy was explicit: "We intend to suppress the abuse of administering this sacrament only to those in articulo mortis or extreme danger to life" (AcSynVat II, 2:568).

[49] Sess. XIV, de extr. unctione, c. 3.

quent (and, in later centuries, usual and almost exclusive) occasions when the sacrament was given to the dying. The recovery of an older and sounder tradition, and indeed an enlargement of that tradition, is demanded by the other postconciliar expositions of the matter, in particular that of the Roman Ritual:

> The Letter of James states that the sick are to be anointed in order to raise them up and save them. Great care should be taken to see that those of the faithful whose health is seriously impaired by sickness or old age receive this sacrament.
>
> A prudent or reasonably sure judgment, without scruple, is sufficient for deciding on the seriousness of the illness; if necessary a doctor may be consulted.[50]

Commenting upon this development on the occasion of a communal anointing of a large number of sick persons, Paul VI explained:

> Here as in the other sacraments the Church's main concern is, of course, the soul, pardon for sin, and the increase of God's grace. But also, to the extent that it is up to the Church, its desire and intent is to obtain relief and, if possible, even healing for the sick.... The revision's intent was to make the overall purpose of the rite clearer and to lead to a wider availability of the sacrament and to extend it—within reasonable limits—even beyond cases of mortal illness.[51]

The careful balance between the wrongful restriction of the sacrament and its celebration for those not seriously ill is reflected also in an explanatory note attached, in English-language rituals, to the text of the praenotanda which refers to health as "seriously impaired by sickness or old age":

> The word periculose has been carefully studied and rendered as "seriously," rather than as "gravely," "dangerously," or "perilously." Such a rendering will serve to avoid restrictions upon the celebration of the sacrament. On the one hand, the sacrament may and should be given to anyone whose health is seriously impaired; on the other hand, it may not be given indiscriminately or to any person whose health is not seriously impaired.[52]

The same introduction of the Roman Ritual enlarges pastorally upon what is in paragraph one of canon 1004 (and also in c. 1001):

> In public and private catechesis, the faithful should be educated to ask for the sacrament of anointing and, as soon as the right time comes, to receive it with full faith and devotion. They should not follow the wrongful practice of delaying the reception of the sacrament. All who care for the sick should be taught the meaning and purpose of the sacrament.[53]

The Latin code's reference to "danger due to sickness or old age" is expressed somewhat differently in the corresponding Eastern code canons 738 ("The Christian faithful freely receive the anointing of the sick when they are gravely ill") and 740 (the presumption that those who lack consciousness or the use of reason "want this sacrament to be administered to them in danger of death and even at another time according to the judgment of the priest"). This language appears to have the effect of opening even more broadly than the Latin law the right of the gravely ill Christian to receive this sacrament.

Less commentary is required by paragraph two. It is the canonical tradition of the teaching on the repetition of the sacrament (in the same ill-

[50] RAnointing 8, DOL 3328.

[51] Homily, October 5, 1975, N 11 (1975) 257–258, DOL 3365. Emphasis added.

[52] Pastoral Care 13 (n. 8).

[53] RAnointing 13, DOL 3333.

ness) by the Council of Trent.[54] In the preparation of the constitution on the liturgy, the intent was to remove this restriction; after the conciliar debate, any mention of repetition of anointing was omitted from the constitution because of uncertain historical and theological precedents.[55]

The text of paragraph two also represents developments since Vatican II, in particular the teaching of Paul VI: "The sacrament may be repeated if the sick person recovers after being anointed and then again falls ill or if during the same illness the person's condition becomes more serious."[56]

Even before the broadening statement quoted, it had been understood that repetition of the sacrament "through the mere lapse of a long time without recovery"[57] was permissible, since a lengthy period might itself create the presumption of a newly critical or more seriously impaired condition. This presumption in favor of celebrating the sacrament is analogous to those situations mentioned in canon 1005, that is, the sacrament may be administered in case of doubt of a new seriousness of condition. It does not mean, however, that the sacrament should be administered on some regular basis, such as weekly or monthly, to the ill person, without any reference to the progress of the illness.

Special Cases

Canon 1005 — This sacrament is to be administered in a case of doubt whether the sick person has attained the use of reason, is dangerously ill, or is dead.

This canon differs from canon 941 of the 1917 code principally by the omission of any reference to conditional ministration in these instances of doubt. To avoid scruple on the part of the minister —and thus again to correct pastoral abuses which had denied the sacrament to some of the faithful who were seriously ill—any condition attached to the formula of anointing ("If you have attained the use of reason . . ." or "If you are living . . . ," etc.) is simply suppressed. In addition, the second of the three doubtful situations has been rephrased from the somewhat narrower text of the earlier code (doubt "whether he or she is truly in danger of death"). The canon, it should be noted, goes beyond the ritual and retains the language of obligation (ministretur) in all the cases of doubt which are mentioned.

(1) With regard to the first case of doubt (whether the age of reason has been attained), the canon is applicable to infants and young children incapable of sin and also to those who because of mental or other incapacity have never attained the use of reason. The norm of the ritual may be somewhat clearer: "Sick children may be anointed [in accord with the canon: are to be anointed] if they have sufficient use of reason to be strengthened [confortari] by this sacrament."[58] Canon 1005 in effect adds that the sacrament is to be administered even if it remains doubtful whether the child (or the retarded person) has sufficient reasoning power to be (spiritually, physically, and/or psychologically) strengthened by anointing. Although the limited requirement of the use of reason is related to the forgiving nature and effect of the sacrament, there is no demand that the child should have committed any sin or be repentant for any sin. Finally, there is no application of this canon (or of c. 1004, §1) to those who have had the use of reason and then have become mentally incompetent; no doubt whatever exists in such cases, and such persons are to be anointed, much the same as the persons referred to in canon 1006.

(2) With regard to the second case of doubt (whether there is dangerous illness), canon 1005 simply extends the norm of canon 1004, §1 to all cases in which the seriousness of impaired health is doubtful.

[54] Sess. XIV, de extr. unctione, c. 3.

[55] AcSynVat II, 2:569 ("lest the Council enter into disputed questions").

[56] Sacram unctionem infirmorum, DOL 3318; RAnointing 9, DOL 3329.

[57] Abbo-Hannan 2:63.

[58] RAnointing 12, DOL 3332.

(3) With regard to the third case of doubt (whether the person is alive or dead), it is certain that the sacrament of the anointing of the sick—which is also the sacrament of the dying in the case of those who were unable to be anointed or in fact were not anointed at an earlier and proper time in the illness—may not be given to a dead person. This would be improper; none of the seven sacraments may be given to a person who is dead. The norm of the Roman Ritual is explicit on this point: "When a priest has been called to attend those who are already dead, he should not administer the sacrament of anointing. Instead he should pray for them, asking that God forgive their sins and graciously receive them into the kingdom."[59] For this reason, English-language rituals add a number of appropriate prayers, psalms, and biblical readings so that the minister may follow the direction just quoted if indeed the person is dead.[60] Some of these texts are taken from the Order of Christian Funerals, as is suggested by the Roman Ritual itself.[61]

The canon, however, rephrases the liturgical law ("But if the priest is doubtful whether the sick person is dead, he may give the sacrament conditionally"—but without mention of the condition) and reinstates the language of obligation. In other words, if there is genuine doubt whether death has occurred, the person should be anointed. The judgment is one that it should be possible for the minister himself to make; alternatively, he should ordinarily be able to rely upon medical judgment.[62]

Canon 1006 — This sacrament is to be conferred on the sick who at least implicitly requested it when they were in control of their faculties.

Since often the nature of a serious illness is such that the person is unable consciously to ask for the sacrament, the canon is substantially the same as the current liturgical and pastoral norm: "The sacrament of anointing may be conferred [in accord with the canon: is to be conferred] upon sick people who, although they have lost consciousness or the use of reason would, as Christian believers, probably have asked for it were they in control of their faculties."[63]

In effect, a presumption is established that the Christian believer is desirous of receiving the sacrament of anointing of the sick—unless there is contrary evidence such as that described in canon 1007, which follows. In the past the desire of the believer to receive the sacrament has been called an implicit habitual intention, sufficient even if it is merely internal.

Canon 1007 — The anointing of the sick is not to be conferred upon those who persevere obstinately in manifest grave sin.

The canon is derived from canon 942 of the 1917 code: "The sacrament is not to be conferred upon those who, impenitent, contumaciously persist in manifest serious sin; if this is doubtful, it should be conferred conditionally." A comparison of the language of the former and revised canons indicates substantial agreement. As in other cases in which doubt exists, the presumption favors the celebration of the sacrament but—again, as in other doubtful cases such as those mentioned in canon 1005—the revised law suppresses the reference to conditional anointing. This change may be attributed to a development that sees no need for the minister of the sacrament to advert to a potential invalidity of the sacrament because of lack of intention on the part of the one to be anointed; quite the contrary, this intention may be presumed in every case.

In any event, the prohibited case is that of a public sinner whose obstinate perseverance in a sinful life is known.[64] The contemporary judgment of the Christian community will almost always appreciate and accept the likelihood of repentance.

[59] RAnointing 15, DOL 3335.
[60] Pastoral Care 189–198 (nn. 223–231).
[61] RAnointing 151.
[62] RAnointing 8, DOL 3328.
[63] RAnointing 14, DOL 3334.
[64] For similar cases, see cc. 915; 1184, §1, 3°.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(The following bibliographical material provides further information regarding the sacraments discussed in the titles of Book IV on penance and the anointing of the sick.)

Crichton, J. The Ministry of Reconciliation. London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1974.

Empereur, J. Prophetic Anointing. Wilmington, Del.: Glazier, 1982.

Green, T. "The Revision of Sacramental Law: Perspectives on the Sacraments Other Than Marriage." Stud Can 11 (1977) 261–327.

Gusmer, C. And You Visited Me: Sacramental Ministry to the Sick and the Dying. Revised ed. New York: Pueblo, 1989.

Häring, B. Shalom: Peace: The Sacrament of Reconciliation. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1967.

ICEL. Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1983.

———. The Rites of the Catholic Church. 2 vols. New York: Pueblo, 1976–1980.

Keifer, R., and McManus, F. The Rite of Penance: Commentaries. I, Understanding the Document. Washington: Liturgical Conference, 1975.

Örsy, L. The Evolving Church and the Sacrament of Penance. Denville, N.J.: Dimension Books, 1978.

Osborne, K. Reconciliation and Justification: The Sacrament and Its Theology. New York: Paulist, 1990.

Palmer, P. ed. Sources of Christian Theology. II, Sacraments and Forgiveness. Westminster, Md.: Newman 1955.

Schillebeeckx, E., ed. Sacramental Reconciliation (Con 61). New York: Herder and Herder, 1971.

TITLE VI
ORDERS
[cc. 1008–1054]

Canons 1008–1054 primarily concern the specific juridic and sacramental act of ordination to sacred ministry and the preparation which precedes it. The canons focus most particularly on ordination to the diaconate (whether transitional or permanent) and to the ministerial priesthood.[1] The sources of these canons fall primarily into three groups: (1) documents of the Second Vatican Council, most notably Lumen gentium, Presbyterorum ordinis, and Optatam totius; (2) the 1917 Code of Canon Law; and (3) writings by various popes and Vatican dicasteries.[2]

Canons 1008–1054 remind us of the remarkably early and enduring foundation of the Church's juridic understanding of ordained ministry, as well as the elasticity of that understanding as it has developed through the ages. For instance, the articulation of the matter and form of presbyteral ordination has developed, as has the understanding of the episcopacy, as a distinct degree of orders requiring its own ordination; minor orders, once an innovation, are nearly beyond living memory, while the permanent diaconate is now a commonplace in many particular churches.

Many, if not most, of canons 1008–1054 are properly open to interpretation in light of local circumstances. All of these canons are derived from a fundamental mystery of grace beyond the Church's control: God calls certain persons in specific time-and-place-dependent settings to come forth for ordained service to the Catholic Christian faithful. Grounded in mystery, subject to historical vicissitudes, and composed of ancient and constant elements, these canons call us less to an immersion in a canonical science marked by precision than to an appreciation of the Church's evolving attentiveness to the Spirit's movement regarding sacred ministry. Canons 1008–1054 invite us to appreciate ordained ministry as central to the sacramental efficacy of God's graces present in and through the Church. The canons also remind us of our adherence to the faith as it is revealed and lived in a hierarchically constituted Church.

Nature of Sacrament of Orders

Canon 1008 — By divine institution, the sacrament of orders establishes some among the Christian faithful as sacred ministers through an indelible character which marks them. They are consecrated and designated, each according to his grade, to nourish the people of God, fulfilling in the person of Christ the Head the functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing.

Sacred ministry was intended by Jesus Christ, and the Church has traditionally recognized ordination to ministry as being one of the seven sacraments instituted by Christ for the good of his Church. Within this sacrament are three orders: the episcopate, the presbyterate, and the diaconate (c. 1009, §1). Ordination is one of the three sacraments which bestow an indelible character on the recipient (c. 845, §1). This character of orders is received but once, regardless of how many of the three orders one receives in his lifetime. Once validly received, an ordination cannot be invalidated (c. 290). A valid ordination is performed by a bishop who intends to ordain the candidate according to the mind of the Church; the candidate is a validly baptized adult male who intends to be ordained for sacred ministry, as understood by the Church. The ordination follows a proper ritual, the execution of which includes the imposition of hands and the prayer of consecration.

[1] Regarding the title De ordine (instead of, for instance, De ordinatione), see Comm 10 (1978) 179.

[2] For different and accessible sources and histories of specific themes relative to canons 1008–1054, see the following: E. Gilbert, in CLSA Com, 713–736; J. González del Valle, in Pamplona ComEng, 632–659; and D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 548–571. For a treatment of parallel issues in the Eastern code, see V. Pospishil, Pospishil Com, especially regarding CCEO 743–775.

Canon 1008 refers to "sacred ministers," a phrase canonically synonymous with "clerics." The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches makes this equality of terms explicit (CCEO 323, §1). Even one who is laicized or dismissed from the clerical state (e.g., c. 290, 2°–3°) is still properly considered a sacred minister in certain situations (e.g., c. 976).

Sacred ministers are "consecrated and designated" according to a specific grade. Hierarchically constituted by Christ, the Church recognizes the equality of all human persons (c. 208) but regards certain functions as reliant upon specific sacramental powers and teaching authority. Just as the rights, obligations, and functions within the Church will differ according to one's canonical status, so deacons, priests, and bishops are differentiated by their sacramental ordination, most notably by the manner in which they fulfill for the faithful "in the person of Christ the Head the functions of teaching, sanctifying, and governing."

The functions and demands associated with various states of life differ. However, as noted above, this does not negate a true equality among all the Christian faithful of whatever state of life (c. 208). In an often cited passage from Sedes sapientiae, Pius XII taught that because God is the principal author of all states of life, and of all natural and supernatural gifts, a true vocation to any state of life can be considered divine.[3] Marriage, for instance, is a vocation. Building on themes introduced in Gaudium et spes 47–52 and Apostolicam actuositatem 9–11, canon 226, §1 reminds us that married persons enjoy a vocation in which they participate in a unique way in the formation of the people of God. However, there are real differences within the body of the Church, according to each person's condition, state of life, or office (c. 208). Sacred ministers have unique responsibilities placed upon them. John Paul II unites theory and practice when he writes:

> What the Apostle Paul says of all Christians, that they must attain "to mature manhood, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph 4:13), can be applied specifically to priests, who are called to the perfection of charity and therefore to holiness, even more so because their pastoral ministry itself demands that they be living models for all the faithful.[4]

Canon 1008 suggests as much: sacred ministers, by divine institution through the sacrament of ordination, are consecrated and deputed so that, fulfilling in the person of Christ the Head the offices of teaching, sanctifying, and ruling, they feed the people of God. Much of what follows in the ensuing canons will concern expectations for those to be ordained to sacred ministry.

Three Grades of Orders

Canon 1009 — §1. The orders are the episcopate, the presbyterate, and the diaconate.

§2. They are conferred by the imposition of hands and the consecratory prayer which the liturgical books prescribe for the individual grades.

Canon 1009 specifies the diaconal, sacerdotal, and episcopal grades of orders. While the canonical distinctions among them are clarified throughout the code, the sacramental distinctions (especially between the orders of the presbyterate and the episcopate) are open to discussion among sacramental theologians. The distinction between the diaconate and the other two orders, however, is quite clear: the presbyterate and the episcopate are grades in the ministerial priesthood, to which the diaconate does not belong.

[3] Pius XII, apconst Sedes sapientiae, May 31, 1956, AAS 48 (1956) 357.

[4] John Paul II, apexhort PDV 156. English translation published by Libreria Editrice Vaticana, Vatican City, 1992.

The conferral of each order requires its own ordination rite. In recent centuries, the Church had recognized seven grades of orders. However, Paul VI amended this sevenfold understanding in 1972,[5] suppressing the minor orders of porter, lector, exorcist, and acolyte and instituting the ministries of lector and acolyte; tonsure no longer admitted one to the clerical state.

Conferral of sacred ordination consists in the laying on of hands and the prayer of consecration. Canon 744 of the Eastern code corresponds with this.

CHAPTER I
THE CELEBRATION AND MINISTER OF ORDINATION
[cc. 1010–1023]

Time of Ordination

Canon 1010 — Ordination is to be celebrated within the solemnities of the Mass on a Sunday or holy day of obligation. For pastoral reasons it can take place also on other days, even weekdays.

Ordination is conferred licitly only within the celebration of a Mass. The preferred day for such a ceremony is Sunday or a holy day of obligation, for several reasons. First, the presumption is that a Sunday or holy day worship carries with it an inherent solemnity befitting the occasion of a diaconal, sacerdotal, or episcopal ordination. Second, a priest or deacon will regularly exercise his sacred ministry, among other times, within the context of eucharistic liturgies on a Sunday or holy day of obligation. Third, practically speaking, on a Sunday a full congregation would likely participate in the ordination ritual, which is desirable (c. 1011, §2).

Canon 1010, however, is somewhat flexible regarding the preferred day, if pastoral reasons warrant the selection of another day, even a weekday. Such pastoral reasons might well be liturgical in nature, since the ordination itself might overshadow the community's Sunday or holy day liturgy. A primary pastoral reason for selecting a day other than a Sunday or other holy day might well be the convenience of those who would wish to attend, and for whom weekday travel might be an inhibiting factor.

Setting for Ordination

Canon 1011 — §1. Ordination generally is to be celebrated in the cathedral church; for pastoral reasons, however, it can be celebrated in another church or oratory.

§2. Clerics and other members of the Christian faithful must be invited to the ordination so that as large an assembly as possible is present at the celebration.

While canon 1010 governs the timing of an ordination, canon 1011, §1 regulates the proper place for such a ceremony. As with canon 1010, the rule is to be interpreted broadly so as to permit appropriate exceptions. Because of its centrality in the life of the community, a cathedral is an appropriate location, especially for those ordained for the service of a diocese. Further, the cathedral is an especially apt location for the ordination of diocesan priests, who will enjoy a strong priestly and, ideally, personal relationship with their bishop. However, an ordinand's home parish church, or a church where he has served, might be just as appropriate, as long as there is sufficient room for all congregants wishing to attend. Religious might find a church under their care to be an appropriate setting.

Canon 1011, §2 reinforces the obvious: because of the importance of an ordination in the corporate life of the faithful, laity and clergy alike are to show their support of the ordinand(s) by attending the service in as large a number as possible. Obviously, the selection of day, time, and place should take this into account.

[5] Mp Ministeria quaedam, August 15, 1972, AAS 64 (1972) 529–534.

Minister of Ordination

Canon 1012 — The minister of sacred ordination is a consecrated bishop.

The minister of sacred ordination is a consecrated bishop; this corresponds to Eastern code canons 743 and 744. Canon 1012 affirms the current and universal practice of the Church.

For purposes of this canon (1012) and canons 1013 and 1014, episcopal consecration is synonymous with episcopal ordination. The consecrating bishop himself must be validly ordained. A bishop who is himself illicitly but validly ordained in turn illicitly but validly ordains candidates to the diaconate and presbyterate. Even one who has removed himself from the episcopal college united with Rome ordains validly, though certainly illicitly.

Tradition has never held that more than one validly ordained bishop is absolutely necessary for episcopal ordination. However, the practice prior to the Council of Nicea (325) and continuing into the present affirms that at least three bishops ordain a bishop (one principal consecrator with two designated co-consecrators). Symbolically, the collegiality of the episcopate is apparent; practically, the Church is undoubtedly assured of the validity of the ordination, as three bishops participate in an ordination which requires only one of them for validity.

Pontifical Mandate for Episcopal Ordination

Canon 1013 — No bishop is permitted to consecrate anyone a bishop unless it is first evident that there is a pontifical mandate.

Canon 1013 safeguards hierarchical communion. The ordinary minister of valid and licit episcopal ordination is a consecrated bishop who is certain that a pontifical mandate has been issued in favor of the bishop-designate. A bishop illicitly but validly ordained himself illicitly but validly ordains to the episcopate. If a pontifical mandate is lacking for the one to be ordained, both the ordaining minister and the minister ordained incur a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See (c. 1382). Obviously, if the ordaining bishop himself is under a canonical penalty due to circumstances regarding his own episcopal ordination, the imputability of his participation in another episcopal ordination, especially one lacking a pontifical mandate, is seriously aggravated. The autonomy of the Holy See in designating bishops is notably threatened in some nations by forces external to the Church. At least regarding internal order, canons 1013 and 1382 seek to assure that there will be no threat to the security of pontifical (ecclesiastical) independence in these matters. One notable example in recent history is the episcopal ordination, without pontifical mandate, by the late Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre.[6]

Co-consecrators of a Bishop

Canon 1014 — Unless the Apostolic See has granted a dispensation, the principal bishop consecrator in an episcopal consecration is to be joined by at least two consecrating bishops; it is especially appropriate, however, that all the bishops present consecrate the elect together with the bishops mentioned.

Co-consecrating bishops who assist the principal ordaining bishop are not essential for the validity of the episcopal ordination, but they are necessary for its liceity. However, unlike an episcopal ordination lacking a pontifical mandate, no penalty is expressly incurred if such bishops are absent. In particular situations, it may not be possible for three bishops to be present, in which case a dispensation from this requirement is to be requested from the Holy See. The traditional practice of assisting or co-consecrating bishops emphasizes the symbolic unity and the practical collegiality of the episcopate. Eastern code canon 746 refers simply to ordination by three bishops, rather than a consecrating bishop and two co-consecrators.

[6] O. Bucci, "Lo scismo di Lefebvre documentazione," Apol 61 (1988) 529–555.

Dimissorial Letters

Canon 1015 — §1. Each person is to be ordained to the presbyterate or the diaconate by his proper bishop or with legitimate dimissorial letters from him.

§2. If not impeded by a just cause, the proper bishop is to ordain his own subjects personally; without an apostolic indult, however, he cannot ordain licitly a subject of an Eastern rite.

§3. The person who can give dimissorial letters to receive orders can himself also confer the same orders personally if he possesses the episcopal character.

A candidate for the diaconate or priesthood should be ordained by his own proper bishop, or by another bishop in possession of an appropriate dimissorial letter (c. 1015, §1). It is a matter of interpretation as to whether the ordering of options in this canon reflects a priority, although at least in the case of secular clergy their proper bishop is to be preferred; this is confirmed in the first sentence of the next canon.

The diocesan bishop should be the ordaining prelate who welcomes secular deacons and priests who will be serving the particular church. An auxiliary bishop of that same diocese can make the same point less credibly. For religious clergy, the diocesan bishop of the place of the ordination might still be preferred, since his presence enables him to thank the institute for its pastoral assistance, and in turn permits the institute to manifest publicly its pastoral commitment to the particular church and its bishop. On the other hand, a religious institute might invite one of its own members to be the ordaining minister, should it have a bishop in its ranks. An ordaining religious bishop highlights in his person the availability of religious clergy for pastoral cooperation with and in particular churches.

In the case of diocesan clergy, a dimissorial letter is issued by one's proper diocesan bishop (cc. 1016 and 1018), who presents the candidate for ordination and, indeed, grants permission for that order to be conferred by another competent bishop. In this way, there is no confusion about the diocese of incardination; and there is assurance that the ordination is licit as well as valid. In the case of religious clergy, a dimissorial letter is issued by the competent major superior (c. 1019), presenting the candidate for orders and requesting ordination for him by a duly authorized bishop.

A dimissorial letter is issued only by one's proper bishop, in the case of secular clergy, or one's competent major superior, in the case of religious clergy. For an ordination to occur licitly, if it is not being performed by the bishop of one's diocese of incardination, canon 1015, §1 requires the presentation of a dimissorial letter from the candidate's proper ordinary.

Ordained according to Rite, or Church Sui Iuris

Canon 1015, §2 states that a Latin rite bishop is to ordain his own subjects; one infers from this canon that Eastern rite subjects are to be ordained by their proper ordinaries. The reference here, of course, is to candidates for the diaconate (whether transitional or permanent) or the priesthood. The Latin rite bishop is obliged to care for Eastern rite Catholics in his diocese (c. 383, §2). However, his obligation to care for Eastern Catholics does not encompass a right to ordain ministers to serve them, though indeed such an ordination would be valid. Questions arise rarely with orders (but more commonly with certain marriage situations) in which one's actual rite is uncertain, or one's perceived or preferred rite is in conflict with one's actual rite (cc. 111–112). That is, a man may have been baptized in one church sui iuris but reared and educated in another; he may not even know the facts regarding his infant baptism, which surface when documentation is sought during his training. In such cases, one's actual rite should be brought into conformity with one's perceived or preferred rite, according to the norm of law.

In cases in which the competent authorities and the man himself agree on the necessity or even advisability of the ordination of an Eastern rite subject by a Latin rite bishop, an indult from the Holy See is necessary for the licit celebration of the sacrament. If the competent authorities (e.g., a Latin rite bishop and an eparchial bishop) do not agree on who should ordain the man, the aspirant maintains the right to pursue the matter of an indult nonetheless. His decision to do so may be linked with his own discernment regarding an eventual petition for a change of rite, depending on the response to the indult request.

An Apparent Tautology

Canon 1015, §3 states that the person who can give dimissorial letters for a diaconal or presbyteral candidate may also be competent by law to perform the ordination itself. The canon is somewhat tautological; indeed, a bishop who can grant dimissorial letters is likely the preferred minister of ordination. According to c. 1015, §1 and §2, at least in the case of secular clergy, the proper diocesan bishop should be the minister of ordination for presbyters and deacons in his diocese. If that bishop is not the ordaining minister, he would also be the source of dimissorial letters granting the ordaining authority to another bishop. Hence, according to this canon, one who can issue such a letter could have performed the ordination. An auxiliary bishop may not issue dimissorial letters in normal circumstances, and so he may not ordain licitly unless he receives such a letter from the ordinary who has jurisdiction over the candidate or candidates (cc. 1018–1019).

Proper Bishop for Ordination

Canon 1016 — As regards the diaconal ordination of those who intend to be enrolled in the secular clergy, the proper bishop is the bishop of the diocese in which the candidate has a domicile or the bishop of the diocese to which the candidate is determined to devote himself. As regards the presbyteral ordination of secular clerics, it is the bishop of the diocese in which the candidate was incardinated through the diaconate.

According to canon 1016, the proper bishop for a diaconal candidate is the bishop in whose diocese that candidate has established domicile (c. 102), or the bishop of the diocese in which that candidate will minister. The applicability of one or the other is the fruit of discernment between the candidate and the bishops in question. However, the decision to admit the willing candidate to the diaconate belongs ultimately and solely to the bishop of the diocese in which the man will be incardinated (cc. 265–272). Once a secular transitional deacon is incardinated into a diocese, that same bishop (or his successor) will be his proper bishop for all matters relating to his presbyteral preparation and ordination. Whether a permanent or transitional deacon, the incardinated secular cleric enjoys all clerical rights proper to his state, and is bound by all its obligations as enunciated in universal (cc. 273–289) and particular law.

Territoriality and Conferral of Orders

Canon 1017 — A bishop cannot confer orders outside his own jurisdiction without the permission of the diocesan bishop.

Permission must be granted by the local diocesan bishop before another bishop may confer orders in the former's jurisdiction. This is distinct from the matter of dimissorial letters. Dimissorials concern the permission to ordain a man as granted by the competent authority to which he will be accountable ministerially. Canon 1017, in contrast, concerns the one who has episcopal authority not over the ordinand, but over the place where the ordination is to occur. Canon 1017 should be read as a concrete example of the territoriality of jurisdiction (see principle eight for the revision of the code).

A dimissorial letter permits a secular candidate to be ordained by someone other than his own proper bishop, or enables ordination by a duly authorized bishop in the case of a religious candidate. The ordaining minister may well be the bishop of another diocese; if the ceremony takes place within that bishop's jurisdiction, then the dimissorial letter suffices, and of course would not be necessary if the candidate is the bishop's subject.

However, if that bishop is to ordain licitly someone in a ceremony outside the jurisdiction of his particular church or outside of his own personal jurisdiction, he must receive the express permission of the bishop of the diocese in which the ceremony will take place. This permission is required for the licit ordination of any candidate, whether a subject of the ordaining bishop or not, if the ceremony takes place outside his jurisdiction. Likewise, any titular bishop, auxiliary bishop, or religious bishop who is not the local episcopal authority must receive the latter's explicit permission to ordain licitly anyone in that bishop's territory.

Dimissorial Letters for Seculars

Canon 1018 — §1. The following can give dimissorial letters for secular clergy:

1° the proper bishop mentioned in can. 1016;

2° an apostolic administrator and, with the consent of the college of consultors, a diocesan administrator; with the consent of the council mentioned in can. 495, §2, an apostolic pro-vicar and an apostolic pro-prefect.

§2. A diocesan administrator, apostolic pro-vicar, and apostolic pro-prefect are not to grant dimissorial letters to those who have been denied admission to orders by the diocesan bishop, the apostolic vicar, or the apostolic prefect.

For diocesan clergy, dimissorial letters usually are issued by the proper bishop (c. 1016). Clearly, the proper bishop of the ordinand's diocese of incardination has legal authority to issue dimissorials. Canon 1018 states expressly that an apostolic administrator with proper jurisdiction also has the authority to issue dimissorials, once proper consultation has been undertaken. In the case of a vacant see or a particular church other than a diocese, the diocesan administrator, apostolic pro-vicar, or apostolic pro-prefect is to seek the consent of the relevant council prior to the issuance of the dimissorial.

Canon 1018, §1, 2° presents an important restriction: a diocesan administrator must have the consent of his college of consultors to issue such dimissorials. It is true that canon 428, §1 restricts the administrator from any diocesan innovation or alteration, or any exercise of authority prejudicial to the subsequent diocesan bishop. However, the ordination of those in the normal course of formation would hardly constitute such an innovation and thus is permissible.

Canon 495, §2 is referenced in canon 1018 as it applies to apostolic pro-vicars and apostolic pro-prefects. While express mention is not made of them, apostolic vicars and apostolic prefects also presumably enjoy jurisdiction to issue dimissorials, in light of canon 368, which likens the vicariate and prefecture to a diocese. Their jurisdiction is analogous to that enjoyed by a diocesan bishop over his particular church (c. 381, §2).

Those temporarily presiding over a community implicitly referred to in canon 1018 may not countermand a prior decision of the one who last held that office permanently. Canon 1018, §2 attempts to preclude a potential abuse here: if a diocesan bishop, apostolic vicar, or apostolic prefect has earlier denied a man admission to orders, that denial must stand until a successor takes stable possession of the office. This is true despite the contrary opinion of the college of consultors or missionary council, or despite an earlier decision which may have been unfair.

Dimissorial Letters for Religious

Canon 1019 — §1. The major superior of a clerical religious institute of pontifical right or of a clerical society of apostolic life of pontifical right is competent to grant dimissorial letters for the diaconate and the presbyterate to their subjects who are enrolled perpetually or definitively in the institute or society according to their constitutions.

§2. The law for secular clerics governs the ordination of all other candidates of any institute or society; any other indult granted to superiors is revoked.

While the previous canon governs those who may grant dimissorial letters for secular clergy, canon 1019 addresses those ordination candidates who are members of certain religious institutes or apostolic societies. Specifically, a major superior of a pontifical clerical religious institute may issue dimissorials for those perpetually vowed to that institute; the same is true for a major superior of a pontifical clerical society of apostolic life as regards those definitively ascribed to that society. This applies to candidates for the diaconate and the presbyterate. Dimissorials presume the completion of the preparatory formation of the candidate and the fulfillment of all binding legal norms, including incorporation into the institute. Those not yet perpetually incorporated into the institute must seek early profession, by indult if necessary, or possess an indult from the Holy See permitting the ordination prior to perpetual incorporation. Major superiors of diocesan institutes may not issue dimissorials.

Canon 1019, §2 enunciates two further points. First, if the candidate is not a definitively incorporated member of a pontifical society or institute, then the pertinent norms on dimissorials are those governing candidates for the diocesan clergy (c. 1018). Hence, for instance, candidates to be ordained for service in religious institutes, or in societies of apostolic life which are not clerical and of pontifical right receive dimissorials from the proper bishop. Second, if a non-clerical or non-pontifical right institute or society had enjoyed an indult permitting the superior to issue dimissorials, it was revoked on November 27, 1983, when the current code took effect.

Necessary Testimonials and Other Documents

Canon 1020 — Dimissorial letters are not to be granted unless all the testimonials and documents required by law according to the norm of cann. 1050 and 1051 have been obtained beforehand.

A testimonial letter primarily certifies a candidate's fitness for orders. Minimally, this certification regards the man's academic preparation, his reception of diaconate (if he is to be ordained a priest), and his sacramental history (c. 1050, 1°–3°); also included is an affirmation that he has received the ministries of lector and acolyte, and that he has freely and knowingly requested, in writing, the reception of orders (c. 1050, 3°). Well-informed parties are to attest that the candidate is morally fit and generally apt for orders (c. 1051). For a married man to be ordained to the permanent diaconate, the testimonial letter prepared on his behalf is to include the affirmation that his spouse consents to his ordination (c. 1050, 3°). Such information differs technically from a dimissorial letter, which specifically concerns only the bishop who may ordain a given candidate.[7]

Canon 1020 indicates a certain priority in the issuance of documentation regarding an ordinand. The materials associated with testimonials (regarding, for example, a man's sacramental history and fitness for orders) are to be assembled and known to be complete before the issuance of any dimissorial. The logic of such a provision is obvious: attestations of a man's aptness for orders must be finalized before the practical details of his ordination (e.g., designation of the ordaining prelate) are resolved.

While the ordaining prelate, in possession of a proper dimissorial if necessary, must be morally certain of a candidate's fitness,[8] he need not himself review all pertinent testimonials for those not his subjects,[9] and such a review would normally not take place. Careful assessment of testimonial materials is the obligation of the candidate's proper ordinary. After a review of the documentation which finds a candidate suitable for orders, the dimissorial is issued (if necessary); and the ordination may proceed without the ordaining prelate's revisiting the matter of testimonials.

[7] See commentary on c. 1015, §1.

[8] See cc. 1025, §1 and §2; 1052, §1 and §3.

Eligibility to Receive Dimissorials

Canon 1021 — Dimissorial letters can be sent to any bishop in communion with the Apostolic See except to a bishop of a rite different from the rite of the candidate unless there is an apostolic indult.

With a correctly issued dimissorial in hand, any bishop in union with Rome may ordain a man presented him, provided that the bishop belongs to the same ritual church as the candidate he is to ordain. If the two are not of the same sui iuris church, an apostolic indult is required before the ordination may proceed. Without an apostolic indult (c. 1015, §2), a Latin rite bishop may not licitly ordain an Eastern rite candidate. Eastern code canon 747 affirms that a candidate to the diaconate or presbyterate should be ordained by his own eparchial bishop, or by another bishop who is in possession of authentic, legitimate dimissorial letters.

Authenticity of Dimissorials

Canon 1022 — After the ordaining bishop has received legitimate dimissorial letters, he is not to proceed to the ordination unless it is clearly evident that the letters are authentic.

The lengthy and comprehensive process of preparing one for orders should not be marred by dishonesty on the part of anyone associated with the process. A dimissorial letter represents the culminating moment in the process of finding a man fit for ordination. While even its issuance does not guarantee his ordination (as no one ever has a right to ordination), a dimissorial letter serves as a final clearance for his reception of orders. Since the dimissorial alone suffices as permission for an ordaining prelate to proceed,[10] its authenticity must be beyond question. Given the written correspondence and oral conversation which can easily take place today between an ordaining prelate and a candidate's proper ordinary, the falsification of such a document is now highly unlikely. Nonetheless, canon 1022 underscores the care which the Church demands in all matters concerning such a momentous act as diaconal or presbyteral ordination.

Conditions Regarding Issuance of Dimissorials

Canon 1023 — Dimissorial letters can be limited or revoked by the one who granted them or by his successor, but once granted they do not lapse when the authority of the one who granted them ceases.

The issuance of a dimissorial is a singular administrative act subject to norms governing executive power and administrative decrees (cc. 35–58). Canon 1023 specifies that the proper author of the dimissorial may condition its legal efficacy. For instance, the ordination in question might be subject to restrictions of time (after or prior to a given date) or place. Furthermore, a dimissorial is necessarily always ordinand-specific.

Canon 1023 also clearly states that the one who can grant a dimissorial can also revoke it according to the norm of law. This is also true for the legitimate successor of the dimissorial's author. Finally, the dimissorial itself is not dependent on the continued authority of its author. When he leaves office, the permission for ordination which the dimissorial grants does not cease.

[9] See c. 1052, §2.

[10] See commentary on c. 1020.

CHAPTER II
THOSE TO BE ORDAINED
[cc. 1024–1052]

Requisites for Validity of Ordination

Canon 1024 — A baptized male alone receives sacred ordination validly.

Canon 1024 is unambiguous: a baptized male alone receives sacred ordination validly. This is the authentic teaching of the Catholic Church. Eastern code canon 754 corresponds with this canon, with the exception of the Latin term recipit, which reads suscipere potest in the Eastern code.

Canon 842, §1 underlies canon 1024: baptism is a prerequisite for valid admission to, or reception of, all other sacraments. Besides the restriction that only baptized persons are ordained validly, canon 1024 states that such persons must be male.[11] The baptized male must be ordained by a consecrated bishop (c. 1012) according to the consecratory prayer and imposition of hands prescribed by the Church (c. 1009, §2).

Intentionality

In the actual ordination the ordaining bishop must intend to do what the Church intends him to do as minister of the sacrament. For his part, the ordinand must voluntarily, actively, and positively intend to receive the sacrament; he must have at least the habitual intention (or an actual intention not revoked) of receiving the Church's sacrament through ordination.[12] Pope John Paul II has spoken of this intention as "a conscious and free choice to do in his ministerial activities what the Church intends to do."[13] In this case, the positive intention manifested throughout formation by the candidate suffices, unless of course by some act of the will during the ordination the candidate renounces that intention. It can be argued that the subsequent voluntary celebration of liturgical acts proper to the diaconate or priesthood reflects the integrity of the cleric's intention to have received orders. In his ministerial activity, however halting at first, he effectively accepts the graces made available to him at his ordination; he publicly presents himself as the minister he intended to become, and which the Church intended him to become.

Requirements for Liceity of Ordination

Canon 1025 — §1. To confer the presbyteral or diaconal orders licitly, it is required that the candidate, having completed the period of probation according to the norm of law, is endowed in the judgment of his own bishop or of the competent [11] One contemporary magisterial document is of central relevance: John Paul II, aplett Ordinatio sacerdotalis, May 22, 1994, AAS 86 (1994) 545–548, Origins 24 (June 9, 1994) 49, 51–52. A subsequent CDF statement sought to clarify the authoritative nature of the teaching: CDF dubium, October 28, 1995, AAS 87 (1995) 1114, Origins 25 (November 30, 1995) 401, 403. For a significant document prior to Ordinatio sacerdotalis which addresses the pertinent issues in greater detail, see CDF decl Inter insigniores, October 15, 1976, AAS 69 (1976) 98–116, Origins 6 (February 3, 1977) 517, 519–524. For a succinct treatment of this issue, see Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 554–555. For a consideration of the weight to be given these magisterial teachings, see B. Ferme, "The Response (28 October 1995) of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith to the Dubium concerning the Apostolic Letter, Ordinatio Sacerdotalis (22 May 1994): Authority and Significance," P 85 (1996) 689–727; and F. Morrisey, "The Weight to Be Given to Recent Vatican Documents Regarding the Ordination of Women," in Proceedings of the Annual Conference of the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland (1997) 55–66. See also CTSA, "Study, Prayer Urged Regarding Women's Ordination 'Responsum,'" Origins 27 (June 19, 1997) 75–79; and NCCB Doctrine Committee Staff, "Response to CTSA Report on Women and Ordination," Origins 27 (October 2, 1997) 265, 267–271.

[12] "In adulto requiritur quoque intentio, seu voluntas saltem habitualis, i.e., quae actualis fuit et non est revocata, suscipiendi ordines." J. Creusen and A. Vermeersch, Epitome Iuris Canonici, Tomus II: Liber III Codicis Iuris Canonici (Malines, Belgium: H. Dessain, 1924) 140.

[13] PDV 51.

major superior with the necessary qualities, is prevented by no irregularity and no impediment, and has fulfilled the prerequisites according to the norm of cann. 1033–1039. Moreover, the documents mentioned in can. 1050 are to be obtained and the investigation mentioned in can. 1051 is to be completed.

§2. Furthermore, it is required that he is considered in the judgment of the same legitimate superior as useful for the ministry of the Church.

§3. The bishop ordaining his own subject who is destined to the service of another diocese must be sure that the one to be ordained is going to be attached to this other diocese.

Canon 1025 succinctly introduces the key themes of canons 1026 through 1039. Those to be ordained should be fit for ministry. One would not be called to ministry by God or, presumably, the community were it not for his potential to become an effective sacred minister.

Those to be ordained licitly must be free of canonical impediments and irregularities. A thorough investigation, which is the culmination of the ordinand's clerical formation, should affirm this freedom. Aspirants to sacred orders, even prior to being canonically designated as candidates, should be desirous of living a holy life and availing themselves of the Church's sacramental graces. They should be exceptionally well catechized and well informed regarding the order which they are about to receive. Personal holiness, sacramental practice, catechesis, and proper education regarding the clerical state are themes recurring often in the canons treating the formation of clerics (cc. 232–264), with particular attention given to those preparing for presbyteral ordination.

A formal admission to candidacy, which affirms the probable ministerial fitness of the candidate, welcomes those aspiring to diaconal and presbyteral orders (c. 1034, §1). To avoid confusion, the term "aspiring" is used for those not yet admitted to candidacy. The completion of a course of academic study of several years' duration serves to form future presbyters according to the mind of the Church.[14] All candidates must be assessed in terms of concerns not always easy to discern, such as correct intention (cc. 241, §1; 1029), and in areas easily assessed, such as completion of a pre-ordination retreat (cc. 246, §5; 1039).

Suitability of the Candidate and His Probable Usefulness in Ministry

The Church exercises its declared right to prepare its diaconal and presbyteral candidates as it sees fit for the service of the faithful (c. 232). Prior to any diaconal or presbyteral candidate's advancement to or within sacred orders, the bishop must be certain that the candidate's fitness (c. 1025, §1) has been proven by means of positive arguments (c. 1052, §1).

Canon 1025, §2 specifically reminds the ordaining prelate, the ordinand's ordinary, and (if applicable) the religious ordinary that the candidate must be considered useful for the Church's ministry. If he is useful for the particular church or institute into which he is to be incardinated, a candidate is useful to the universal Church (c. 368). From this concern flows a moral obligation which binds the relevant ordinary and his successors. It is presumed that the minister useful enough to be ordained will continue to be useful, and therefore fit for assignment, until the contrary is established. This expression of the notion of ministerial utility is not found in the Eastern code.

Given all that can be known about a candidate and the current and likely future needs of the faithful whom he will serve, canon 1025, §2 requires the ordinary to judge that the candidate will be able to fulfill his ministerial obligations. While no one can predict the future absolutely, the candidate's pastoral and apostolic efficacy must be assured in light of the needs of the particular church or institute for which he is to be ordained.

[14] See, for example, cc. 235, §1; 248–252; 256; and 1032, §1 and §2.

The Benefit of the Doubt

Canon 1025, §2 raises a couple of practical questions: what is a given candidate capable of doing as a sacred minister, and can he productively serve as such according to the mind of the Church? For cases in which probable, or at least potential, fitness and long-term utility are not clear, an aspirant should be dismissed from formation early if there is moral certitude that he is not a risk worth taking. Further, if a man's potential for future utility in the service of the faithful is in doubt, a strong moral argument can be made that the faithful deserve the benefit of the doubt more than does the aspirant, especially since he enjoys no right to ordination. Canon 1025, §2 discourages a minimalist approach in approving a man for orders.

Ordinaries must be cautious indeed not to encourage persons whose ministerial fitness and utility are in doubt. One might hope that a man will develop positively, but if such growth is not likely, it is unjust to all parties concerned to encourage him. If he later must be dismissed from formation because of problems which were known earlier and not considered remediable, then he has been treated unjustly if he has not been advised to pursue another vocation. If after ordination it becomes clear in practice that a man is ministerially inept, as earlier suspected, then he has been unjustly encouraged by superiors to believe that he might be something he cannot be. In such situations, the faithful have had thrust upon them a sacred minister who might well be a burden—and even a source of damage or scandal—in their common and individual spiritual lives.

Suitability for an Assignment

Despite being based on certain objective factors, the assessment of ministerial suitability is an unavoidably subjective process. Also, certain circumstances (e.g., cases of contemplatives) will call for unique applications of canon 1025, §2. Still, there must be positive arguments which convince the man's legitimate superior that the aspirant, as an ordained minister, will be useful for the Church. Advancement to ordination is tantamount to an affirmative response to this question. Once a deacon or priest, after thorough investigation, has been deemed fit and useful for ministry, he must be considered as such on an ongoing basis until there is manifest, positive evidence to the contrary. While no person has a right to ordination, canon 1025, §2 indicates that a man can expect to exercise orders already received, since by the fact of his ordination he has been positively deemed fit and useful for sacred ministry.[15]

Usefulness in Light of Clergy Shortage

A consideration of canon 1025, §2 should not be concluded without a mention of the clergy shortage. An ordinary might well determine that a shortage of ordained clergy, especially priests, limits or even precludes access by the faithful to the sacraments (c. 213). Properly disposed members of the faithful have a right to reception of the sacraments. Hence, it could be argued simplistically that in such a situation, any cleric who can supply needed sacramental assistance is deemed useful. Certainly, sacramental graces in general are efficacious regardless of the fitness or overall pastoral usefulness of the minister. However, as is obvious from even a cursory reading of canons 1025–1054, the Church has a serious concern to assure the ministerial quality of a candidate beyond his minimal ability to fulfill basic sacramental tasks. A dire need for clergy in particular circumstances must be weighed against the Church's care that its ministers meet fairly exacting standards for comprehensive pastoral activity.

Usefulness in Light of Clergy Abundance

Conversely, where there is a sufficiency or even abundance of ministerial candidates, the obligation for careful assessment is all the stronger. Benedict [15] This prior assessment of a man's ministerial fitness is relevant to the application of c. 1044, especially §2, 2° on an irregularity for the exercise of orders.

XIV cautioned in 1740 that "in fact progress is better made by having fewer ministers, but superior, fit, and useful, than many ministers, who might be worthless in the building up of the body of Christ, which is the Church."[16] Writing to the archbishops and bishops of Italy in 1906, Pope Pius X forcefully lamented the ordination of many simply for the sake of numbers. Particularly in places where there exists an abundance of willing candidates, bishops were and are to choose their ordinands carefully.

> We know there to be cities and dioceses where, far from being able to lament a scarcity of clergy, the number of priests is far superior to the need of the faithful. Indeed, what reason [is there], venerable brethren, to render so frequently the imposition of hands? If the scarcity of clergy cannot be reason enough to hurry into an affair of so great a gravity, [then] there, where the clergy exceeds the needs, there is nothing which excuses from the more discerning precautions and the total rigor in the selection of those who are to be admitted to the sacerdotal honor.[17]

Canon 1025, §3 addresses certain cases in which a diocesan clerical candidate's proposed place of incardination differs from his diocese of domicile. A man may be ordained a deacon (at which time he becomes an incardinated cleric) by his proper bishop for service outside the diocese of his domicile. The bishop must be certain that appropriate arrangements have been made for that service.

[16] "Melius enim profecto est pauciores habere Ministros, sed probos, sed idoneos, atque utiles, quam plures, qui in aedificationem Corporis Christi, quod est Ecclesia, nequicquam sint valituri." Benedict XIV, ency Ubi primum, September 13, 1740, in Benedicti XIV Pont. Opt. Max. Opera Omnia, vol. 15 (Prato, 1845) 4.

[17] "Sappiamo esservi città e diocesi, ove, lungi dal potersi lamentare scarsità nel clero, il numero dei sacerdoti è di gran lunga superiore alla necessità dei fedeli. Deh! qual motivo, o Venerabili Fratelli, di rendere così frequente la imposizione delle mani? Se la scarsità del clero non può essere ragione bastevole a precipitare in negozio di tanta gravità; là dove il clero sovrabbonda al bisogno, nulla è che scusi dalle più sottili cautele e da somma severità nella scelta di coloro, che debbano assumersi all'onore sacerdotale." Pius X, ency Pieni l'animo, July 28, 1906, ASS 39 (1906) 323.

ARTICLE 1: REQUIREMENTS IN THOSE TO BE ORDAINED [CC. 1026–1032]

Freedom of Candidates for Orders

Canon 1026 — A person must possess due freedom in order to be ordained. It is absolutely forbidden to force anyone in any way or for any reason to receive orders or to deter one who is canonically suitable from receiving them.

Canon 1026 directly and unequivocally addresses the candidate's moral freedom in approaching orders (c. 219). First, he must enjoy requisite freedom. Presumed, of course, is the unhindered use of reason: the candidate must be able to understand and must in fact understand that ordination is but one of several states of life available to him. He further must understand the rights and obligations of this particular state which he is now freely choosing. Not only must his intention be real and firm; it also must be free of any coercion which would lead one toward or away from ordination. This should be the case throughout formation: according to the age and personal development of each proposed candidate, care ought to be taken that he always advance with right intention and free exercise of his own will.[18]

Freedom to Request Ordination

Under no circumstances may one who is fit and prepared for ordination be turned away from his desired path. However, this does not refer to a denial of orders by legitimate authority, which may always preclude the ordination of doubtfully fit candidates in view of the good of the Church. Rather, the reference is here to a man's own withdrawal from consideration for ordination due to some external influence (e.g., friends, family, paramour, colleagues, or even a superior); such influence is absolutely forbidden.

[18] OT 6.

Freedom Not to Be Ordained

Conversely, one who is apparently fit and prepared for the reception of orders but who wishes to remove himself from consideration for ordination is morally free to do so. No outside agent (e.g., friends, family, colleagues, confessor, spiritual director, or even superior) may lead a candidate to advance to ordination when he desires otherwise. The candidate's moral freedom to choose ordination is a firm requirement for that ordination. It should be noted that sometimes the sources of external influences (e.g., parents) do not intend to be coercive, or they may be unaware that their son perceives in them a desire that he be ordained.

Lack of Moral Freedom, and Alleged Invalidity

Because intentionality is so difficult to assess, the possible invalidity of orders due to defective intention is difficult to prove, yet such a case could be tried according to canons 1708–1712. The presumption of validity (c. 124, §2) would be basic to any investigation into alleged invalidity, as would the fact that orders once validly received never become invalid (c. 290).

One apparently validly ordained might believe that, due to his lack of freedom, he consciously intended other than what the Church intended. Perhaps some irresistible force prompted his ordination (c. 125, §1). If, consequently, he believes in conscience that his orders are invalid, he may justly request that this alleged nullity be formally examined (cc. 1708–1712) so that he might demonstrate the truth of his claim. However, he does not have a right to an affirmative response to his petition. On the other hand, if over time he has lived his priesthood effectively and with a degree of contentment, and he is not troubled in conscience as he recalls his state of mind at the time of ordination, he simply should accept the apparent validity of his ordination.

A Perceived Deficiency of Freedom, and Release from Obligations of the Clerical State

Lacking a conscience-driven conviction about the invalidity of his ordination, or aware that supportive data to prove nullity might be lacking, a man could humbly request from the Holy See a dispensation from the obligations of the clerical state, including celibacy. The ordination is valid, but the man only later appreciates the moral freedom that was wanting at the time of his ordination. In such a situation, a man may find that he cannot live up to the demands of sacred ministry and cannot fulfill the obligations of the clerical state (including celibacy). He can petition the Holy See to be freed from those obligations through the process commonly known as laicization.[19] The petitioner asks that this grace be granted by the Holy See for pastoral reasons relevant to his unique circumstances; however, he has no right to such a favor.

Formation of Candidates for Orders

Canon 1027 — Those aspiring to the diaconate and presbyterate are to be formed by careful preparation, according to the norm of law.

Candidates for the transitional diaconate, the permanent diaconate, and the priesthood are to be formed by careful preparation. The Church's principal expectations of such candidates are presented particularly in this article (cc. 1026–1032), in the following one (cc. 1033–1039), and in the canons concerning the formation of clerics (cc. 232–264). Canon 1027 also implicitly encompasses particular law promulgated by the proper episcopal conference, most notably programs for priestly or diaconal formation.[20] Also, formational goals are to be particularized even at the level of the local seminary itself (c. 243).

[19] See cc. 290, 3°; 291; 292; and 1078, §2, 1°.

Instruction on Obligations of Orders

Canon 1028 — The diocesan bishop or the competent superior is to take care that before candidates are promoted to any order, they are instructed properly about those things which belong to the order and its obligations.

In formally petitioning for admission to sacred orders, a candidate presumably acts freely and knowingly. Canon 1028 clarifies certain concerns about the knowledge such candidates should have regarding clerical and ministerial obligations. Not only are candidates to be "formed by careful preparation, according to the norm of law" (c. 1027), but they are also to be particularly versed in the order itself and its obligations. The responsibility for assuring this awareness on the part of the candidate belongs to his proper ordinary.

Those involved in a candidate's formation should be particularly concerned about assessing his knowledge of the order to which he aspires. Attention to both universal law (cc. 232–264) and particular law (local or national programs of priestly formation), as well as practical, supervised pre-ordination pastoral experience should offer the aspirant correct information regarding these obligations. However, negligence or ignorance in this area, which may lead to a cleric's subsequent disregard of his obligations, does not in itself invalidate his ordination.

A candidate validly receives orders even if he is thoroughly confused about the essential obligations of the clerical life. This confusion may significantly impair his exercise of ministry. The ordinand is only partially to blame for such a situation, as a man's proper ordinary is ultimately responsible for the formation of candidates under his care. However, pronounced ignorance of the order received or its attendant obligations would certainly figure prominently in an argument for the ordinand's ultimate release from clerical obligations, should the presentation of a laicization petition later appear warranted.

Requisites for Orders

Canon 1029 — Only those are to be promoted to orders who, in the prudent judgment of their own bishop or of the competent major superior, all things considered, have integral faith, are moved by the right intention, have the requisite knowledge, possess a good reputation, and are endowed with integral morals and proven virtues and the other physical and psychic qualities in keeping with the order to be received.

Attentive to the unique pastoral circumstances confronting him, the proper ordinary must decide on the promotion to orders of each candidate presented. Along with those assisting him in the formation of clerics, the ordinary must be convinced of the aptitude of each candidate regarding integral faith, right intention, requisite knowledge, good reputation, integral morals, proven virtues, and other relevant physical and psychological qualities. Canon 1029 reiterates points raised in canon 241, §1 regarding the suitability of those admitted to the seminary. It is not always easy to evaluate whether or not a given man fulfills these criteria.

Denial of Presbyteral Ordination

Canon 1030 — Only for a canonical cause, even if occult, can the proper bishop or competent major superior forbid admission to the presbyterate to deacons subject to him who are destined to the presbyterate, without prejudice to recourse according to the norm of law.

No one has a right to presbyteral ordination, a sacrament to be conferred contingent upon the positive judgment of the competent authority. Canon 1052, §3 declares that, all matters of examination and documentation notwithstanding and even if the transitional deacon appears fully prepared to be ordained a priest, an ordaining bishop who has a sound reason to doubt the deacon's fitness may not promote him. A question arises about the meaning of the phrase "all these notwithstanding." Minimally, it refers to the immediately preceding canons which concern the requisite documentation attesting to the candidate's proven fitness (cc. 1050; 1051; 1052, §1 and §2). Canon 1051, 1° details relevant virtues in the candidate, recalling canon 1029. Weighty data not previously known may come to light, whether in the public forum or not, such that ordination to the priesthood would not be prudent. Lest the possibility of a refusal of priestly ordination mentioned in canon 1052, §3 be abused, canon 1030 offers protection to the transitional deacon, stating that any reason to deny him advancement to the priesthood must be canonically defensible.

[20] Such programs are specifically referenced in cc. 242, 249, 250, 260, and 261.

"Only for a Canonical Cause"

Canon 1030 states that a transitional deacon awaiting presbyteral ordination can be prevented from such by legitimate authority only for a canonical reason. What this means precisely is unclear and hence it may give rise to abusive interpretation. The canonical reason might not be known publicly (i.e., may be hidden or "occult"), complicating the matter further.

Although such a prohibition is not technically a penalty, the transitional deacon might not see it that way, especially if he is not given a fair explanation as to the problem that has arisen since his diaconal ordination. Further, though he does not have a canonical right to presbyteral ordination, the deacon might argue that he has a moral right, given the encouragement, even in writing, that was offered him throughout his formation. After all, he was previously found fit for ordination when he was ordained a deacon. Though canon 1030 articulates the canonical expectation that a transitional deacon will be advanced, the man does not enjoy a right to presbyteral ordination; hence canon 18 regarding strict interpretation of the law when rights are at stake apparently does not apply.

Unless very serious reasons justify the contrary, a transitional deacon should be advanced to the presbyterate; this is a serious canonical expectation. It seems that an ordinary's choice not to fulfill this legal expectation "only for a canonical cause" would have to be considered an administrative act. Hence, canons 50 and 51 would apply: proof about the deacon's unsuitability for presbyteral ordination would have to be gathered, and reasons for the decision would have to be issued in writing. However, those parties having knowledge of the problem—which necessarily must be serious—are obligated to protect the deacon's good name (c. 220). This may be difficult to do while gathering data, pursuing a consultation, and issuing a summary decree. In order to protect confidentiality, even less would the ordinary give his reasons to any members of the public at large, however interested they might be, and however much he might wish to defend his decision before them.

Compared with the 1917 code (CIC 970), canon 1030 represents a noteworthy shift in favor of the transitional deacon and away from arbitrary appraisals by legitimate authority. The canon states that a transitional deacon may seek canonical recourse should he determine that he has been unjustly denied promotion to the presbyterate (cc. 1732–1739). Ultimate recourse can be made to the Holy See.

Age, Marital Status, Interstices, and Sufficient Maturity

Canon 1031 — §1. The presbyterate is not to be conferred except on those who have completed the twenty-fifth year of age and possess sufficient maturity; an interval of at least six months is to be observed between the diaconate and the presbyterate. Those destined to the presbyterate are to be admitted to the order of deacon only after completing the twenty-third year of age.

§2. A candidate for the permanent diaconate who is not married is not to be admitted to the diaconate until after completing at least the twenty-fifth year of age; one who is married, not until after completing at least the thirty-fifth year of age and with the consent of his wife.

§3. The conference of bishops is free to establish norms which require an older age for the presbyterate and the permanent diaconate.

§4. A dispensation of more than a year from the age required according to the norm of §§1 and 2 is reserved to the Apostolic See.

Canon 1031 contains certain minimum requirements for licit ordination regarding: age, maturity, and prior diaconal ordination for presbyteral candidates; and age, marital status, and spousal consent for married candidates to the permanent diaconate.

The requirement that presbyteral candidates must "possess sufficient maturity" does not derive directly from any canonical source. Canon 1031, §1 refers to legitimate authority's evaluation of the presbyteral candidate's maturity prior to ordination.[21] Presbyteral ordination requires positive proof of maturity manifested before the fact even though it may not always be clear what "sufficient maturity" means here. In contrast, the minimum ages set forth in the canon, and the interstices between the diaconate and the priesthood, are not ambiguous.

The Latin church sets twenty-three as the minimum age for diaconal ordination for transitional deacons, while for the Eastern churches that minimum is twenty-three for all deacons. In the Latin church permanent deacons may not be ordained until they have completed twenty-five years of age if they are unmarried or thirty-five years if they are married. In the latter instance the consent of the diaconal candidate's spouse is required.[22] The Latin church sets the minimum age for presbyteral ordination at twenty-five, while for the Eastern churches one need be only twenty-four (CCEO 759, §1). Canon 1031, §3 also stipulates that an episcopal conference may determine a later, but not earlier, age of ordination for candidates to the priesthood and the permanent diaconate; however, the conference may not adjust the minimum age for the transitional diaconate. Particular law in the sui iuris Eastern churches may alter the minimum age for both the priesthood and the transitional diaconate (CCEO 759, §1).

The minimum age of ordination may be lowered for up to one year by the diocesan bishop, in individual cases; beyond that, a dispensation from the Holy See is required (c. 1031, §4). In light of canon 87, §1, the diocesan bishop may shorten the interstices, i.e., the required period of at least six months between diaconal and presbyteral ordination.

Canons 200–203 offer guidelines for computing when the minimum age for ordination has been reached. The first available licit ordination date would be the day after the birthday of the year mentioned in canon 1031, §1 and §2; for example, an unmarried permanent deacon is first available for licit ordination on the day following his twenty-fifth birthday.

Academic and Pastoral Prerequisites for Ordination

Canon 1032 — §1. Those aspiring to the presbyterate can be promoted to the diaconate only after they have completed the fifth year of the curriculum of philosophical and theological studies.

§2. After a deacon has completed the curriculum of studies and before he is promoted to the presbyterate, he is to take part in pastoral care, exercising the diaconal order, for a suitable time defined by the bishop or competent major superior.

[21] Admittedly, "in all too many cases psychological defects, sometimes of a pathological kind, reveal themselves only after ordination to the priesthood." CCE, instr "A Guide to Priestly Formation," in Norms for Priestly Formation, vol. 1 (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1993) 176.

[22] As regards the required consent of the spouse of a married candidate for the permanent diaconate, see commentary on c. 1050, 3°.

§3. A person aspiring to the permanent diaconate is not to be promoted to this order unless he has completed the time of formation.

Canon 1032 specifies the basic academic and pastoral requirements for ordination. Candidates for sacerdotal ministry may be promoted to the transitional diaconate only after having completed the fifth year of the curriculum of philosophical and theological studies (§1). Canon 235, §1 stipulates that at least four years of the training leading to priestly ordination are to take place in the setting of a major seminary.

Canon 1032, §1 should be read in conjunction with canons 232–264 regarding ministerial formation, especially canons 233, §2; 245; 248–252; and 256–258. The national and local implementation of the program of studies belongs to the proper episcopal conference (c. 242) and the proper bishop (c. 243).

Training in Directly Pastoral Work

Canon 1032, §2 distinguishes formal study from training in pastoral ministry. The transitional deacon exercises his order for a designated period of time. The implementation of this canon varies widely, depending on the norms of national programs of priestly formation and the adaptations unique to particular local preparation programs.

Canon 1032, §2 does not mandate that the transitional deacon be supervised by experienced parochial personnel, although such supervision would understandably be beneficial for all parties concerned. Canon 232 does not limit the training of clergy to seminary faculties and proper ordinaries; rather, all the faithful participate in this training. As the exercise of diaconal ministry falls within the period of time set aside to form the future presbyter, so care for his pastoral development belongs, at least in part, to the faithful he serves and, all the more so, to the leaders within the designated pastoral setting. While the transitional deacon is to be treated respectfully as a trained cleric, careful supervision of him during his pastoral internship is desirable.

Training for Permanent Deacons

Canon 1032, §3 addresses training for those destined to the permanent diaconate. Local training for aspirants to the permanent diaconate varies as widely as the manner in which their ministry will be exercised. In dioceses in which successive bishops have permitted and encouraged the training, ordination, and ministry of permanent deacons, preparation programs are organized accordingly. Canon 236 regulates the regional or local adaptation of universal norms governing formation requirements concerning residency and duration.

Article 2: The Prerequisites for Ordination [cc. 1033–1039]

Confirmation

Canon 1033 — A person is promoted licitly to orders only if he has received the sacrament of confirmation.

Reception of the sacrament of confirmation normally precedes acceptance into a clerical formation program, whether religious or secular. In the case of a religious program, proof of a man's confirmation precedes admission into the institute (c. 645, §1). In the case of a secular program, proof of confirmation precedes admission to the major seminary (c. 241, §2).

If one is born a Catholic, confirmation is received at the age customary according to approved local norms, unless there is some extraordinary circumstance (c. 891). If one is baptized into another church or ecclesial community and later received into the Catholic Church, confirmation would likely accompany his reception into the Church (c. 883, 2°). One baptized a Catholic as an adult generally is asked to wait for a period of time prior to admission to a seminary or a religious institute, thereby assuring a more than sufficient passage of time between confirmation and ordination.[23]

Canon 1033 mentions no time period which ought to elapse between confirmation and ordination. Confirmation could even proximately precede ordination, with proper permission; the validity of the ordination is not threatened even if the candidate is not confirmed.

Canon 1033 corresponds to Eastern code canon 758, §1, 1°, which calls for aspirants in the Eastern churches to have received chrismation with holy myron prior to ordination.

Formal Admission to Candidacy

Canon 1034 — §1. A person aspiring to the diaconate or presbyterate is not to be ordained unless he has first been enrolled among the candidates through the liturgical rite of admission by the authority mentioned in cann. 1016 and 1019; his petition is previously to have been written in his own hand, signed, and accepted in writing by the same authority.

§2. A person who has been received into a clerical institute through vows is not bound to obtain this admission.

The term "candidacy" is commonly used to include all those accepted into formal preparation for an eventual but not distant conferral of orders. More precisely, however, it refers to those who have been enrolled as candidates through the appropriate liturgical rite by the competent authority (cc. 1016 and 1019). The aspirant's petition is to be written in his own hand with his signature affixed; the competent authority is to indicate acceptance of the petition in writing. The petition states the aspirant's desire to be ordained to the diaconate or the presbyterate. Members of clerical institutes who have taken vows are not bound by this admission process. Renewable promises, however, do not exempt one from such a requirement.

Canon 1034 does not indicate when the candidacy enrollment should take place. While the simple liturgical rite itself should be duly solemn, perhaps the more significant moment for the candidate should be his prior, prayerful realization of the import of his petition. While distinct from the reception of orders, of course, the aspirant's signature and designation as a candidate for ordination should represent his sober, free acknowledgment of his present and future willingness to accept a calling which will bring him both joys and burdens.

Conferral and Exercise of Ministries

Canon 1035 — §1. Before anyone is promoted to the permanent or transitional diaconate, he is required to have received the ministries of lector and acolyte and to have exercised them for a suitable period of time.

§2. There is to be an interval of at least six months between the conferral of the ministry of acolyte and the diaconate.

Before his licit promotion to sacred orders, the candidate must have received the ministries of lector and acolyte. The code does not generally legislate regarding liturgical rites or functions (c. 2). However, some functions of assisting at the altar and proclaiming sacred scripture properly belong to the non-ordained; candidates for ordained ministry benefit from having earlier fulfilled these non-clerical liturgical roles. By exercising them for a suitable length of time, ideally one becomes more comfortable with such public roles. This experience helps the future presider in recognizing the importance of well-trained lectors and acolytes. These ministries can be exercised in or out of the seminary setting. While canon 1035 lists no specific interstices regarding the ministry of lector, at least six months must transpire between the conferral of the ministry of acolyte and one's diaconal ordination.

[23] See commentary on c. 1042, 3°.

Declaration of Freedom and Petition for Ordination

Canon 1036 — In order to be promoted to the order of diaconate or of presbyterate, the candidate is to present to his bishop or competent major superior a declaration written in his own hand and signed in which he attests that he will receive the sacred order of his own accord and freely and will devote himself perpetually to the ecclesiastical ministry and at the same time asks to be admitted to the order to be received.

Candidates for the diaconate or the priesthood must freely request reception of that order. The moral freedom enjoyed by the petitioning candidate must be beyond doubt.[24] Besides requesting conferral of the order, the candidate promises to commit himself forever to exercise the relevant ecclesiastical ministry according to the mind of the Church; he will act not for himself but for the good of the faithful, in the person of Christ (c. 1008).

The candidate for sacred ministry has presumably established himself during his formation as one apt to fulfill various teaching,[25] sanctifying,[26] and ruling[27] functions. The fit[28] and knowing[29] candidate understands the object of his intention, and has been judged worthy to be admitted to the order in question. Legitimate authority[30] receives this free petition as a reflection of the ordinand's intention to receive the sacrament. In accepting the freely given, aptly informed petition of a candidate for diaconal or sacerdotal ordination, the Church presumes that the ordinand will further develop his Christian commitment in his future exercise of the sacred ministry to which the Church admits him.[31]

[24] See cc. 1025, §1; 1026; 1034, §1; and 1050, 3°.

[25] See, for example, cc. 757; 760; 762; 764–765; 767; and 833, 6°.

[26] See, for example, cc. 835, §2 and §3; 843; 844; and 846.

[27] See, for example, cc. 129, §1 and 274.

[28] See cc. 1025 and 1029.

[29] See cc. 1027–1028.

[30] See cc. 265–266, 1016, and 1019.

[31] See c. 276.

Assumption of the Obligation of Clerical Celibacy

Canon 1037 — An unmarried candidate for the permanent diaconate and a candidate for the presbyterate are not to be admitted to the order of diaconate unless they have assumed the obligation of celibacy in the prescribed rite publicly before God and the Church or have made perpetual vows in a religious institute.

Notwithstanding the controversy which attends it in some cultures, and the sanctioned exceptions which highlight the rule, the Church's teaching on clerical celibacy in the Latin rite is clear.

One who is married and aspires to the permanent diaconate must accept the fact that, if he is later rendered otherwise free to marry, he may not ordinarily contract marriage again. While this is the norm, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments entertains requests from widowed deacons wishing to be exempted. Factors which may prompt the congregation to permit remarriage would be: the care of minor children; the care of elderly or infirm parents; or the serious needs of the particular church for which the deacon is exceptionally useful.

Canon 1037 presupposes that celibacy is to be observed by unmarried candidates for the priesthood or the transitional diaconate.[32] The celibacy obligation binds all Latin rite clergy, secular or regular, who are not married permanent deacons.

For religious, canon 1037 assumes one's prior vow to remain a chaste celibate.[33] The religiously vowed candidate for ordination should be mindful, however, that his publicly professed commitment to chastity is distinct from the clerical promise of celibacy, in that canonical release from the former does not necessarily entail canonical release from the latter (cc. 701; 291).

For secular clerics, the obligation of perpetual celibacy is expressed in the ordination rite itself. Admission to the transitional diaconate or the [32] See also c. 277.

[33] See also cc. 599 and 1088.

presbyterate entails the unmarried ordinand's promise of celibacy. The Holy See alone admits of exceptions to this rule, e.g., in cases of non-Catholic Christian married ministers who convert to Catholicism and request admission to sacred orders.

Canon 1037 does not explicitly consider the case of one who cohabits with someone as if he were married to that person, when in fact he is not. Such a man must be able to promise celibacy and live it, which means he would begin by realizing the objective sinfulness of such a living arrangement. He would have to cease this behavior prior to any serious consideration of his advancement to the permanent diaconate or any sacred order.

Denial of Exercise of Diaconal Ministry

Canon 1038 — A deacon who refuses to be promoted to the presbyterate cannot be prohibited from the exercise of the order received unless he is prevented by a canonical impediment or another grave cause to be evaluated in the judgment of the diocesan bishop or competent major superior.

While no one has a right to ordination, the law protects a cleric's right to the exercise of orders already received. A validly ordained transitional deacon who opts not to advance to the presbyterate obviously never stops being a deacon. As one freely requests advancement to sacred orders, canon 1038 presumes that such a deacon may freely request that he remain a deacon who can exercise his sacred ministry. As an incardinated cleric whose fitness and usefulness have otherwise been established with moral certitude (cc. 1025, §1; 1052), the deacon rightfully may expect an assignment, unless his proper ordinary is morally certain about the former's lack of fitness for the exercise of diaconal ministry (c. 1044).

"Another Grave Cause"

Canon 1038 remains vague as to what "another grave cause" for prohibiting the exercise of diaconal ministry might be. The entirety of the canon suggests that the cause is ordinand-dependent, i.e., it is tied personally to the man and his ministerial fitness, personal will, or practical ability to function usefully as a deacon. The cause ought not depend wholly on external circumstances, and certainly not on an ordinary's whims.

One is not ordained to the diaconate only because one is going to be later ordained to the priesthood. While presumably one ordained to the transitional diaconate will likely proceed to priestly ordination, the transitional diaconate is nonetheless a distinct state and not simply a step to the priesthood.

Canon 1038 implies that the deacon's eventual sacerdotal ordination is probable but not necessary, and in some situations a transitional deacon in fact may remain such indefinitely. Since neither the ordinary nor the ordinand, at the time of the latter's ordination, intended that the latter should enter the permanent diaconate, the question of whether or not a diocese has a permanent diaconate program is not a relevant issue. If, in fact, a diocese lacks a permanent diaconate program, this reality alone does not constitute thé "grave cause" to deny the deacon the exercise of the distinct ministry for which he has been deemed fit and useful. On the other hand, if the transitional deacon freely desires release from all his clerical obligations, he should pursue laicization (cc. 290–292).

Pre-ordination Retreat

Canon 1039 — All candidates for any order are to make a spiritual retreat for at least five days in a place and manner determined by the ordinary. Before the bishop proceeds to ordination, he must be certain that the candidates properly made this retreat.

An ordinand must approach ordination freely and knowledgeably. Furthermore, he should enter the clerical state with a humble spirit, appreciative of how he will need to rely upon the Lord's constant care for him. The ordinand's cooperation with the graces afforded him will necessitate his own hard work and the support of the community of believers. Accordingly, the law appropriately requires a period of intense prayer just prior to ordination.

The candidate's retreat is subject to regulation by his legitimate superior, especially as regards place and time. The ordaining prelate is to ascertain that this requirement has been fulfilled. The canon does not specify how soon the retreat should be made before the ordination. By referring to "all candidates for any order," the law encompasses those to be ordained deacons, priests, or bishops.

Though the canon does not explicitly refer to continuous time (c. 201, §1), the days noted in canon 1039 should be understood to be consecutive, as the canon refers to one retreat of five days. The canon delineates both a right and an obligation on the part of the ordinand, as well as an obligation on the part of the ordinaries involved. That is, an ordinand has a right to his ordination retreat. Hence, the norm governing useful time (c. 201, §2) is pertinent in reckoning an individual's ability to make the retreat. Individual days are computed in accord with canons 202, §1 (what constitutes a day); 203, §1 (when the first day of the retreat has been completed); and 203, §2 (the total number of days of the retreat).

While canon 1039 explicitly refers to a retreat of at least five days, Eastern code canon 772 makes no time stipulation, requiring only that the candidate make a retreat in the manner determined by particular law. There is also no reference to an ordaining prelate's obligation to be certain that the retreat has been made.

Article 3: Irregularities and Other Impediments [cc. 1040–1049]

Simple and Perpetual Impediments to Ordination

Canon 1040 — Those affected by any impediment, whether perpetual, which is called an irregularity, or simple, are prevented from receiving orders. The only impediments incurred, however, are those contained in the following canons.

Canons 1040 through 1049 govern impediments and irregularities for the reception and exercise of sacred orders. The broader category delimited is that of impediments, some of which are known as irregularities. While irregularities are perpetual impediments, all other impediments are simple impediments. A simple impediment to the reception of orders can cease when the impediment's cause ceases.

An impediment must be established with moral certitude, since it restricts a person's right to present himself for ordination or to exercise orders already received. The matter is also serious because it may result in the faithful's having one less priest, deacon, or bishop available for sacramental ministry.

The fact of an impediment, whether public or hidden, does not invalidate an ordination, but renders it illicit by the law itself. Whether an impediment exists is one question; if a delict gives rise to the impediment, a separate but related question will concern whether a canonical penalty is warranted. Such delicts may be punished by a latae sententiae or a ferendae sententiae penalty.

Canon 1040 indicates that only those impediments listed in canons 1040–1049 bar a candidate from the licit reception or exercise of orders. However, the practical applicability of these canons will vary. For instance, while it can generally be known objectively whether someone is bound by the impediment of an existing marital bond (c. 1042, 1°), it might be more difficult to determine if a person is impeded due to amentia or insanity (c. 1041, 1°) or heresy (c. 1041, 2°).

Irregularities for Reception of Orders

Canon 1041 — The following are irregular for receiving orders:

1° a person who labors under some form of amentia or other psychic illness due to which, after experts have been consulted, he is judged unqualified to fulfill the ministry properly;

2° a person who has committed the delict of apostasy, heresy, or schism;

3° a person who has attempted marriage, even only civilly, while either impeded personally from entering marriage by a matrimonial bond, sacred orders, or a public perpetual vow of chastity, or with a woman bound by a valid marriage or restricted by the same type of vow;

4° a person who has committed voluntary homicide or procured a completed abortion and all those who positively cooperated in either;

5° a person who has mutilated himself or another gravely and maliciously or who has attempted suicide;

6° a person who has placed an act of orders reserved to those in the order of episcopate or presbyterate while either lacking that order or prohibited from its exercise by some declared or imposed canonical penalty.

Persons falling into any of six categories may not receive orders licitly because they are bound by perpetual impediments, or irregularities. Since all parties properly disposed and capable according to law enjoy the right at least to be considered for orders, canon 18 implicitly applies to all six categories. The provisions of canon 1041 are to be applied strictly, and only in those situations in which they seem genuinely relevant. Eastern code canon 762 corresponds almost entirely to canons 1041 and 1042, excepting canon 1042, 1°. However, the Eastern code makes no distinction between simple and perpetual impediments.

"Amentia or Other Psychic Illness"

Persons who suffer from "amentia or other psychic illness" are not to advance to orders (c. 1041, 1°). The specifically impeding quality of the amentia or other psychic illness is seen in its effect: the candidate's condition is such that he will not be able to fulfill the ministerial duties flowing from ordination.[34]

Canon 1041, 1° does not state explicitly that the psychically impaired person is judged to be utterly incapable of fulfilling the demands of sacred ministry. Hence, he need not lack the use of reason or labor under an irremediable psychosis. The criterion is simply stated: the psychic disorder renders the person unqualified to fulfill ministry properly. For instance, a paranoid schizophrenic whose delusions cannot be regulated quite likely would be bound by this impediment; one who suffers inordinately from a fear of high places likely would not. The canon does not state whether the psychic problem need inhibit the person merely in liturgical ministry (e.g., presiding at Mass or hearing confessions), or rather in a broader pastoral sense as well (e.g., preaching, teaching, visiting, or parish administration).

The Perpetual Problem

An irregularity is a perpetual impediment; however, many psychic illnesses are in fact temporary. For instance, marked depression could seriously detract from an aspirant's overall qualifications for ministry. However, that depression may be situationally contingent, and professional therapy may help the person to function moderately well, or better. Even if such a temporary depression significantly and overtly limited a person for several months or longer, it might not be perpetual. Also, proper clinical diagnosis and an appropriate medical regimen may render one able to function quite well in ministerial settings.

Consultation with Experts

Though he enjoys a certain latitude in determining the applicability of canon 1041, 1° in a given candidate's case, the presenting ordinary or the ordaining bishop may not be arbitrary. The investigation must be thorough and complete and include an examination by experts. While the law recognizes that the ordinary's judgment is ultimately a subjective one, the decision must be based on solid objective data which lead him to moral certitude regarding the presence or absence of the impeding amentia or other psychic illness. The problem must be recognizable and determined by experts, and must directly affect the person's ability to exercise his office fittingly.

[34] See also commentary on c. 1044, §2, 2°.

Canon 1041, 1° presumably refers to psychological experts; however, this is not explicitly stated. Hence, such experts need not be exclusively those credentialed in psychology or psychiatry. Persons may be consulted who are considered expert in some other pertinent field (e.g., civil or criminal law; education; clerical formation), depending on a candidate's specific situation and always with great deference to his right to privacy and the protection of his good name (c. 220).

Apostasy, Heresy, or Schism

A person who has committed the delict of apostasy, heresy, or schism (c. 751) is irregular for the reception of orders (c. 1041, 2°). The present canon implies that one has notoriously distanced himself from Catholicism.[35]

Contumacy and imputability are presumed: heresy requires an obstinate denial of a true teaching of the Church, apostasy a total repudiation of the Christian faith, and schism a genuine refusal to remain in faithful Catholic communion. Hence, a future seminarian's past single act, promptly repented, likely would not suffice for the declaration of this irregularity. If the requirements of canon 1321 on imputability are met, if canons 1323, 1324, and 1330 on factors exempting one from imputability or mitigating it do not apply, and if the man engages persistently in acts of heresy, apostasy, or schism, he incurs the latae sententiae excommunication set forth in canon 1364, §1. An open question remains just how public and notorious the acts of heresy, apostasy, or schism must be in order for a person to be recognized as irregular for the reception of orders. Canon 1330 states that the offense must be made evident by some public declaration or manifestation.

[35] See commentary on c. 751.

The delict is technically necessary if the irregularity of canon 1041, 2° is to be incurred. The remission of the penalty associated with the delict must be dealt with separately from the dispensation of the irregularity associated with it; the remission and the dispensation constitute two acts. Further, even if the revelation of certain facts should exempt the man from imputability, or at least mitigate it, he might still be unsuitable morally, if not irregular canonically, for advancement to orders.

Finally, simply falling away from the practice of the faith does not constitute an irregularity, though formal and seriously imputable admission into a non-Catholic or non-Christian denomination would. A public liturgical act or written declaration whereby a party separates himself from the Catholic faith might well entail a canonical delict and hence the irregularity understood by canon 1041, 2°. A formal declaration of the prior latae sententiae penalty would offer clarity in such a situation, though it would not technically be necessary to incur certain effects of the penalty (c. 1364, §1, 1°). In cases in which it is uncertain as to whether a delict has occurred (and an irregularity incurred), a doubtful irregularity does not bind.

Attempted Marriage

Also barred from the licit reception of orders is one who is or was involved in a canonically prohibited marriage (c. 1041, 3°). The attempted marriage could have been invalid because the man or his civil spouse already was bound by a prior valid matrimonial bond at the time of the attempted marriage, or because he or his civil spouse was impeded by a public perpetual vow of chastity (c. 1088), or because he himself had attempted marriage while a cleric (c. 1087). The current canon refers to the fact of the invalid attempt at marriage, which gives rise to scandal; hence, the irregularity occurs even if the marriage is ended by death or civil divorce, as irregularities are by their nature perpetual.

The Church here is particularly concerned about the scandal prompted by the failure of certain Christians to live chastely, according to their state of life. This obligation must be lived faithfully, whether one is in orders or not. Canon 1041, 3° clearly refers to those whose marriages cannot objectively be recognized by the Catholic Church as valid; therein rests the violation against chastity. A further concern is the impropriety of ordaining someone not faithful to a prior commitment, be it in virtue of orders, perpetual religious profession, or marriage.

Canon 1041, 3° does not pertain to parties freed—or declared free—by the Church to marry validly. For instance, a former member of a religious institute of pontifical right who earlier was committed by a perpetual vow to remain celibate and chaste can be released from that vow and enabled to marry according to church law (c. 1078, §2, 1°). Likewise, a marriage presumed to be valid can later be declared as having been ecclesiastically invalid. Such parties, if otherwise legally able and capable of marrying, enter marriage validly.

The focus of the canon is on the scandalous situation of those who have attempted a marriage which is viewed as invalid, regardless of whether or not the bond endures. A Catholic who wishes to marry and live a chaste marital life must do so according to the pertinent ecclesiastical norms. Hence, if an aspirant to the permanent diaconate is already in a valid marriage, he must not subsequently have divorced and attempted marriage with another. Or, if one has taken a perpetual vow of chastity, he must not subsequently have abandoned that vow and attempted marriage without the proper dispensation issued by legitimate authority.

Furthermore, for a man to be regular for orders, he cannot have attempted marriage with a woman bound by a presumably valid prior marriage bond, or by a prior perpetual, non-dispensed vow of chastity. A secular transitional deacon is bound not to marry, by virtue of his ordination; his attempt at marriage prior to his sacerdotal ordination would render him irregular for it. A religious deacon in perpetual vows is bound doubly, both by his public vow to remain a chaste celibate and by his commitment to celibacy reinforced by his ordination to the transitional diaconate. One already ordained who attempts marriage cannot be advanced licitly to another order, loses any ecclesiastical office he holds (c. 194, §1, 3°), and is subject to a latae sententiae suspension (c. 1394, §1).

Homicide and Abortion

One who has voluntarily committed a homicide or positively participated in a completed abortion is irregular for the reception of orders (c. 1041, 4°). The canon does not refer to participation in an incomplete abortion. A man is irregular if his complicity in planning such a death resulted directly in the completion of the act, even if he were not present for its completion. The heinous act must have been completed and one must be seriously culpable in the planning or execution of it. The participation must have been necessary to the execution of the act in some way; that is, without that participation, the act would not have taken place. The irregularity does not apply if one's participation is not voluntary and deliberate, or if one's participation is a sin of omission rather than commission, or if one's participation is ultimately negligible in the commission of the act.

One's participation in the death need not necessarily result in the imposition of a canonical penalty, whether latae sententiae (automatic) or ferendae sententiae (declared or imposed), since canon 1041, 4° does not refer to an offense or delict, technically speaking, or to the imposition of penalties. That is, the irregularity applies to one who has been instrumental in the death of a person or fetus, as long as that participation was voluntary, active, and effective. The question of a possible delict and related penalties (cc. 1329; 1397–1398) must be taken up separately.

Canon 1041, 4° must be carefully considered by church authorities who assess its applicability in a given case. In many situations the irregularity will not have been incurred, e.g., a soldier's participation in a recognizably just war, or a medical professional's participation in a procedure resulting in the unintended yet tragic death of a fetus.

Unresolved Questions

Some situations pose problems regarding the proper interpretation of canon 1041, 4°. What of a person who commits vehicular homicide while knowingly driving recklessly through a clearly marked school zone at recess? What of a son who agonizes with and supports his terminally ill mother in her request for a doctor-assisted or self-directed method of ending her life? What of a pharmacist who regularly sold abortifacients prior to his entrance into the seminary? On the one hand, a doubtful irregularity would not bind; on the other hand, the facts of a specific situation may not admit of much doubt. A just interpretation of the canon would require prudently considering how voluntary, active, and effective a person's participation was.

Yet a further question concerns the time at which a possibly irregularity-generating incident occurred. For instance, what if one's voluntary, active, and effective participation in a homicide or a procured abortion took place prior to one's baptism or reception into Catholicism? It appears that the irregularity of canon 1041, 4° would be doubtful, and therefore not binding. The non-Catholic person would not have been subject at that time to the peculiarly Catholic ecclesiastical norms governing irregularities which would apply to him only after he became a Catholic (see c. 11). Another relevant datum to be considered is Eastern code canon 762, §2, which states that impediments do not result from those actions corresponding to canons 1041, 2°–6° unless they were serious, external sins and were perpetrated after baptism.

While granting that the irregularity apparently is not incurred in the situation just described, a look at the counter-argument is in order. Canon 1041, 4° does not set any limits as to when an act occurs, i.e., before or after baptism or reception into the Catholic Church. Further, prohibitions against procured abortion and willful homicide certainly transcend ecclesiastical law and pertain to natural law, rooted in divine law. Also, Eastern code canon 762, §2 implies that the impediment is incurred by one baptized but not yet received into Catholicism, which suggests an applicability to non-Catholic Christians; this apparently would diminish the relevance of canon 11. However, to repeat, non-Catholics engaging in the activity outlined in canon 1041, 4° apparently would not incur the irregularity, as a doubtful irregularity does not bind; further, the canons on irregularities and simple impediments are to be interpreted strictly (c. 18), as a man has a right at least to have himself considered for orders.

Mutilation and Attempted Suicide

Grave and malicious mutilation of oneself or another also makes one irregular for the reception of orders, as does attempted suicide (c. 1041, 5°). Standards of gravity and maliciousness—and mutilation—may be culturally relative. For example, tattoos or ornamental artifices voluntarily appended to one's body may be considered beautiful, or at least acceptable, in one culture, yet maliciously mutilating in another. As another example, attitudes toward female or male circumcision are not only not universally consistent but indeed are the subject of heated transcultural controversy.

The contemporary application of canon 1041, 5° gives rise to some difficult questions, two of which are mentioned here by way of example: vasectomy, and doubtfully genuine suicide attempts.

Canonists disagree on whether or not a man's prior vasectomy renders him irregular for orders. In one view, a vasectomy is a gravely sinful act in which a man intends to render himself permanently sterile by means of an invasive and physically unnatural procedure, in direct violation of natural law.[36] An argument from a different perspective notes that while the vasectomy certainly constitutes an objectively grave moral evil, the procedure itself is simple and not truly mutilating in any physical sense. As a procedure which is usually a very private matter, the threat of public scandal is limited. Since it is doubtful that such a procedure is truly physically mutilating, this argument holds that the irregularity would not be incurred.

[36] For a succinct presentation of this opinion, see J. Jukes, "Irregularity for the Reception of Orders: CIC 1041. n. 5," CLS-GBIN 108 (1996) 85–87.

In addition to self-mutilation, the current canon addresses attempted suicide. Any genuine, serious effort to end one's life incurs the irregularity. However, some attempts are so feeble as to be nothing more than attention-getting devices or desperate cries for help. Would the irregularity be incurred by an impulsive, desperate, perhaps misunderstood young person who ingests a moderate overdose of nonprescription medication? Yes, it would seem so, as the canon makes no distinction about the seriousness of the effort, or the age or state of mind of the person. However, if there is considerable doubt about whether or not an action qualifies as a genuine attempt to end one's life, the irregularity is not incurred. A doubtful irregularity does not bind. In any case, church authorities should not ignore any activity which highlights a candidate's prior or current self-destructive tendencies.

Simulation or Abuse of Sacramental Administration

Persons who are not priests or bishops and who have simulated an act proper to either order are themselves irregular for the reception of orders (c. 1041, 6°). The act of a lay person could involve the simulation of a sacrament such as penance or the Eucharist. The act of a cleric could involve the simulation of a sacrament not proper to that order (e.g., a deacon granting absolution) or the placement of an act not proper in a given instance (e.g., a priest attempting to confirm though he knowingly lacks the necessary faculty). Canon 1041, 6° may be relevant even if a canonical penalty has not been incurred (cc. 1378–1379 and 1384).

Further, a cleric is irregular for advancement to a higher order (a deacon to the presbyterate, a priest to the episcopacy) who exercises his order while prohibited by a canonical penalty which bars the exercise of that order, except in certain emergency pastoral situations such as caring for the faithful in danger of death.[37]

Canon 1041, 6° is clear that the penalty must be declared or imposed. Hence, the irregularity is not incurred if a latae sententiae penalty has not been declared. Properly disposed members of the faithful certainly have a right to the sacraments, but the offending deacon or priest has a corresponding obligation to seek the remission of the penalty so as to be fully restored to the communion of the Church.

Simple Impediments to Reception of Orders

Canon 1042 — The following are simply impeded from receiving orders:

1° a man who has a wife, unless he is legitimately destined to the permanent diaconate;

2° a person who exercises an office or administration forbidden to clerics according to the norm of cann. 285 and 286 for which he must render an account, until he becomes free by having relinquished the office or administration and rendered the account;

3° a neophyte unless he has been proven sufficiently in the judgment of the ordinary.

Marriage

A currently married man is impeded from orders (c. 1042, 1°). This includes even one who is legitimately separated from his spouse (cc. 1151–1155). The impediment ceases with the death of a spouse, or when the marriage is dissolved or declared null by competent church authorities.

Since marriages attempted invalidly do not result in a canonically recognized husband-wife relationship, canon 1042, 1° refers to those bonds that are truly binding or apparently binding. The canon refers to persons in presumably valid marital relationships, which distinguishes them from those affected by canon 1041, 3°. Excepted from the impediment in canon 1042, 1° would be a married man destined for the permanent diaconate. While one in an apparently valid marital bond is validly but illicitly ordained to the presbyterate or episcopate (unless permission from the Holy See assures liceity), the reverse is not true. One validly ordained and not laicized attempts marriage invalidly (c. 1087), and is subject at least to an automatic suspension (c. 1394, §1).

[37] See cc. 976; 1335; 1338, §3; and 1352, §1.

Marriages Declared Ecclesiastically Invalid by a Tribunal

Some commentators raise the possibility of the applicability of canon 1041, 1° to an aspirant whose marriage has been declared ecclesiastically invalid by legitimate authority, during which formal process his psychological incapacity to posit marital consent may have been determined. Such an incapacity could ground both a decision in favor of marital nullity, and an irregularity regarding the licit reception of orders due to amentia or other psychic illness, precluding the proper exercise of ministry. Though matrimony and orders are two very different sacraments, information regarding a person's fundamental psychological health as he attempted marriage may be relevant in assessing his fitness for ordained ministry.[38]

However, the protection of confidentiality (c. 220) is a serious concern. First, the acts of a tribunal proceeding contain confidential data relative to the lives of other persons (e.g., former spouse, children, witnesses) who have a right to privacy. Second, data surfacing during such a proceeding is usually understood to be restricted to it; parties offering testimony or expert assessments do so in the belief that their accounts will go no further than the annulment investigation. One could argue that the candidate could authorize a judge to release data pertinent to him alone. Such a gesture may be appropriate in light of a man's moral obligation to inform legitimate authority of any factors which touch upon his fitness for the valid and licit reception of orders. However, sifting through case acts and concentrating on data pertinent to only one party is a difficult task for a judge. Another possibility is that the applicant could ask proper judicial authorities to release to seminary admissions personnel a copy of the judicial sentence (and only the sentence), or at least those portions which concern the applicant.[39]

The diocesan bishop is the highest local judicial authority in his diocese (c. 1419, §1); hence, if the "formal process" declaration of nullity were granted in his own diocese, he would have access to the attendant tribunal case acts as well as to the file attendant to the man's seminary application. It would be entirely proper for him to consider the former in weighing the latter. A more complex question arises regarding the sharing of such data between different dioceses. For example, a declaration of nullity is granted in one diocese and a man applies for seminary admission elsewhere. One could argue that, since the acts of a formal annulment investigation belong to a judicial process in the external forum, they can be used—discreetly and by legitimate authority only—for the good of the ecclesial community at large. As noted earlier, this would presume the aspirant's free authorization, and the release of data pertinent to him alone. However, one still must confront the general principle that the use of information surfacing in a marriage nullity case should be restricted to that case. Ultimately, the discussion regarding the use of marriage tribunal documentation in weighing admissibility to sacred ministry is more properly a moral and ethical one, and less a canonical one. Universal law does not explicitly treat this topic.

[38] See P. Smith, "Lack of Due Discretion and Suitability for Ordination," Stud Can 21 (1987) 125–140.

[39] For a discussion of some of these issues, see F. Morrisey, "La formation des séminaristes et le respect de la personne," Stud Can 22 (1988) 5–25, esp. 18–19.

Offices and Administration Forbidden to Clerics

One who exercises an office or administration forbidden to clerics, either personally or through another (cc. 285–286), is simply impeded from the reception of orders (c. 1042, 2°). While it may be fairly easy to establish whether a man is married and thereby simply impeded from receiving orders (c. 1042, 1°), the applicability of canon 1042, 2° is less clearly determined. For instance, a man interested in the diocesan presbyterate at a later age (e.g., late thirties or older) may have held financially lucrative positions; while he may relinquish his office when he enters into seminary formation, the question of his administration of assets still remains. Canon 285, §2 is sufficiently broad so as to be subject to varying interpretations, relative to a given cultural and social context.

A question arises in relation to candidates for the priesthood who, of necessity or due to reasonable parental request, are nominated as executors of parental estates or are granted durable powers of attorney for their parents (c. 285, §4). While the proper ordinary's permission suffices for the assumption of such duties, canon 1042, 2° bears consideration. Once incurred, if the simple impediment of canon 1042, 2° does not cease with the cessation of the circumstance which gives rise to it, a dispensation is in order.

Neophytes

A neophyte in the faith is simply impeded from the reception of orders, unless his ordinary determines him to be sufficiently grounded in his new identity as a Catholic Christian (c. 1042, 3°). Given the minimum age requirements (c. 1031, §1), one would have to be at least in his twenties to be simultaneously a neophyte and a candidate for ordained ministry.

The notion of a neophyte, in this context, is a liturgical and catechetical construction, and not a defined legal category; in other words, canonically one is either a baptized Catholic or not. The law does not determine precisely how long one has to have been a baptized Catholic to be no longer considered a neophyte, though the period of three years is common in practice. Formal entrance into formation programs usually presupposes that one is no longer a neophyte; however, the canon does not refer to whether the neophyte may begin training for orders, but rather to whether he may be licitly ordained.

Notification of Known Impediments

Canon 1043 — If the Christian faithful are aware of impediments to sacred orders, they are obliged to reveal them to the ordinary or pastor before the ordination.

Ideally, the Christian faithful recognize their moral obligation to assist in ensuring that only fit candidates are ordained. Knowledge of existing irregularities and/or simple impediments is to be shared with the competent authority. Such an obligation unfortunately is vulnerable to a certain moral relativism in its fulfillment (or not). A person with such knowledge may not feel it to be his or her place to bring the impediment to light, lest he or she be perceived as judging another. Or one might think that surely such an impediment must have surfaced for review during the candidate's training. Or, perhaps most likely, a person might have no idea that such a fact indeed creates a problem; or the person might think that the Church should not be concerned about it in any case. Because of the ecclesial importance of ordained ministers, the community bears a moral responsibility to encourage the ordination of only fit candidates or, at the very least, candidates who are not bound by impediments. This is a very serious moral obligation on the part of the faithful.

Irregularities, Simple Impediments, and the Exercise of Orders Already Received

Canon 1044 — §1. The following are irregular for the exercise of orders received:

1° a person who has received orders illegitimately while affected by an irregularity to receive them;

2° a person who has committed a delict mentioned in can. 1041, n. 2, if the delict is public;

3° a person who has committed a delict mentioned in can. 1041, nn. 3, 4, 5, 6.

§2. The following are impeded from the exercise of orders:

1° a person who has received orders illegitimately while prevented by an impediment from receiving them;

2° a person who is affected by amentia or some other psychic illness mentioned in can. 1041, n. 1 until the ordinary, after consulting an expert, permits the exercise of the order.

The law distinguishes between those who are barred from the licit reception of orders and those who are barred from their licit exercise. The distinction is an important one.

The presence of a non-dispensed irregularity or simple impediment at the time of ordination may provoke subsequent hand wringing; however, whether or how it should have affected the man's earlier advancement to orders is merely academic. After the fact, the pertinent question becomes whether the man licitly exercises the order received. Canon 1044 addresses irregularities present at the time of ordination (c. 1044, §1, 1°; §2, 1°) as well as those arising after ordination.

The Effect of a Prior Irregularity

Canon 1044, §1, 1° presents an overarching principle: if an irregularity existed which made illegitimate the prior, presumably valid reception of orders, then the cleric may not legitimately exercise that order. The only apparent exception foreseen is indicated in canon 1044, §1, 2°. Public delicts of apostasy, heresy, or schism make one irregular for the exercise of orders. However, perhaps one's prior apostasy, heresy, or schism (c. 751) was an occult or not widely known delict (CIC 2197, 1° and 4°), yet it rendered him irregular for the reception of orders; that same act need not necessarily make him irregular for their exercise, unless it becomes public.

As with canon 1044, §1, 2°, canon 1044, §1, 3° is not time-specific. That is, perhaps the delict occurred in such circumstances that it rendered illicit the candidate's reception of orders. Or perhaps the delict occurred after the ordination. Though the canon is formulated in the past tense, it does not state precisely when in the past the delict was committed. While canon 1044, §1, 2° implicitly suggests the two distinct categories of public and occult delicts, canon 1044, §1, 3° refers to both public and occult delicts mentioned in canon 1041, 3°, 4°, 5°, and 6°, since no distinction is made, as in canon 1044, §1, 2°.

Canon 1044, §2, 1° parallels canon 1044, §1, 1°: if a simple impediment existed which made illicit the prior, valid reception of orders, then the cleric may not legitimately exercise that order. There is one qualification made, however, concerning those who suffer from "amentia or some other psychic illness." Canon 1041, 1° states that those experiencing such a psychological debility are irregular for the licit reception of orders. However, canon 1044, §2, 2° does not state that the impediment need have existed as an irregularity at time of ordination.

Irregularity or Simple Impediment?

As discussed earlier,[40] questions arise as to how the perpetual character of "amentia or other psychic illness" should be understood, though the fact that its perpetuity is inherent in canon 1044, §1, 1° is not debatable. According to canon 1044, §1, 1°, such a person is irregular (perpetually) for the exercise of that order,[41] though canon 1044, §2, 2° treats this same subject under the simple heading of one who is "impeded" from the exercise of orders. Canons 1044, §1, 1° and 1044, §2, 2° are apparently inconsistent: is one irregular or simply impeded?

[40] See commentary on c. 1041, 1°.

[41] There are certain exceptions to this prohibition; see, for instance, c. 976.

Canon 1044, §2, 2° indicates that the ordinary, after having consulted at least one expert, can dispense from the simple impediment to the exercise of orders. Herein rests the confusion. If the irregularity arising from "amentia or other psychic illness" (c. 1041, 1°) is understood to be perpetual, as irregularities by their nature are (c. 1040), it necessarily must be dispensed from for both the reception and the exercise of orders. However, if it is understood as a simple impediment (c. 1044, §2, 2°), then a dispensation might not be necessary for the exercise of orders, and indeed might not even be necessary for the reception of orders if the debilitating cause ceased prior to ordination.

Like canon 1044, §1, the norm of canon 1044, §2, 2° is not time-specific. Hence, the "amentia or some other psychic illness"—whether creating an irregularity or a simple impediment—might not have been present even latently at the time of ordination, but may have manifested itself only after ordination, in the judgment of the ordinary and experts consulted by him. A man in such a situation can be declared impeded from the exercise of orders. Since canons treating of irregularities are careful to call them such, and given its placement in the midst of a discussion of simple impediments, one infers that the impediment of canon 1044, §2, 2° is to be understood as a simple impediment. Hence, it may cease with therapeutic treatment or perhaps merely with the passage of time. The competent ordinary is to confirm the continuing existence of the impediment and its consequential prohibition of a man's exercise of orders.

Further Issues Arising from Canon 1044, §2, 2°

A fair application of canon 1044, §2, 2° requires an appreciation of the qualitative and quantitative difference in standard from that of canon 1041, 1°. The latter explicitly refers to a man as being inhabilis (not necessarily incapable, but certainly "unqualified to fulfill the ministry properly"). In contrast, canon 1044, §2, 2° does not state that the man need have been rendered inhabilis, but merely that he suffer from the debilitation described in canon 1041, 1°. This would seem to give notable latitude to an ordinary in declaring a subject to be impeded from the exercise of his diaconal or presbyteral order because the ordinary judges him to suffer from "amentia or some other psychic illness." However, one might reasonably argue that the inhabilis qualifier of canon 1041, 1° is presumably implied in canon 1044, §2, 2°, and that the former norm is relevant to the interpretation of the latter. Hence, it seems that the man also needs to be declared inhabilis for the exercise of orders already received, though canon 1044, §2, 2° does not explicitly require this declaration.

The declaration that the impediment is incurred and that the cleric may not exercise orders, or that the cleric may in fact exercise his ministry in spite of the impediment, is an administrative act (c. 35), an individual decree (c. 48). If a man is declared prohibited from exercising his order, competent authority may permit exceptions by means of another administrative act (c. 59), e.g., so that a restricted priest might celebrate the funeral of one of his parents. Furthermore, any such prohibition would not preclude a priest from hearing confessions in a danger-of-death situation (c. 976).

Besides the declaration that one is impeded from the exercise of orders, the canons on removal from an ecclesiastical office may also be relevant in this situation. Removal from an office currently held (cc. 192–195) would require a just or grave reason depending on the situation. Such reasons must be weighed in light of comments of those whose rights might be injured (c. 50), reasons which in turn must be communicated to the cleric in writing, in at least a summary fashion (cc. 51 and 193, §4). The removed cleric's possible recourse follows canons 1732–1739.

Unresolved Questions
Arising from Canon 1044, §2, 2°

There exists the real potential for abusive application of canon 1044, §2, 2° by an ordinary against a man he wishes removed from active ministry. First, the canon could be interpreted broadly. Second, perceptions (including the ordinary's) of the complexities of the situation are always tinged by subjectivity. Third, the psychological sciences are not exact sciences, and evaluations made in light of them are not always precise. Fourth, the canon is vague regarding the proper methods of consultation necessary for the ordinary to achieve the moral certitude warranting the declaration of this impediment concerning the exercise of orders.

As noted earlier, fundamental questions remain about the relationship of canon 1044, §2, 2° with canons 1044, §1, 1° and 1041, 1°; about whether canon 1044, §2, 2° actually refers to an irregularity or a simple impediment; and about the timing and duration of the psychic impairment. Other uncertainties persist. How exactly is the psychological infirmity of canons 1041, 1° and 1044, §2, 2° to be determined? How are the Latin terms rite and inhabilis in canon 1041, 1° to be understood, and how do they relate to canon 1044, §2, 2°? What precisely is meant by the term ministerium, and what process is proper to the judgment of psychic impairment (iudicatur—c.1041, 1°)? How strictly is canon 1044, §2, 2° to be interpreted and applied, and in whose favor (the cleric's, the ordinary's, or the faithful's)? Who precisely is an "expert"? What financial, insurance, or pension benefits are appropriate for a priest who has been declared incapable of exercising orders, at least temporarily, in accord with canon 1044, §2, 2°? Is the prohibition of the exercise of orders total, or is it comparable to a suspension,[42] which might admit of some sacramental priestly activity on an ongoing basis? May the prohibition be imposed on public ministry only, while permitting certain private ministerial acts (e.g., a private celebration of Mass, in so far as a eucharistic celebration can ever be understood to be private)? Various commentators have vigorously discussed certain of these questions.[43]

Ignorance of Impediments

Canon 1045 — Ignorance of the irregularities and impediments does not exempt from them.

The aspirant to any of the sacred orders is morally bound to know what his condition is relative to the order which he desires to receive; if he is irregular for, or simply impeded from, the reception of or the exercise of that order, he is morally bound to know that, too. Ignorance of pertinent irregularities and simple impediments does not exempt him from them.

Practically speaking, the ignorance need not be culpable (i.e., negligent unawareness regarding what one should have known); or the error may be either of fact or of law. Hence, one might possibly incur an impediment or an irregularity but not be sinful in that regard. Canon 1045 implies that irregularities and simple impediments are rooted in some objective reality of the person's situation, apart from what he may understand about them.

While one who reads canons 1041, 1042, and 1044 carefully and sees his situation referred to can no longer be said to be ignorant, one should not dismiss canon 1045 as occurring only rarely. By way of example, a man might conceivably suffer from a significant psychic illness apparent to everyone but himself; or, while aware of it on some level, he may deny it even to himself. Unwilling as he may be to admit his illness, he is no less impeded from both the legitimate reception of orders (c. 1041, 1°) and their legitimate exercise (cc. 1044, §1, 1° and 1044, §2, 2°).

Or possibly a person could consciously commit a public act of heresy with what might be for him the best of intentions, genuinely if erroneously believing the law does not apply in his case because he is serving what he has personally determined to be some higher good. Another individual might believe that he deliberately ought to join an ostensibly charitable organization, consciously accepting that it also fosters activity that would be characteristic of an apostolate. While in his specific case all the elements might not be present for the commission of a delict, such a person may be truly ignorant of the potential for an irregularity in light of canons 1041, 2° and 1044, §1, 2°, especially if no one educates him as to their possible applicability. Such ignorance is ultimately irrelevant to the impediment's application in a given case. This is consistent with canon 15, §1, which indicates that ignorance or error does not prevent the effect of certain laws.[44] Such ignorance of the law is normally not presumed (c. 15, §2).

[42] See c. 1333.

[43] For a helpful treatment of some of these questions, see, for instance, W. Woestman, "Too Good to Be True: An Interpretation of Canons 1041, 1° and 1044, §2, 2°," ME 120 (1995) 619–629, and the rejoinder of J. Beal, "Too Good to Be True? A Response," ME 121 (1996) 431–463; also, P. Lagges, "The Use of Canon 1044, §2, 2° in the Removal of Parish Priests," Stud Can 30 (1996) 31–69, and G. Read, "Administrative Approaches to Cases of 'Problem Clergy,'" CLS-GBIN 105 (1996) 16–22.

With due regard for the fact that the Eastern code makes no distinction between irregularities and simple impediments, Eastern code canon 765 parallels canon 1045. The same is true of Eastern code canon 766 and canon 1046, to which we now turn.

Multiplication of Impediments

Canon 1046 — Irregularities and impediments are multiplied if they arise from different causes. They are not multiplied, however, if they arise from the repetition of the same cause unless it is a question of the irregularity for voluntary homicide or for having procured a completed abortion.

Irregularities and simple impediments may arise from a psychological, physical, or moral condition (e.g., cc. 1041, 1°; 1042, 1° or 3°). They may also arise from an action (e.g., cc. 1041, 2° or 3°; 1042, 2°). If there are multiple conditions or multiple actions, the irregularity or simple impediment is considered to be only one if the cause be the same, with certain exceptions.

If, for example, a person in his spiritual journey has been received into several non-Catholic religious denominations consecutively (c. 1041, 2°), he would be considered irregular for the reception of orders only once, and need be dispensed but once. Likewise, if a person has twice attempted marriage and both invalid marriages end in civil divorce, he would be irregular for the reception of orders (c. 1041, 3°) in a manner which would require but one dispensation.

However, there would be "different causes" for the irregularity if a priest who has attempted civil marriage (c. 1044, §1, 3° deriving from c. 1041, 3°) and incurred the resultant suspension (c. 1394, §1) nonetheless carries out distinctly priestly duties (c. 1044, §1, 3°, deriving from c. 1041, 6°). Such a priest would be irregular for the exercise of orders already received for two different reasons, i.e., his attempted marriage and his unauthorized sacramental actions. It is less clear whether one who has attempted suicide (c. 1041, 5°) as a result of his having suffered from a psychological infirmity (c. 1041, 1°) should be considered irregular for the reception of orders as a result of a single cause (his suicide attempt being directly attributable to his psychic imbalance) or different causes (the suicide attempt differentiated from his mental problem). In cases of doubt, the dispensation request should simply spell out the person's situation in its entirety; whether there are distinct causes would probably be only an academic question in most cases.

There are two exceptions to the non-multiplication norm of canon 1046: repeated direct, voluntary, active, and effective participation in the procurement of abortions and repeated direct, voluntary, active, and effective participation in homicides. A dispensation is to be sought for each involvement in procuring an abortion; it is likewise to be sought for each involvement in a willful homicide. Each distinct act produces a distinct irregularity. The number of related and relevant actions becomes crucial, then, in presenting a dispensation petition, due to the gravity of the matter.

[44] An important distinction here is that c. 15, §1 expressly refers to invalidating and incapacitating laws, which are not the focus of cc. 1040–1049 on irregularities and simple impediments.

Dispensation from Irregularities and Simple Impediments

Canon 1047 — §1. Dispensation from all irregularities is reserved to the Apostolic See alone if the fact on which they are based has been brought to the judicial forum.

§2. Dispensation from the following irregularities and impediments to receive orders is also reserved to the Apostolic See:

1° irregularities from the public delicts mentioned in can. 1041, nn. 2 and 3;

2° the irregularity from the delict mentioned in can. 1041, n. 4, whether public or occult;

3° the impediment mentioned in can. 1042, n. 1.

§3. Dispensation in public cases from the irregularities from exercising an order received mentioned in can. 1041, n. 3, and even in occult cases from the irregularities mentioned in can. 1041, n. 4 is also reserved to the Apostolic See.

§4. An ordinary is able to dispense from irregularities and impediments not reserved to the Holy See.

Canon 1047 represents a practical application of the principle of subsidiarity: an ordinary generally is competent to grant dispensations from irregularities and simple impediments, without recourse to the Apostolic See. However, there are exceptions to this principle. The dispensation permitting licit reception of orders is reserved to the Holy See in certain situations in which a case has achieved public notoriety, e.g., its introduction into the judicial forum. Further, the Apostolic See alone is competent to grant such a dispensation if a case concerns: apostasy, heresy, or schism; valid marriage binding one desiring ordination (unless to the permanent diaconate); marriage attempted by one not free to do so; or abortion or willful homicide. A dispensation for the exercise of orders is reserved to the Apostolic See for cases involving attempted marriage, or abortion, or willful homicide. The ordinary can dispense from all other irregularities and simple impediments. We now consider briefly the cases reserved to the Apostolic See.

If the cause of the irregularity or simple impediment has been brought to the judicial forum, the dispensation from the impediment belongs to the Holy See alone. The primary concern here is the public notoriety, even if not widespread, occasioned by the matter's treatment in a court. The traditional opinion holds that the judicial forum can be either ecclesiastical or civil, though this issue needs to be clarified further.

Canon 1047, §1 refers to any matter resulting in an irregularity or simple impediment which has been brought to an external judicial forum for consideration. Because of the threat of subsequent scandal, given the involvement of a cleric or a prospective cleric, the Apostolic See alone may dispense from the impediment. If the matter is occult and treated in the internal forum, it is addressed by the Apostolic Penitentiary; if it concerns heresy, apostasy, or schism, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith should be consulted; and if the irregularity is public or in the external forum, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments is competent for non-religious lay persons and secular clerics, while the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life is competent for members of such institutes or societies.

For those who are to receive orders licitly, canon 1047, §2 lists explicitly all irregularities or simple impediments (beyond those brought to the judicial forum) whose dispensation is reserved to the Holy See. Such irregularities or impediments are those resulting from: public delicts of apostasy, heresy, or schism (c. 1041, 2°); a publicly attempted yet ecclesiastically invalid marriage (c. 1041, 3°); any direct participation in a willful homicide or a procured abortion (c. 1041, 4°); and, except for those seeking admission to the order of permanent deacon, a valid and ongoing marriage (c. 1042, 1°).

For those who are to exercise their orders licitly, canon 1047, §3 lists explicitly all impediments (beyond those brought to the judicial forum) whose dispensation is reserved to the Holy See. Again, a publicly attempted yet ecclesiastically invalid marriage requires particular attention (c. 1041, 3°). This would include, for instance, a priest who has left the active ministry, has publicly attempted marriage which ended in civil divorce, and has expressed his desire to return to active ministry. Likewise, one who has at any time directly participated in a willful homicide or a procured abortion, be it public or occult, must request a dispensation from the Holy See alone for the licit exercise of his office (c. 1041, 4°).

All other irregularities or simple impediments are not reserved to the Holy See and can be dispensed by the ordinary. It is worth noting that canon 1047 does not nominate a particular ordinary; that is, the canon does not state that a man subject to a diocesan bishop must approach his bishop and only that bishop, or that a religious must approach his major superior. Given all the canons governing dimissorial letters, testimonials of fitness, and—perhaps most important—the centrality of one's proper ordinary in one's approval for ordination, it stands to reason that the ordinary who should take up the matter of the irregularity is one's proper ordinary.

Finally, as has been noted, both irregularities and simple impediments may arise from a single action or condition, though certain acts may result in an irregularity or simple impediment while not giving rise to a penalty. The dispensation of an irregularity or simple impediment does not necessarily entail the lifting of a related penalty, which must be remitted according to law.

Exceptional Exercise of Orders in spite of Prohibition

Canon 1048 — In more urgent occult cases, if the ordinary or, when it concerns the irregularities mentioned in can. 1041, nn. 3 and 4, the Penitentiary cannot be approached and if there is imminent danger of grave harm or infamy, a person impeded by an irregularity from exercising an order can exercise it, but without prejudice to the obligation which remains of making recourse as soon as possible to the ordinary or the Penitentiary, omitting the name and through a confessor.

Recalling canons 1041, 3° and 4°, canon 1048 presents an exceptional situation in which a priest or deacon irregular for the reception of his order may exercise it, as long as the cause of that irregularity is not a public matter. If, for some credible reason, the Holy See cannot be approached for a dispensation through the Apostolic Penitentiary, such a cleric may exercise his office if there be serious threat to himself or others were he not to do so. Damage to his good name, and thereby to the Church, would be one such danger. The specific irregularities cited in canon 1048 are those related to a marriage attempted by one not free to do so (c. 1041, 3°) and direct participation in an abortion or willful homicide (c. 1041, 4°). A cleric who has incurred these irregularities may seek a temporary resolution in the internal sacramental (i.e., confessional) forum. However, the Apostolic Penitentiary is still to be approached for a final resolution of the matter as soon as reasonably possible. That the matter is addressed in this forum indicates the genuine care of the Church for the protection of the man's good name and his spiritual welfare, as well as the avoidance of scandal. Again, this applies only in matters involving urgency; only in matters occult; and only in matters relative to canon 1041, 3° and 4°.

A question arises as to why canon 1048 (which pertains to the exercise of orders) refers back to canon 1041, 3° and 4°, which deals with those irregular for the reception of orders. The answer is twofold. First, the only place in which those two irregularity-inducing causes are enunciated in detail is canon 1041, 3° and 4°. Subsequent references to them are by canon number only. Second, a reference here instead to canon 1044, §1, 3°, which concerns the exercise of orders, would be confusing, because it covers more than the subjects of canon 1041, 3° and 4°. The former canon also includes mutilation, attempted suicide, and acts of orders not permitted a given person in a specific time, place, or circumstance.

Dispensation Procedure

Canon 1049 — §1. Petitions to obtain a dispensation from irregularities or impediments must indicate all the irregularities and impediments. Nevertheless, a general dispensation is valid even for those omitted in good faith, except for the irregularities mentioned in can. 1041, n. 4, and for others brought to the judicial forum, but not for those omitted in bad faith.

§2. If it is a question of the irregularity from voluntary homicide or a procured abortion, the number of the delicts also must be mentioned for the validity of the dispensation.

§3. A general dispensation from irregularities and impediments to receive orders is valid for all the orders.

Canon 1049, §1 notes that the relevant irregularity and/or simple impediment must be stated explicitly in any request for a dispensation. In a particularly complex case involving, for instance, irregularities or simple impediments of different types having different causes, a general dispensation may be requested and granted, and would be effective even for an impediment not named explicitly, but omitted in good faith. There are two exceptions to the rule stated in the canon. First, if an irregularity or simple impediment is knowingly omitted or otherwise left out as a result of bad faith, it is not considered dispensed. Second, irregularities arising from participation in a willful homicide or a procured abortion are excluded from any general dispensation.

Canon 1049, §2 reinforces canon 1046: in cases of willful homicide and procured abortion, the irregularity is multiplied, and so its dispensation must cover all cases. Hence, the number of discrete delicts must be stated. Finally, canon 1049, §3 declares that an irregularity or simple impediment need be removed but once; a general dispensation for the reception of orders is valid for all orders.

Article 4: The Required Documents and Investigation [cc. 1050–1052]

Documents Required for Ordination

Canon 1050 — For a person to be promoted to sacred orders, the following documents are required:

1° a testimonial that studies have been properly completed according to the norm of can. 1032;

2° for those to be ordained to the presbyterate, a testimonial that the diaconate was received;

3° for candidates to the diaconate, a testimonial that baptism, confirmation and the ministries mentioned in can. 1035 were received; likewise, a testimonial that the declaration mentioned in can. 1036 was made, and if the one to be ordained to the permanent diaconate is a married candidate, testimonials that the marriage was celebrated and the wife consents.

Canon 1050 lists documents which must be amassed prior to the conferral of sacred orders. Some of the material listed here in canon 1050 has been treated elsewhere,[45] especially in referencing the distinction between dimissorials and testimonials.[46] Still, two remarks are in order here.

The Parties Responsible for Documentation

Canon 1050 permits a certain latitude as regards who precisely collects the pre-ordination documents or who finally is responsible for reviewing them to see that they are in order. Since the next two canons indicate that a candidate's major superior or diocesan bishop of incardination is central throughout the formation process, this same ordinary is understandably responsible for executing this documentary task, or having it executed by others properly delegated. The care of the pertinent files is often delegated to seminary rectors or formation directors. The documentation should clearly present any exemptions, dispensations, or other particular material unique to the ordinand. A mere statement of the issue and its resolution suffices, included in a manner befitting the candidate's right to privacy and the preservation of his good name.

[45] See commentary on cc. 1032, 1035, and 1036.

[46] See commentary on cc. 1015, §1 and 1020.

The ordaining prelate, if different from the candidate's proper ordinary, is responsible for at least nominally checking to see that the matters of prior diaconal ordination (if pertinent), academic preparation, sacramental history, and matrimonial status have been investigated. In fact, the inquiry is made as part of the ordination ritual itself, as the bishop asks whether or not those to be ordained have been found worthy.

Respect for a Candidate's Marriage

The last phrase of canon 1050, 3° implies the obvious: the law permits a permanent deacon to be in a valid marriage, provided that the marriage precedes the diaconal ordination. Canon 1050, 3° also states a not so obvious point: the deacon's wife must consent to her spouse's ordination. If the husband's marriage is likely to suffer because of his wife's lack of support for his diaconal ministry, then the ordination should not proceed. This protects and upholds the sacred, intimate, and exclusive bond enjoyed by the spouses. The Church should never threaten in any way the communion of life and love between a wife and her husband, equal partners who must support each other's commitments (cc. 1055–1057).

A wife's agreement to her husband's diaconal ordination does not imply that she intends to participate actively in his ministry, although she may wish to do so; the consent rather suggests simply that she will support him in his exercise of sacred ministry. Most fundamentally, the wife's consent assures all parties that she foresees no threat to her marriage. This question of spousal agreement generally is addressed early and often in formation programs for those aspiring to the permanent diaconate. Canon 1050, 3° affirms that documentation of this agreement is essential for the licit ordination of the man as a permanent deacon.

Final Pre-ordination Inquiries

Canon 1051 — The following prescripts regarding the investigation about the qualities required in the one to be ordained are to be observed:

1° there is to be a testimonial of the rector of the seminary or house of formation about the qualities required to receive the order, that is, about the sound doctrine of the candidate, his genuine piety, good morals, and aptitude to exercise the ministry, as well as, after a properly executed inquiry, about his state of physical and psychic health;

2° in order to conduct the investigation properly, the diocesan bishop or major superior can employ other means which seem useful to him according to the circumstances of time and place, such as testimonial letters, public announcements, or other sources of information.

Much of the material presented in canon 1051 has been treated elsewhere.[47] A few further reflections are in order.

First, the law here apportions to seminary rectors and formation directors a share in the difficult assessment of the areas mentioned in canon 1051, 1°. Prior references to candidates' human, moral, spiritual, psychological, and intellectual qualities (e.g., cc. 241, §1; 1029) have indicated that the final assessment is left to the proper ordinary. Although these prior references may presume that he has delegated such an assessment, canon 1051, 1° is the first to make explicit the duty of seminary rectors and formation directors.

Second, care must be taken to respect the provisions of canon 220. For instance, data regarding a candidate's psychological and physical health must be guarded carefully. The information is confidential, whether it may justify his dismissal from formation or affirm his suitability. The materials relevant to the testimonials of canon 1051, 1° are part of a man's official approval process for reception of a given order. Testimonials composed in accord with canon 1051, 1° are usually succinct; however, there should be nothing perfunctory about the prior testing and investigation which culminate in the issuance of these testimonials.

[47] See, for instance, commentary on cc. 1015; 1025; 1029; 1030; 1031, §1; and 1041, 1°.

Third, according to canon 1051, 2°, the proper diocesan bishop or competent major superior is charged with the investigation set forth in canon 1051, 1°. Obviously, this frees from particular responsibility the ordaining prelate who, if not ordaining his own subjects, need only be assured that this documentation is in order (see c. 1052, §2). Further, canon 1051, 2° grants the aforementioned ordinaries broad discretion in gathering information about a candidate: they can employ other means which seem useful to them according to the circumstances of time and place, pursuing "other sources of information."[48]

Persons who have known and observed a candidate's apostolic and personal development during formation often offer data which is particularly pertinent. Given the weightiness of the decision to be made regarding ordination (or not) and the significant responsibility of the candidate's proper ordinary, that authority is permitted, indeed encouraged, to utilize appropriate means to attain sufficient data so that moral certitude be reached about a candidate's fitness for orders. To this end, with due regard for the bounds of privacy, justice, and good taste, the inquiry may be as creative as the ordinary will allow.

One Document, Dual Purpose

The documentary requirements of canons 1050 and 1051 may be integrated into one statement, beginning with the affirmation that after proper consultation, the candidate is qualified to receive orders in accord with these two canons. Explicit mention is to be made of his successful completion of studies and formation in general (c. 1032), and his reception of baptism (c. 1024), confirmation (c. 1033), and certain ministries (c. 1035). His declaration of freedom in seeking orders should be noted (c. 1036). A copy of the candidate's curriculum vitae is presented. As best as can be established outside the necessarily restricted non-sacramental internal forum, a candidate's good character is to be attested to, as are his fitness and usefulness for sacred ministry. Pertinent dispensations should be noted briefly. Moral certitude of the candidate's physical and psychic health is referenced, as is the candidate's suitability in accord with the general requirements of canons 1026–1039.

Responsibilities of Ordaining Bishop

Canon 1052 — §1. For a bishop conferring ordination by his own right to proceed to the ordination, he must be sure that the documents mentioned in can. 1050 are at hand and that, after the investigation has been conducted according to the norm of law, positive arguments have proven the suitability of the candidate.

§2. For a bishop to proceed to the ordination of someone who is not his subject, it is sufficient that the dimissorial letters mention that the same documents are at hand, that the investigation has been performed according to the norm of the law, and that the suitability of the candidate has been established. Moreover, if the candidate is a member of a religious institute or a society of apostolic life, the same letters must also attest that he has been received definitively into the institute or society and is a subject of the superior who gives the letters.

§3. If, all these notwithstanding, the bishop doubts for specific reasons whether a candidate is suitable to receive orders, he is not to promote him.

[48] It is not entirely clear what is intended by the phrase "other sources of information."

To ordain one who is his subject, a bishop must be certain that the testimonials mentioned in canon 1050 have in fact been collected and are in order. This serves as a final check that the candidate lacks nothing regarding: the fulfillment of academic requirements; the prior conferral of diaconal ordination (for sacerdotal candidates only); the reception of Christian baptism, Catholic confirmation, and the ministries of lector and acolyte; and the declaration of personal moral freedom in advancing to orders. For married candidates to the permanent diaconate only, there must be documentation of the candidate's current valid marriage, along with proof of his wife's consent to his ordination.

For bishops ordaining subjects not their own, the dimissorial letter not only grants permission to confer the orders but also explicitly states that the necessary documentation is in order. While the dimissorial letter is not in itself a testimonial, it presents the candidate as one who has been examined and found suitable, at least because he has fulfilled all the requirements of canon 1052, §1, deriving from canon 1050.

Members of religious institutes or societies of apostolic life must be received definitively into the institute or society prior to conferral of orders, and this fact must be affirmed formally in the dimissorial. Definitive incorporation implies perpetual vows or an equivalent assimilating action as understood in the approved proper law of the institute or society. Canon 1052, §2 also requires an explicit statement that the granter of the dimissorial in fact is the candidate's major superior.

The Final Judgment

Two portions of canon 1052 are especially noteworthy: the closing phrase of canon 1052, §1 (that positive arguments must prove the suitability of the candidate) and the entirety of canon 1052, §3 (regarding the possible refusal of ordination by the ordaining bishop). This latter obligation carries with it the emphatic reminder that the final decision on ordination belongs to the legitimate authority of the Church. No one has a right to ordination.

The final judgment about a man's ordination belongs first to the ordinand's proper ordinary; however, when ordaining a subject not his own, a bishop enjoys the right and has the obligation to act on any reasonable doubt regarding that candidate's fitness. Canon 1052, §3 does not qualify such a doubt. Given how much a man is tested throughout his formation, any last minute doubt must be significant in order for the ordaining bishop to withhold orders from this previously approved candidate. Further, this presumption is all the stronger for sacerdotal candidates who already are deacons, as they have once been found worthy and useful ministerially,[49] and free to exercise their diaconal ministry.[50] It is noteworthy that Eastern code canon 770 indicates that this doubt arises from the ordaining bishop's conscience, which is not stated explicitly in the Latin code.

CHAPTER III
THE NOTATION AND TESTIMONIAL OF ORDINATION CONFERRED
[cc. 1053–1054]

Canon 1053 — §1. After an ordination has taken place, the names of those ordained and of the ordaining minister and the place and date of the ordination are to be noted in a special register to be kept carefully in the curia of the place of ordination; all the documents of individual ordinations are to be preserved carefully.

§2. The ordaining bishop is to give to each of the ordained an authentic testimonial of the reception of ordination; if a bishop other than their own promoted them with dimissorial letters, they are to show the testimonial to their own ordinary for notation of the ordination in a special register to be kept in the archive.

[49] See cc. 1025–1026, 1029, and 1031, and accompanying commentary.

[50] See cc. 1030 and 1038, and accompanying commentary.

Canon 1053, §1 states that all fundamental data pertinent to an ordination is to be recorded in the appropriate registry of the diocese of ordination, to be located at the diocesan chancery. This data includes the names of the ordained parties, the name of the ordaining prelate, and the place and date of ordination. The canon also calls for the careful and accurate preservation of all documents related to an ordination, though it does not refer expressly to these being kept in the same place. Formation files—which document a candidate's progress in preparation for orders—are often kept, securely, at the major seminary where he trained (for seculars) or in the provincial archives (for religious). The canon refers more particularly to those items directly tied to the ceremony itself, e.g., testimonials; dimissorials; and certification of completion of ceremony.

Canon 1053, §2 states that the ordaining minister is to see that each ordinand has an authentic certification that an order has been conferred. It is a fundamental principle of church order that each person has a right to know and have verification of his or her status in the Church (c. 487, §2). Fulfillment of this obligation by the ordaining minister protects the ordinand's right to assure others of his valid ordination. Experience has shown that there can be confusion about who has proof of what; the canon clarifies that the ordinand himself is to be sure that his superiors receive proper documentation about orders conferred, even if he himself must pursue the communication of such documentation.

As regards secular clergy properly ordained by an ordinary not their own (i.e., with legitimate dimissorial letters), the ordinary of incardination is to be presented with a certificate of orders conferred, so that the records are complete in the ordinand's own diocese. The proper ordinary of a religious deacon or priest should be presented with a similar certification.

Canon 1054 — The local ordinary if it concerns seculars, or the competent major superior if it concerns his own subjects, is to send notice of each ordination celebrated to the pastor of the place of baptism, who is to record it in his baptismal register according to the norm of can. 535, §2.

Canon 1054 reminds all principal parties to an ordination of the centrality of the baptismal registry in the sacramental life of a person. A notation of orders conferred must be made in the ordinand's baptismal registry, since one's sacramental history is recorded there (c. 535, §2). The obligation to provide such information does not belong to the ordinand or even necessarily to the staff of the ordaining minister, but rather to the ordinand's proper ordinary of incardination (e.g., local ordinary in the case of diocesan clergy; major superior in the case of religious clergy). Any subsequent development involving the cleric's status such as laicization or advancement to another order (e.g., from the diaconate to the priesthood) should also be noted carefully in the baptismal registry.

Bibliography

Sources

CDF. Littcirc Per litteras ad universos. AAS 72 (1980) 1132–1135.

Paul VI. Aplett Summi Dei Verbum. AAS 55 (1963) 979–995.

———. Ency Sacerdotalis caelibatus. AAS 59 (1967) 657–697.

Pius XI. Ency Ad Catholici Sacerdotii. AAS 28 (1936) 5–53.

Reference Works, Studies, and Articles

Alesandro, J. Canonical Delicts Involving Sexual Misconduct and Dismissal from the Clerical State. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1995.

Christensen, J. Character Requisites for Reception of Holy Orders. CanLawStud 424. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1964.

Cox, C. "Processes Involving Irregularities and Impediments to the Exercise of Orders." In Clergy Procedural Handbook, ed. R. Calvo and N. Klinger, 178–205. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992.

Del Prete, F. The Juridical Elements of a Priestly Vocation: A Canonical Analysis of the Legislation of the Church from the Seventeenth Century to the Present. Doctoral dissertation, Faculty of Canon Law, Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas. Rome: Graziani, 1992.

De Maere, L. La maturité psychique des candidats au sacerdoce selon le Code de droit canonique de 1983. Doctoral dissertation, Faculty of Canon Law, Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas. Rome: Graziani, 1990.

Gannon, J. The Interstices Required for the Promotion to Orders. CanLawStud 196. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1944.

Hendriks, J. "On the Sacramentality of the Episcopal Consecration." Stud Can 28 (1994) 231–239.

Lendakadavil, A. Candidates for the Priesthood: A Study of Their Suitability according to the New Code of Canon Law. Shillong, India: Vendrame Institute Pub., 1989.

Magee, P. Dispensation from the Obligations of Priestly Celibacy: An Interpretation of the Cases of Those Who Should Not Have Received Priestly Ordination according to "Per Litteras" §5a. Doctoral dissertation, Faculty of Canon Law, Pontifical Gregorian University. Rome: Pioda, 1988.

McIntyre, J. "In Persona Christi Capitis: A Commentary on Canon 1008." Stud Can 30 (1996) 371–401.

McKay, G. "The Reconciliation of Schismatically Ordained Married Clergy." P 84 (1995) 355–368.

Pelliccia, G. La preparazione ed ammissione dei chierici ai santi Ordini nella Roma del Secolo XVI: Studio storico con fonti inedite. Rome: Pia Società San Paolo, 1946.

Poitras, S. "La figure du prêtre dans l'enseignement pontifical (1903–1985)." Excerpt of doctoral dissertation, Institute of Spirituality, Pontifical Gregorian University, Rome, 1988.

Quinn, J. Documents Required for the Reception of Orders: A Historical Synopsis and Commentary. CanLawStud 266. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1948.

Smith, P. "Lack of Due Discretion and Suitability for Ordination." Stud Can 21 (1987) 125–140.

Szentmártoni, M. "Celibato per il Regno dei cieli e maturità della persona." P 83 (1994) 247–271.

Vogelpohl, H. The Simple Impediments to Holy Orders: An Historical Synopsis and Commentary. CanLawStud 224. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1945.

Woestman, W. "Restricting the Right to Celebrate the Eucharist." Stud Can 29 (1995) 155–178.

TITLE VII[1]
MARRIAGE
[cc. 1055–1165]

Historical Overview

Since marriage has always been the state of life, indeed the vocation, of the vast majority of the Christian faithful, it has been a central theme of the Church's teaching and the canonical discipline rooted in that teaching in every era. From the beginning the Church's approach to marriage has been anchored in a few New Testament texts: Jesus' own stinging condemnation of divorce as a distortion of the Creator's original intention for marriage and a concession to human hardness of heart (Mt 19:3–12; Mk 10:2–12; Mt 5:31–32; Lk 16:18); Paul's response to questions from feuding members of the church in Corinth about marriage, divorce, and virginity (1 Cor 7); and the reflection by the author of the epistle to the Ephesians on the analogy between the relationship of husband and wife and that between Christ and the Church (Eph 5:22–33).

Theological reflection on these key texts fostered—and continues to foster—the gradual development of a distinctively Christian understanding of marriage. An appreciation of the evolution of this theology of marriage and the canonical discipline based on it is essential for understanding the treatment of marriage in the revised Code of Canon Law. This historical introduction will sketch the beginnings of a Christian theology of marriage, the consolidation of this reflection in the medieval synthesis, the response of the Church to challenges to its doctrine on marriage from the sixteenth century reformers and secular authorities, and the renewal of Catholic thinking about marriage at Vatican II whose teaching has left its unmistakable imprint on the revised code.[2]

The Early Church

The early Christians did not radically alter the customs according to which marriage was constituted and lived out. Instead, they entered and lived out their marriages according to the traditional practices of their culture, first Jewish and later Greco-Roman, but they did so "in the Lord" (1 Cor 7:39).

However, from an early date, perhaps as early as New Testament times, traditional understandings of marriage were challenged by a somewhat amorphous movement now known as Gnosticism, which attacked the body ecclesiastic like a virus. Its struggle with Gnosticism enabled the Church to begin to articulate its own vision of marriage.

In its manifold, syncretistic forms, Gnosticism espoused an ethical, metaphysical, and theological dualism according to which the material world, including the human body, was seen as the creation of an evil demiurge who had imprisoned fallen, spiritual souls in physical bodies. Salvation came through special, esoteric knowledge (gnosis) that enabled these fallen souls to escape their material imprisonment and rise to spiritual contemplation of the true God.[3] Gnosticism rejected procreation as evil, since it resulted in the imprisonment of still more souls in corporeality. Gnostics of a rigorist bent urged their adherents to avoid both procreation and marriage and to practice perfect continence; those of a more antinomian bent adopted a radically realized eschatology according to which sharers in the special revelation already enjoyed the resurrected life and were immune from all moral laws. For the latter groups, sexual experience of all kinds was permissible (and, at times, obligatory), as long as procreation was avoided.[4]

[1] See T. Doyle, in CLSA Com, 737–746; K. Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Überblick vor 1055/1–1062/1; J. Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 659–732; D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 571–578.

[2] For more complete accounts of the development of the Christian understanding of marriage, see E. Schillebeeckx, Marriage: Secular Reality and Saving Mystery, 2 vols. (London: Sheed and Ward, 1965); G. LeBras, "Le Mariage," Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique (DTC) 9–2: col. 2123–2317; C. Brooke, The Medieval Idea of Marriage (Oxford: Clarendon, 1989); J. Brundage, Law, Sex and Christian Society in Medieval Europe (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1987); T. Mackin, What Is Marriage? (New York: Paulist, 1982).

Orthodox Christian teachers like Clement of Alexandria responded to the Gnostic challenge by marshaling resources from the New Testament, the Old Testament, Philo's Platonic reading of the Old Testament, and Stoic philosophy.[5] In response to Gnostic rigorists, they affirmed that marriage and procreation were good because they were created and enjoined by God (Gen 1:28), but not as good as virginity for the sake of the coming kingdom of God. In response to Gnostic antinomians, they insisted with the Stoics that sexuality, though fraught with moral dangers, was good as long as it was confined to marriage and exercised only for the procreation of offspring. These responses to Gnosticism soon became the orthodox Christian position on the nature and ends of marriage.[6]

In both Jewish and Greco-Roman cultures, the law recognized marriage as a "social fact" with certain juridic consequences, but marrying was almost exclusively a family matter, which took place without the necessary involvement of either religious or civil authority. Although liturgical rites for the celebration of marriage gradually emerged, their observance was not necessary for the ecclesial recognition of the validity of marriage until after the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century.[7]

The cultures in which Christianity was born and raised did, however, challenge its understanding of marriage. Jesus had pointedly rejected divorce, but both Judaic and Greco-Roman laws made provision for relatively easy divorce, at least by the husband. Throughout the patristic era, every major Christian teacher excoriated divorce as a grave violation of divine law and contrasted the permanence of marriages among Christians with the instability of the unions of their non-Christian neighbors.[8] Nevertheless, there is little evidence that, even after Christianity became the established religion of the Roman Empire, church leaders sought to bring relatively liberal Roman divorce law into conformity with the gospel (or that they could have done so had they been so inclined).[9]

Augustine provided the most coherent and influential synthesis of the emerging Christian understanding of marriage. He defended the essential goodness of marriage against the attacks of the Manicheans, a syncretistic sect which espoused a radical ontological dualism and held that marriage and procreation were to be shunned as intrinsically evil, a sect to which Augustine himself had once been an adherent. Augustine identified a threefold goodness in marriage: the good of fidelity (bonum fidei), the good of children (bonum prolis), and the good of the sacrament or permanence (bonum sacramenti). He explained:

> This good is threefold: fidelity, offspring, sacrament. Fidelity means that one avoids all sexual activity apart from one's marriage. Offspring means that the child is accepted in love, is nurtured in affection, is brought up in religion. The sacrament means

[3] P. Brown, The Body and Society (New York: Columbia University, 1988) 103–121; and J. Noonan, Contraception (New York: Mentor-Omega, 1967) 78–97.

[4] Noonan, 80–81.

[5] Brown, 122–139, and Noonan, 97–107.

[6] Noonan, 107–111, and Brown, 133.

[7] K. Stevenson, To Join Together: The Rite of Marriage (New York: Pueblo, 1987) 16–55.

[8] H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce du premier au cinquième siècle (Paris: Beauchesne, 1970).

[9] P. Reynolds, Marriage in the Western Church (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994) 151–153.

> that the marriage is not severed nor the spouse abandoned.... This is a kind of rule set for marriage, by which nature's fruitfulness is honored and vicious sexual vagrancy is restrained.[10]

For Augustine, it was chiefly "the sacrament" that distinguished the marriages of Christians from those of other people. Because of its essential goodness, marriage was a sacred reality and he analogized its permanence to the permanent character arising from baptism.[11] "The sacrament" was primarily the property of perpetuity or indissolubility and not "sacramentality" in its later medieval and modern sense of a sacred rite that causes grace. So strong was this "sacrament" that, even after the irretrievable breakdown of a marriage through divorce, a "conjugal something" (quiddam coniugale) remained and prevented a new marriage.[12] Augustine's teaching on the perdurance of the sacrament even after divorce sowed the seed from which later generations reaped an understanding of marriage as one of the seven sacraments, one of whose effects was an indissoluble bond (vinculum).

Although Augustine defended the goodness of marriage, he clearly saw it as less good than virginity. Fallen humans were infected with the spiritually deadly virus of concupiscence. Concupiscence was evident in every form of human activity, but it was nowhere more evident than in the sexual instinct, which stubbornly refused to be mastered by reason and will. Hence, even within marriage, sexual relations could rarely be had without the commission of at least venial sin.[13] This dark view of sexual relations in marriage was also part of Augustine's legacy to subsequent generations.

[10] Augustine, De Genesi ad litteram, ix, 7, 12, Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum (CSEL) 28: 275–276.

[11] Reynolds, 293–297.

[12] Augustine, De nuptiis et concupiscentia, I, 11, CSEL 42:223. See also idem, De bono coniugali, 6–7, CSEL 41:196–197; and De adulterinis coniugiis, II, 4, CSEL 41:386.

[13] Idem, De bono coniugali, 6–7, CSEL 41:194–195.

The Middle Ages

With the fall of the Roman Empire in the West and the settlement by largely Germanic peoples in its former territory, the Church confronted marriage customs that were markedly different from those of the Roman Empire. For these people, marriage did not come about when the parties exchanged consent, but as the end of a process involving several steps, each of which was necessary to constitute marriage: a man's (or his father's) petition to a woman's father for her hand (petitio), betrothal by public agreement of the parties' families (desponsatio), provision of a dowry to the woman's family (dotatio), the handing over of the woman to the man (traditio), and the physical consummation of the union by sexual intercourse (consummatio). Until all of these steps had been completed, the marriage was incomplete.[14]

Since decisions about the legitimacy of children and inheritance often hinged on whether a marriage existed, it was important to be clear about what constituted marriage. As the Church gradually acquired jurisdiction over marriage, it was forced to adjudicate matrimonial disputes. Two schools of thought emerged: the School of Paris, represented especially by Peter Lombard, held that marriage was constituted solely by the spouses' consent in words concerning the present (as opposed to words concerning the future, which gave rise only to betrothal); while the School of Bologna, represented especially by Gratian, held that consent initiated a marriage but a marriage was not fully constituted (and, therefore, could be dissolved) until it had been physically consummated. This scholarly dispute with its enormous practical implications was ultimately resolved by a series of decisions by Alexander III and his successors in the twelfth century.[15] These popes held that consent by the parties alone made a marriage[16] but that, prior to consummation, it could be dissolved for sufficiently grave cause

[14] Reynolds, 75–88.

[15] See C. Brooke, 264–270.

[16] X, 4.4.3.

(e.g., entry by one of the parties into religious life)[17] and that consent in words concerning the future followed by consummation transformed betrothal into marriage without the interposition of consent in words concerning the present.[18] The consequence of these papal decisions was to transfer power to constitute marriage from families to the parties themselves and, thereby, to open the door to the social scourge of clandestine marriages, unions entered into without any public form.

Since it was now clear that marriage was constituted by consent and gave rise to certain rights and obligations, the path was open to understand marriage according to the model of a contract, another kind of agreement entered into by consent and giving rise to rights and obligations. While the contractual model for understanding marriage soon triumphed in the West,[19] it was not accepted with the same enthusiasm by the Eastern churches. Marriage was analogized to a contract in later secular Roman law and in the Nomocanon in Fourteen Titles, a collection of conciliar canons and secular laws governing ecclesiastical affairs compiled around 629. Nevertheless, the Eastern churches have preferred to view marriage as a "sacrament" or "mystery of the Church."[20]

It was also in the Middle Ages that reflection on Ephesians 5 and Augustine's teaching on the "good of the sacrament" led the Church to an explicit consciousness of marriage's sacramentality among the baptized. The first inclusion of marriage among the seven sacraments of the New Law by the Church's magisterium occurred at the Council of Verona in 1184, perhaps in response to the resurgence of the rejection of marriage and procreation among the Cathars, a heretical sect with Manichaean tendencies.[21] Although theologians had spoken of marriage as a "sacrament" prior to Verona, there was no clear consensus that the sacrament of matrimony was on the same level as baptism and Eucharist or that marriage was a cause of grace.[22] However, at Verona, the magisterium was running ahead of theology. In subsequent years, scholars struggled to elaborate a cogent theology of the sacramentality of marriage. While there was a consensus among theologians that marriage was the sacrament of the faithful and indissoluble union of Christ with his Church, there was considerable disagreement among them about how a natural institution had been elevated by Christ to sacramental dignity, what were the matter and form of the sacrament, whether the sacrament was a cause of grace, and, if so, what species of grace it caused.[23]

The Council of Trent and the Post-Tridentine Era

The sixteenth-century reformers challenged the Catholic Church's teaching and discipline on marriage. They rejected the sacramentality of marriage, the Church's jurisdiction over marriage, and its prohibition of remarriage after divorce in cases of adultery. They also sharply criticized the Church's failure to impose a mandatory public form for the celebration of marriage to eradicate clandestine marriages.[24]

The Council of Trent responded to this challenge by defining matrimony "as truly and properly one of the seven sacraments of the evangelical law, instituted by Christ the Lord"[25] and by reaffirming the Church's authority to establish impediments to marriage, to dispense from them, and, generally, to regulate marriage.[26] The council also condemned the reformers who had claimed the "church had erred when it taught and teaches" that the bond of marriage could not be dissolved because of the adultery of one of the partners.[27] The council, nevertheless, studiously

[17] X, 4.1.16.
[18] X, 4.1.15–16.
[19] LeBras, "Le Mariage," DTC 9:2182–2186.
[20] J. Meyendorf, Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective (Crestwood, N.Y.: St. Vladimir Seminary, 1975) 19–23.
[21] X, 5.7.9. See Schillebeeckx, 2:165–170.
[22] LeBras, "Le Mariage," DTC 9:2196–2201.
[23] LeBras, "Le Mariage," DTC 9:2196–2224.
[24] Brundage, 552–561.
[25] Council of Trent, sess. XXIV, de doctrina, c. 1.
[26] Council of Trent, sess. XXIV, de doctrina, cc. 2–12.
[27] Council of Trent, sess. XXIV, de doctrina, c. 7.

avoided condemning Eastern Christians whose discipline allowed for remarriage after divorce because of adultery.[28] Finally, the council decreed that henceforth, for the validity of their marriages, couples were required to express their consent before their proper pastors and two witnesses.[29] However, the council decided to make its decree effective only in parishes in which it had been promulgated. As a result, the decree lacked effect in many areas of the world where it could not be promulgated or its promulgation was judged inopportune, until the Sacred Congregation for the Council extended the obligation of observing the canonical form of marriage to Catholics throughout the world.[30]

As the Age of Enlightenment dawned, secular authorities sought to reclaim jurisdiction over marriage from the Church. To do so, they exploited the purported distinction between the marriage contract and the marital sacrament. The Church could have exclusive jurisdiction over marriage insofar as it was a sacrament, they argued, but, insofar as marriage was a contract, the State had jurisdiction over marriage, like other contracts. The Church's response to this secular challenge to its jurisdiction over marriage was to affirm with increasing vehemence the inseparability and, at times, the identity of the marriage contract and the marital sacrament among the baptized. In 1852, Pius IX affirmed: "It is a doctrine of the Church that the sacrament is not an adventitious quality superimposed on the contract; it pertains to the essence of marriage itself."[31] This teaching was reaffirmed in 1880 by Leo XIII: "Thus there can be no true and legitimate contract which is not thereby a sacrament."[32] This teaching was incorporated into canon 1012, §2 of the 1917 code which held that, since the matrimonial contract among the baptized had been raised by Christ to sacramental dignity, a valid matrimonial contract could not exist among the baptized "without its being by that fact a sacrament."

The 1917 code also consolidated a number of other aspects of the Church's theology and discipline on marriage that had been slowly developing during the post-Tridentine era. Throughout this era, there had been a pronounced tendency toward juridicizing moral theology in general and the theology of marriage in particular.[33] This tendency was clearly evident in the 1917 code's hierarchical ordering of the ends of marriage and its narrowing the object of matrimonial consent. Canon 1013, §1 of the 1917 code asserted: "The primary end of marriage is the procreation and education of children; the secondary, mutual assistance and the remedy of concupiscence." So secondary and subordinate were mutual assistance and the remedy of concupiscence to the primary end of marriage that the secondary end could be explicitly excluded from consent without invalidating the marriage, since it was not a sine qua non for the achievement of the primary end.[34] Canon 1081, §2 defined the object of matrimonial consent as "the perpetual and exclusive right to the body for acts which are per se apt to generate offspring." While the 1917 code's articulation of the ends of marriage and the object of consent had the advantage of juridic clarity, it was far removed from the lived experience of most married members of the faithful and smacked of arid legalism.

Consequently, not long after the promulgation of the 1917 code, some theologians, while acknowledging the essential ordering of marriage to the procreation and education of offspring, argued that more emphasis should be given to the so-called secondary end of marriage and its personal dimensions. These "personalists"

[28] P. Fransen, "Divorce on the Ground of Adultery—the Council of Trent (1563)," Concilium 7 (1970) 95–96.

[29] Council of Trent, sess. XXIV, de ref., c. 1.

[30] SCConc, decr Ne temere, August 2, 1907, ASS 40 (1907) 525–530.

[31] Pius IX, letter, September 19, 1852, CICFontes 2: n. 515.

[32] Leo XIII, ency Arcanum divinae sapientiae, February 10, 1880, ASS 12 (1879–1880) 394.

[33] J. Mahoney, The Making of Moral Theology (Oxford: Clarendon, 1989) 224–258.

[34] C. Wynen, January 22, 1944, AAS 36 (1944) 189; SRRDec 36 (1944) 66–67.

> felt that the true Catholic teaching would be more clearly presented if less emphasis were placed on what [had] hitherto been commonly called the primary end of marriage, and more emphasis on the personal elements of conjugal love and the conjugal community of life.[35]

The "personalist" project received an icy reception from the Holy See. In 1944, the Holy Office responded negatively to the question "whether the opinion of certain modern writers can be admitted, who... teach that the secondary ends are not essentially subordinate to the primary end, but are equally principal and independent?"[36] In 1951, Pius XII affirmed that the essential subordination of the secondary ends of marriage to the primary end is a principle which > the very internal structure of the natural order reveals, which the heritage of the Christian tradition embodies, which the Supreme Pontiffs have repeatedly taught, and which finally is crystallized into legal form by the Code of Canon Law.[37]

Vatican II

The Second Vatican Council devoted paragraphs 48 to 52 of its Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World to marriage. Although the council sought only to highlight "some major features of the church's teaching,"[38] its teaching marked a watershed in the Church's understanding of marriage. Avoiding the familiar term "contract," the council consistently spoke of marriage as a "covenant." Although the explicit reason given for this preference for "covenant" was that it was a term more congenial to the tradition of the Eastern churches,[39] the term was also more in harmony with the personalist approach to marriage that suffuses Gaudium et spes.

This personalist approach was evident in the council's description of marriage as "an intimate sharing (communitas) of married life and love"[40] and in its repeated emphasis on the importance of conjugal love. The council did not present this conjugal love as a purely spiritual reality. Instead, it taught:

> This love is uniquely expressed and perfected through the marital act. The actions within marriage by which the couple are united intimately and chastely are noble and worthy ones. Expressed in a manner which is truly human, these actions signify and promote that mutual self-giving by which spouses enrich each other with a joyful and thankful will.[41]

Ignoring the 1917 code's articulation of the object of consent as the perpetual and exclusive right to the body, the council defined consent as "that human act whereby spouses mutually bestow and accept each other."[42] Despite its teaching on the importance of conjugal love, the council reiterated traditional teaching that the "sacred bond" of marriage is indissoluble and that its continued existence is not dependent on the continued love of the spouses[43] and deplored the "plague of divorce."[44]

The council also reiterated the traditional teaching that "by their nature, the institution of matrimony itself and conjugal love are ordained for the procreation and education of children, and find in them their ultimate crown."[45] It recog-

[35] J. Ford, "Marriage: Its Meaning and Purpose," TS 3 (1942) 333.
[36] SCOf, decr, April 1, 1944, AAS 36 (1944) 103; CLD 3, 401–402.
[37] Pius XII, alloc, October 29, 1951, AAS 43 (1951) 849; CLD 3, 403.
[38] GS 47.
[39] Vatican II, AcSynVat, IV/4:536.
[40] GS 48.
[41] GS 49.
[42] GS 48.
[43] Ibid.
[44] GS 47.
[45] GS 48.

nized, however, that marriage is endowed by God "with various benefits and purposes"[46] and that its focus on the procreative end of marriage should not be understood as "making the other purposes of matrimony of less account."[47] In this, the council passed over in silence the strict hierarchical ordering of ends enunciated in the 1917 code and insisted on by the preconciliar magisterium.

The revised code has attempted to translate this conciliar teaching into canonical language as well as to integrate it with the rest of the canonical tradition. Toward that end, the code has devoted 111 canons to marriage, more than to any other sacrament. After several foundational canons, the material is divided into ten chapters: pastoral care and what must precede the celebration of marriage (cc. 1063–1072), diriment impediments in general (cc. 1073–1082), diriment impediments specifically (cc. 1083–1094), matrimonial consent (cc. 1095– 1107), the form of the celebration of marriage (1108–1123), mixed marriages (cc. 1124–1129), marriages celebrated secretly (cc. 1130–1133), the effects of marriage (cc. 1134–1140), the separation of spouses (cc. 1141–1155), and the convalidation of marriage (cc. 1156–1165).

Foundational Canons[48]
[cc. 1055–1062]

The Nature of Marriage

Canon 1055 — §1. The matrimonial covenant, by which a man and a woman establish between themselves a partnership of the whole of life and which is ordered by its nature to the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring, has been raised by Christ the Lord to the dignity of a sacrament between the baptized.[49]

Unlike the 1917 code, which offered no definition of marriage, the present code begins its treatment of marriage with a description or "working definition" of marriage. This description, derived largely from Gaudium et spes 48, is essentially a theological statement, but one that has been cast in juridic language. Although the main clause of this paragraph of the canon affirms the traditional doctrine that Christ raised the marriages of the baptized to sacramental dignity, the subordinate clause of the sentence describes the natural or human reality of marriage. It is precisely this natural, human institution that Christ has raised to sacramental dignity for the baptized. Thus, the canon's description of marriage purports to be an authoritative interpretation of natural law and to provide the standard according to which all marriages are to be measured, whether the spouses are baptized or not.

In their discussions of marriage, canonists have traditionally distinguished matrimonium in fieri ("marriage in the act of being constituted") from matrimonium in facto esse ("marriage in the act of being lived out"). Although this distinction is not mentioned in either the 1917 or the 1983 code, it has an enduring significance for properly interpreting the meaning of the term "matrimony" in both codes. In brief, matrimonium in fieri is the act of consent that directly and immediately gives rise to matrimonium in facto esse. If matrimonium in fieri is fundamentally flawed, no matrimonium in facto esse results. But the converse is not true. Matrimonium in facto esse, once constituted by the legitimate consent of the parties, continues in existence even if seas of troubles cause the shipwreck of the existential relationship of the spouses.

In a sort of shorthand, commentators on the 1917 code customarily spoke of matrimonium in

[46] Ibid.

[47] GS 50.

[48] See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 740–746; Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Überblick vor 1055–1062; Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 659–662; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 571– 578.

[49] See CCEO 776, §1. The Eastern code describes only the natural reality of marriage in this section and addresses the sacramentality of marriage in a separate section (CCEO 776, §2).

fieri as "the contract" and of matrimonium in facto esse as "the bond" (vinculum) and devoted little attention to the latter, except insofar as it precluded a subsequent marriage. However, following the lead of Vatican II, canon 1055, §1 identifies matrimonium in fieri as "the matrimonial covenant" and matrimonium in facto esse as the "partnership of the whole of life... ordered by its nature to the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring" which results from the conjugal covenanting. A partnership of the whole of life ordered to both the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of children is a much richer understanding of matrimonium in facto esse than "the legitimate, perpetual and exclusive union of a man and a woman, arising from their mutual consent, ordered to the procreation and education of offspring"[50] of the 1917 code. In addition, greater maturity and interpersonal integration are required to establish a partnership of the whole of life than to give and accept the right to the body for acts suitable for the procreation of children.

Marriage as Covenant and Contract

In describing marriage, the revised code follows Vatican II in designating marriage as a "covenant," rather than as a "contract." It is not, however, as consistent as Gaudium et spes in its use of covenant language. In fact, the revised code refers to marriage as a "covenant" in only three canons;[51] but it uses contractual language in reference to marriage at least forty-three times.[52] This contractual emphasis in the revised code is, in part, the result of the long canonical tradition that, at least since the Middle Ages, has understood marriage according to the model of a Roman law consensual contract. This was a contract from which obligations arose not from the exchange of a verbal formula or from the handing over of the object of the contract, but from the agreement of the wills of the consenting contractants.[53]

The code's juxtaposition of covenantal and contractual language and the predominance of the latter also reflect the fact that its drafters saw "covenant" and "contract" as interchangeable terms. In response to an objection from a code commission member to the use of both "covenant" and "contract" in what would become canon 1055, the Secretariat responded: "The terms 'contract' and 'covenant' are used in one and the same sense, indeed deliberately, so that it may be more clearly evident that the matrimonial covenant concerning which Gaudium et spes speaks can be constituted for the baptized in no other way than through a contract, even if it is sui generis."[54]

One may view the tendency of the code commission and of the revised code to equate "contract" and "covenant" as a matter of little consequence. Thus, Örsy suggests: "This new relationship between contract and covenant is best understood if the movement from contract to covenant is considered as a move to a higher viewpoint. Nothing is lost, everything is enriched; contract is contained in the covenant but does not exhaust it."[55] When one considers the decisive role played by the contractual model in articulating the Church's understanding of marriage since the Middle Ages, however, it is difficult to be sanguine about the predominance of contractual language about marriage in the revised code. At the very least, this

[50] F. Cappello, De Matrimonio (Rome: Marietti, 1961) n. 3; P. Gasparri, De Matrimonio (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1932) n. 8; F. X. Wernz and P. Vidal, Ius Canonicum (Rome: Gregorian University, 1946) 5: n. 21.

[51] See cc. 1055, §1; 1057, §2; and 1063, 4°.

[52] See cc. 1055, §2; 1058; 1068; 1073; 1085, §2; 1086, §3; 1089; 1094; 1095; 1096, §1; 1097, §2; 1098; 1101, §2; 1102, §1; 1104, §1 (bis); 1105, §1, 1° and §4 (bis); 1106; 1108, §1 and §2; 1114; 1115; 1117; 1120; 1121, §2 (bis) and §3; 1122, §§1–2; 1125, §3; 1125, 3°; 1127, §1; 1143, §1; 1144, §1; 1146; 1147; 1148, §2; 1149; 1160; 1684, §1; and 1706.

[53] A. Gauthier, Roman Law and Its Contribution to the Development of Canon Law (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1996) 64–67.

[54] Comm 15 (1983) 222.

[55] L. Örsy, Marriage in Canon Law (Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier, 1986) 50.

predominance could possibly eviscerate the conciliar teaching on marriage as a covenant by providing a license to use the Roman law of contracts, understood as the natural law, as the interpretive key for the revised code.

"Covenant" has at least three advantages over "contract" as the prime analogue for articulating an understanding of marriage.

(1) A first advantage of the covenant analogy is that a covenant is a sacred reality, while a contract is essentially secular in nature. Although "covenant" was also used for ordinary pacts between peoples, it was the term chosen by the Old Testament authors to designate the faithful and loving relationship between Yahweh and his chosen people Israel. Especially in the prophetic books, this covenant was analogized to a marriage between Yahweh and his people, a marriage to which Yahweh was unfailingly faithful but to which his people were chronically unfaithful. This covenantal analogy was carried forward in the New Testament, especially in Ephesians 5 where the love of husband and wife is called a "great foreshadowing" that "refers to Christ and the Church."

Marriage was first assimilated to a contract not in classical Roman law but in the works of the commentators on Roman law as early as the twelfth century revival of the study of Roman law at Bologna. Once introduced by secular legal scholars, the contractual model for marriage spread "by a sort of contagion" first among canonists and then among theologians after the triumph of the theory that marriage was established by consent alone.[56] Although it was recognized that marriage was a unique contract, the use of the contractual model encouraged theologians and canonists to employ the tools of the Roman law of contracts to analyze marriage. While this sort of analysis fostered juridical clarity and was useful for adjudicating concrete marriage cases, it also opened the door for a legalistic approach to marriage and inhibited the development of a genuinely theological understanding of marriage.

[56] LeBras, "Le Mariage," DTC 9:2183.

(2) The covenantal model of marriage, while recognizing that marriage gives rise to mutual rights and obligations, places primary emphasis on the mutual personal commitment of the spouses. Thus, it is an apt vehicle for expressing the personalist dimension of marriage stressed by Gaudium et spes and the postconciliar magisterium. The contractual model, on the other hand, emphasizes the rights and obligations that are mutually given and accepted to constitute marriage and, when these rights and obligations are overemphasized, the personal dimension of marriage can be altogether or at least largely lost from view.

(3) As a result of its emphasis on rights and obligations, the contractual model has encouraged a narrow focus on matrimonium in fieri, the moment when marriage and its attendant rights and obligations come into being. This primary focus has historically led to a relative neglect of matrimonium in facto esse, the spouses' living out of their marital commitment amid the vicissitudes of daily life. One consequence of this neglect is that the Church has invested considerable resources in developing and implementing effective marriage preparation programs, but has invested considerably fewer resources and has had considerably less success in developing programs to assist couples in living out their marriages.[57] The covenantal model with its emphasis on the personal aspects of marriage can foster more balanced attention to both dimensions of marriage and more effective pastoral support to the married.

A Partnership of the Whole of Life

By describing marriage as a partnership or consortium of the whole of life, the revised code retrieves the classic Roman law definition of the [57] M. Lawler, "Doing Marriage Preparation Right," America (December 30, 1995) 12; J. Provost, "Marriage Preparation in the New Code: Canon 1063 and the Novus Habitus Mentis," in Ius Sequitur Vitam, ed. J. Provost and K. Walf (Louvain: Leuven University, 1991) 190.

jurist Modestinus.[58] Although the term consortium defies precise translation, it connotes a close association or community of persons who share a common lot. Less intimate than a communion (communio), a consortium is more than a partnership (societas) for business purposes.[59] The qualification of this consortium as one "of the whole of life" underscores that the spouses' destinies are inextricably intertwined "in good times and in bad, in sickness and in health."[60]

Canon 1008 of the 1980 schema had spoken of marriage not as a consortium but as a communion, a more intimate union of minds and hearts. However, the code commission replaced the term "communion" with consortium in the 1982 schema. The reason given for this change was that the term consortium was less ambiguous than communio and better rooted in the juridical tradition.[61] Nevertheless, "communion" was the term preferred by John Paul II in his 1982 apostolic exhortation Familiaris consortio.[62]

The Ends of Marriage

To say that marriage is, by its nature, ordered to the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring means that, as a natural institution, marriage has certain ends or finalities that are embedded in the nature of the institution itself (fines operis) and are independent of the will or intention of the spouses (fines operantis). Since the achievement of the ends of marriage is somewhat beyond the power of the spouses, the failure to attain them does not in itself affect the validity of a marriage. For example, even though marriage is ordered to the procreation and education of offspring, childless marriages are presumed to be valid. However, if one or both parties exclude this essential end of marriage from their consent (i.e., refuse to give and accept the right to these ends) by a positive act of the will, they contract invalidly.[63]

Unlike the 1917 code, the revised code does not propose a hierarchical ordering of the ends of marriage. Neither the good of the spouses nor the procreation and education of offspring is designated as the primary end of marriage. Instead, both are equally essential to and inseparable in marriage. As John Paul II notes:

> Conjugal love, while leading the spouses to the reciprocal "knowledge" which makes them "one flesh," does not end with the couple, because it makes them capable of the greatest possible gift, the gift by which they become cooperators with God for giving life to a new human person. Thus the couple, while giving themselves to one another, give not just themselves but also the reality of children.[64]

Since the nascent Church's struggle with Gnosticism, it has taught that the procreation and education of offspring is an essential end of marriage. While primary emphasis has traditionally been given to the procreation of offspring, their nurture and education are equally important. Parents have both the obligation and the right to see to "the physical, social, cultural, moral, and religious education of their offspring" (c. 1136). This education is to take place in "a family atmosphere so animated with love and reverence for God and others that a well-rounded personal and social development will be fostered among the children."[65] For this reason, Christian parents' efforts to provide for the formation of their children is "truly a 'ministry' of the church at the service of building up her members."[66]

The 1917 code did not speak of the good of the spouses as an end of marriage. It spoke rather of [58] D. 23.2.1: "Marriage is the union of a man and a woman, and a lifelong fellowship (consortium omnis vitae), a sharing of sacred and human law."

[59] Örsy, 51.

[60] Rite of Marriage, 45.

[61] Comm 15 (1983) 222.

[62] See FC 18–21.

[63] See the commentary on cc. 1095 and 1101.

[64] FC 14.

[65] GE 3; FC 36.

[66] FC 38. See also c. 835, §4.

"mutual assistance and the remedy of concupiscence" as the secondary end of marriage.[67] The Second Vatican Council employed the phrase "the good of the spouses," but it used the phrase to explain why the bond of marriage "does not depend on human decision" but is, of its nature, perpetual.[68] In speaking of conjugal love, however, Gaudium et spes taught:

> Fully human as it is, in being willed by one person for another, such love embraces the good of the entire person [totius personae bonum] and is therefore capable of endowing human expressions with a particular dignity and of ennobling them as special features and manifestations of married friendship.[69]

This love embracing the good of the whole person of the spouses prompts their "persevering endeavor to bring each other to the state of perfection."[70]

While canonists agree that the "good of the spouses" is an end of marriage, the relative novelty of the phrase has led them to disagree about how this good fits into the systematic structure of marriage. Some note that, while the Augustinian "goods" identify inherent properties of marriage that make it good, the good of the spouses is an end of marriage or an orientation toward the personal good of the spouses themselves. For them, the good of the spouses includes, but is richer than, the mutual assistance and remedy of concupiscence mentioned in the 1917 code. It "consists in the growth and maturing of the spouses as persons, through the aids, comforts and consolations, but also the demands and hardships, of conjugal life, when lived according to God's plan."[71] As such, the good of the spouses gives rise to a right that marriage be lived out in accord with the three traditional bona, but not to a right whose content is independent of them. Thus, the good of the spouses is reduced to the good that accrues to the parties when the goods of children, fidelity, and sacrament are lived out faithfully in good times and in bad.

Other canonists have objected that such reductionism is contrary to the intent of the code commission and the mainstream of Rotal jurisprudence before and since the promulgation of the revised code. They propose instead that the good of the spouses is a fourth bonum distinct from but complementary to the three traditional "goods" of marriage first articulated by Augustine. For them, the good of the spouses consists in conjugal love and gives rise to the right to a loving relationship.[72]

Those who would reduce the content of the good of the spouses to the commitment to the three traditional "goods" object that conjugal love "cannot be the bonum coniugum, because love is not an end of marriage but an ingredient necessary for marriage to succeed, and a successful marriage is a sign of the achievement of the 'good of the spouses.'"[73] It is certainly true that a successful marriage is hardly imaginable without the presence of genuine love. Nevertheless, the fact that conjugal love is an essential ingredient of a successful marriage does not imply that it cannot also be an end of marriage, something to which marriage is ordered by its very nature. Indeed, the necessity of conjugal love for the success of a marriage suggests that, unless the spouses at least intended from the beginning of their union to give

[67] CIC 1013, §1.

[68] GS 48.

[69] GS 49.

[70] Pius XI, ency Casti connubii, December 30, 1930, AAS 22 (1930) 548. See also Pius XII, alloc, October 29, 1951, AAS 43 (1951) 848–849.

[71] D. Kimengich, The Bonum Coniugum: A Canonical Appraisal (Rome: Pontificium Athenaeum Sanctae Crucis, 1997) 113; C. Burke, "The 'Bonum Coniugum' and the 'Bonum Prolis': Ends or Properties of Marriage?" J 49 (1989) 704–713.

[72] L. Wrenn, "Refining the Essence of Marriage," J 46 (1986) 532–555; L. De Luca, "L'esclusione del bonum coniugum," in La simulazione del consenso matrimoniale canonico, ed. P. Bonnet (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1990) 132–134; S. Villeggiante, "Il bonum coniugum e l'oggetto del consenso matrimoniale in diritto canonico," ME 120 (1995) 295.

[73] Kimengich, 46.

and accept the right to a loving relationship, their union was fundamentally flawed.

Even though the good of children has long been considered an end of marriage, a couple's failure to produce offspring has not been considered a basis for the nullity of their union, unless one or both of them were incapable of completing a sexual act that was at least potentially open to the conception of new life[74] or excluded the other spouse's right to such acts by a positive act of the will.[75] The spouses' post-matrimonial incurrence of impotence or withdrawal of openness to the procreation and education of children in no way affects the validity of consent already elicited. In a similar way, spouses may fail, in fact, to persevere in their love for one another or may become incapable of sustaining a loving relationship with each other. However, if one or both of them were, at the time of the marriage, incapable of appreciating and sustaining a loving relationship even minimally or did not intend to commit themselves to such a relationship, the marriage was invalid. The critical problem for jurisprudence is to establish with some clarity what type and degree of love is necessary for the validity of marriage.[76]

Since the promulgation of the 1983 code, canonical jurisprudence has quietly but steadily gone about the task of elucidating the meaning of the phrase "the good of the spouses" by adjudicating concrete cases in which a spouse's incapacity for marriage has been alleged.[77] Although mainstream jurisprudence has been reluctant to identify the good of the spouses with the right to a loving relationship, it has been more favorable to the position that the good of the spouses, is an end of marriage whose content is distinct from the three traditional goods than to one that would reduce the good of the spouses to a function of the traditional goods. In its insistence that the interpersonal dimension is essential to a valid marriage, jurisprudence has left the door ajar for further precision of the nature of the good of the spouses.

Negatively, the good of the spouses is not to be identified with the spouses' subjective happiness, sense of fulfillment, or achievement of personal aspirations.[78] Nor is the lack of personal harmony between the spouses as a result of their "differences in character, nature, perspective on life, individual sensitivity, grade of particular love,"[79] or other accidental aspects of married life to be equated with incapacity for or exclusion of the good of the spouses. However, the good of the spouses is something more than a "communion of hearth, table and cohabitation."[80]

More positively, the good of the spouses is "the sum of all the goods which flow from the interpersonal relationship of the spouses,"[81] which, "at least as to their substance, bring about and promote the spiritual, intellectual, physical, moral, and social good of the spouses."[82] If this good of the spouses is to be realized, the spouses themselves must enjoy the minimum psychosexual integration "without which . . . the very communion of conjugal life would become impossible."[83] This psychosexual integration presupposes that the spouses possess at least the minimum affective maturity for marriage.[84] They must also have the capacity for and the willingness to engage in gen-

[74] See the commentary on c. 1084.

[75] See the commentary on c. 1101.

[76] See the commentary on c. 1057, §2.

[77] See E. Pfnausch, "The Good of the Spouses in Rotal Jurisprudence: New Horizons?" J 56 (1996) 527–558; and L. De Luca, 125–138. As of this writing, no cases have been decided by the Rota on the ground of the exclusion of the "good of the spouses." Nevertheless, the consensus of canonists is that both the incapacity for the good of the spouses and its exclusion by a positive act of the will result in the nullity of marriage.

[78] Coram Pompedda, April 11, 1988, SRRDec 80 (1988) 201.

[79] Coram Colagiovanni, February 2, 1988, SRRDec 80 (1988) 47–48.

[80] Coram Bruno, July 19, 1991, SRRDec 83 (1991) 465.

[81] Ibid., 466.

[82] Coram Bruno, December 17, 1987, SRRDec 79 (1987) 765.

[83] Coram Stankiewicz, May 28, 1991, SRRDec 83 (1991) 347–348.

[84] Coram Bruno, December 16, 1988, SRRDec 80 (1988) 748.

uine interpersonal communication,[85] to establish a mutually satisfactory sexual relationship,[86] and to establish at least a minimally "tolerable" personal relationship.[87]

The Sacrament of Matrimony

The Council of Trent capped a long development by defining as a dogma of the faith the proposition that marriage is "truly and properly one of the seven sacraments of the evangelical law, instituted by Christ the Lord."[88] It is precisely the natural institution of marriage, the partnership of the whole of life brought about by the spouses' consent, that Christ raised to sacramental dignity. Although marriage as a natural institution had existed since the beginning of time, Jesus Christ "merited for us by his passion the grace that would perfect natural love, strengthen the unbreakable unity and sanctify the spouses."[89] Four hundred years later, the Second Vatican Council returned to the Council of Trent's teaching on the very human love of the spouses, expressed in their consent and lived out in their daily lives, as the sign of the sacrament of matrimony: "Genuine married love is taken up into the divine love and is directed and endowed by the redeeming power of Christ and the saving action of the Church, so that married couples may be successfully led to God and be helped and strengthened in their noble task as father and mother."[90]

In short, in the marriages of Christians, the spouses' love for one another becomes the vehicle through which the faithful and irrevocable love of God in Jesus Christ becomes visible and tangible.

> The love and faithfulness existing between Christ and his Church is therefore not simply an image or example of marriage, nor is the self-giving of man and wife an image and likeness of Christ's giving of himself to the Church. The love that exists between man and wife is rather a sign that makes the reality present, in other words, an epiphany of the love and faithfulness of God that was given once and for all time in Jesus Christ and is made present in the Church.[91]

By their efforts to love one another faithfully and perpetually, husband and wife slowly and sometimes painfully struggle to rise above the narcissistic alienation from self, others, and God, which is the condition of sin-wounded humanity. In this way, they participate in the Church's own mission of being "a sort of sacrament or sign of intimate union with God, and of the unity of all mankind . . . [and] an instrument for the achievement of such union and unity."[92] As a result, the family can be called "the domestic church,"[93] the tiniest but most essential cell of the Body of Christ which is the Church.

As a result of its emphasis on the consent of the spouses as the efficient cause of marriage, the Latin church has come to see the spouses themselves as the ministers of the sacrament of matrimony. The sacred minister present for the exchange of consent functions primarily as an official witness who asks for and receives the spouses' consent in the name of the Church (c. 1108, §2). In the Eastern churches, both Catholic and non-Catholic, however, it is the assisting priest who is the minister of the sacrament. While the spouses' consent is essential, it is not sufficient. From an Eastern perspective, it is hard to imagine how a marriage could be considered a sacrament without the priestly blessing. Thus, it is somewhat anomalous that the Eastern code makes provision for mar-

[85] Ibid., 746–749.

[86] Coram Colagiovanni, February 2, 1988, SRRDec 80 (1988) 49; coram Stankiewicz, April 20, 1989, SRRDec 81 (1989) 289; coram Bruno, July 19, 1991, SRRDec 83(1991) 472.

[87] Coram Stankiewicz, April 20, 1989, SRRDec 81 (1989) 280–293.

[88] Council of Trent, sess. XXIV, de doctrina, c. 1.

[89] Ibid., doctrina de sacramento matrimonii.

[90] GS 48.

[91] W. Kasper, Theology of Christian Marriage (New York: Seabury, 1980) 30.

[92] LG 1.

[93] LG 11.

riage according to the extraordinary form without the presence of a priest (CCEO 832, §1)[94] and for dispensations from the obligation of observing the form of marriage (CCEO 835). This seems to be an instance of the "Latinization" of the Eastern discipline.

The Sacramental Character of All Marriages of the Baptized

§2. For this reason, a valid matrimonial contract cannot exist between the baptized without it being by that fact a sacrament.[95]

The affirmation that marriage among baptized Christians has been raised by Christ to the dignity of a sacrament does not necessarily entail that, in the marriages of the baptized, the marital contract and the marital sacrament are so inseparably joined that the one cannot exist without the other. In fact, many fathers of the Council of Trent could support the imposition of a mandatory form for entering marriage because they believed that the marital contract and the sacrament were not only distinct but separable. Although they denied that the Church had any authority to alter the essence of the sacrament (i.e., the consent of the parties) as it had been instituted by Christ, they held that the Church did have the competence to regulate marriage insofar as it was a human contract. The principle that the marital contract and the marital sacrament were separable received support in diverse ways from reputable theologians from Duns Scotus to Alphonsus Liguori.[96]

The position that the inseparability of marital contract and marital sacrament is grounded in the will of Christ was most clearly articulated by Robert Bellarmine. He pointed out that neither revelation nor the magisterium specifies the matter, form, and minister of the sacrament of marriage. This silence has two possible explanations: either the matter, form, and minister of the sacrament are identical with those of the contract or marriage is not a sacrament. Since it is a dogma of the faith that marriage is a sacrament, Bellarmine concluded, the contract and the sacrament must be identical.[97] Bellarmine's argument was adopted (and adapted) by Suarez and Sanchez.[98]

The position that the contract and the sacrament were inseparable eventually gained the support of the Church's magisterium for reasons that were as much political as theological. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, royalists and secularists exploited the alleged distinction between the marital contract and the sacrament to contest the Church's exclusive jurisdiction over marriage. The Church reacted to this attempt to usurp its jurisdiction over marriage by asserting ever more vehemently the inseparability of contract and sacrament in the marriages of the baptized. This conflict during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries is the backdrop for the assertion of canon 1055, §2 that "a valid matrimonial contract cannot exist between the baptized without it being by that fact a sacrament."

The participants in the debate of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries shared a common, albeit implicit, assumption—that the baptized who married possessed at least a scintilla of living faith. However, the discussion of the separability of the marital contract and the marital sacrament has reemerged in recent years because of a less political and more theological concern, the phenomenon of baptized unbelievers. If, as the Rite of Marriage insists, "the sacrament of matrimony presupposes and demands faith,"[99] it has been asked, are those who, although baptized, lack even a semblance of faith capable of giving and receiving the sacrament of matrimony?[100]

[94] See the commentary on c. 1116.

[95] Cf. CCEO 776, §2.

[96] C. Caffarra, "Marriage as a Reality in the Order of Creation and Marriage as a Sacrament," in Contemporary Perspectives on Christian Marriage, ed. R. Malone and J. Connery (Chicago: Loyola University, 1984) 119–132.

[97] Ibid., 127.

[98] Ibid., 127–130.

[99] Rite of Marriage, 7.

[100] For a discussion of this issue, see W. Cuenin, "The Marriage of Baptized Non-believers: Questions of Faith,

The International Theological Commission has answered this question in the negative. While insisting that the question of the spouses' intention with regard to marriage should not be confused with that of their personal faith, the commission acknowledged that the two issues "must not be totally separated either."[101] The commission concluded:

> In the last analysis the real intention is born from and feeds from living faith. Where there is no trace of faith (in the sense of "belief"—being disposed to believe), and no desire for grace and salvation is found, then a real doubt arises as to whether there is the above-mentioned and truly sacramental intention and whether the contracted marriage is validly contracted or not.[102]

The recognition that a total absence of faith can vitiate the spouses' sacramental intention and render their marital consent invalid has led some to ask a further question: how much faith is necessary for a genuinely sacramental intention? The response of the magisterium to this question has been cautious. John Paul II asserts:

> As for wishing to lay down further criteria for admission to the ecclesial celebration of marriage, criteria that would concern the level of faith of those to be married, this would above all involve grave risks. In the first place, the risk of making unfounded and discriminatory judgments; second, the risk of causing doubts about the validity of marriages already celebrated, with grave harm to Christian communities and new and unjustified anxieties to the consciences of married couples; one would also fall into the danger of calling into question the sacramental nature of many marriages of brethren separated from full communion with the Catholic Church, thus contradicting ecclesial tradition.[103]

Despite these prudential cautions, John Paul II acknowledges that, when even the best efforts of pastoral ministers to awaken a semblance of living faith in a couple preparing for marriage fail, "the pastor of souls cannot admit them to the celebration of marriage."[104]

While the reflections of the International Theological Commission and Pope John Paul II contain much pastoral wisdom, they fail to resolve a troubling problem resulting from the Church's teaching, enshrined in canon 1055, §2, that the marital contract and the marital sacrament are inseparable in the marriages of the baptized. If the total absence of faith in one or both parties to a marriage prevents them from entering a sacramental marriage, it also prevents them from entering a valid marriage. This unintended consequence of the insistence on the inseparability of marital contract and marital sacrament for the baptized means that "baptized non-believers" forfeit their natural right to marry as a result of their lack of faith. Since they lack faith, baptized Sacrament and Law," CLSAP 40 (1978) 38–48; R. Cunningham, "Marriage and the Nescient Catholic: Questions of Faith and Sacrament," Stud Can 15 (1981) 263–284; L. Örsy, "Faith, Marriage, Contract, and Christian Marriage: Disputed Questions," TS 43 (1982) 379–398; Denis Baudot, L'inséparabilité entre le contrat et le sacrement de mariage: La discussion après le Concile Vatican II, Analecta Gregoriana 245 (Rome: Editrice Pontificia Università Gregoriana, 1987); M. Pompedda, "Faith and the Sacrament of Marriage—Lack of Faith and Matrimonial Consent—Juridical Aspects," in Marriage Studies IV, ed. J. Alesandro (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1990) 33–65; D. Faltin, "The Exclusion of the Sacramentality of Marriage with Particular Reference to the Marriage of Baptized Nonbelievers," in Marriage Studies IV, 66–104; M. Himes, "The Intrinsic Sacramentality of Marriage: The Theological Ground for the Inseparability of Validity and Sacramentality in Marriage," J 50 (1990) 198–220; M. Lawler, "Faith, Contract and Sacrament in Christian Marriage: A Theological Approach," TS 52 (1991) 712–731.

[101] International Theological Commission, "Propositions on the Doctrine of Christian Marriage," 2.3, Origins 8 (1978–1979) 237.

[102] Ibid.

[103] FC 68.

[104] Ibid.

unbelievers cannot enter a sacramental marriage; but, since they are baptized, they cannot have a valid marriage that is not a sacrament. As the International Theological Commission notes somewhat obliquely, "This gives rise to new problems for which a satisfactory answer has yet to be found."[105]

The Essential Properties of Marriage

Canon 1056 — The essential properties of marriage are unity and indissolubility, which in Christian marriage obtain a special firmness by reason of the sacrament.[106]

Unlike the ends of marriage, the essential properties of marriage (c. 1056) are not goals external to marriage but qualities inherent in the institution of marriage itself. These properties inhere in any genuine marriage independently of the will or intention of the partners. Unity and indissolubility are considered by the Church to be properties of marriage in virtue of the natural law. Thus, they are properties of all marriages and not just those of Christians. However, in the marriages of the baptized, these properties "obtain a special firmness by reason of the sacrament."

To say that unity is a property of marriage means that marriage is an exclusive relationship between one man and one woman. In marriage, a man and a woman mutually give and accept each other. To include anyone else within this privileged sphere of marital intimacy violates the unity proper to marriage. Thus, traditionally canonists have scored polygamy, whether simultaneous or serial, as violative of the unity of marriage. However, postconciliar reflection on marriage as a consortium of the whole of life has led to the recognition that violations of the unity of marriage need not involve extramarital sexual relationships. For example, a man may marry to have a wife for sexual relations, children, and companionship, but continue an unhealthily "close emotional relationship to his mother after marriage with even daily visits, frequent telephone conversations, dependence in decision making, sharing intimate aspects of marital life, often unknown to his wife."[107] In such a case, the man may be judged to have violated the unity of marriage.

To say that marriage is indissoluble means that it is a perpetual relationship which not only should not be terminated but cannot be terminated, even if the couple's existential relationship is irretrievably broken. Canonical tradition distinguishes between the intrinsic and extrinsic indissolubility of marriage.[108] All marriages, whether the spouses are baptized or not, are intrinsically indissoluble. That is, once the marriage is validly entered, it cannot be dissolved by the subsequent withdrawal of consent of the parties. A marriage is extrinsically indissoluble when it cannot be dissolved either by the intervention of external authorities or by the realization of certain conditions. While the Church does not recognize the power of civil authorities to dissolve marriages, it does claim the authority, under certain conditions, to dissolve non-sacramental marriages involving at least one unbaptized person and sacramental marriages that have not been consummated.[109] Thus, current church law considers only sacramental marriages that have been consummated to be extrinsically indissoluble by any cause except death.[110]

Matrimonial Consent

Canon 1057 — §1. The consent of the parties, legitimately manifested between persons qualified by law, makes marriage; no human power is able to supply this consent.[111]

[105] International Theological Commission, 2.3, 237.
[106] Cf. CCEO 776, §3.

[107] E. Pfnausch, "Simulated Consent: A New Way of Looking at an Old Way of Thinking—Part II," J 55 (1995) 727.
[108] Cappello, n. 45; Gasparri, nn. 1122–1127; Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 27.
[109] See the commentary on cc. 1142–1150.
[110] See the commentary on c. 1141.
[111] Cf. CCEO 817.

The linchpin of the canon law governing marriage is the principle, derived from Roman law and reinforced by the decretals of twelfth century popes, that "consent not cohabitation makes a marriage."[112] So firmly is this principle rooted in canonical tradition that it has been cited by distinguished canonists as a matter of divine law.[113] Consent is not only an indispensable element of marriage but the efficient cause that brings marriage into being. As a result, no human power can supply for the absence of consent by one or both parties. Moreover, since consent is the essence of marriage, a marriage invalid because of an impediment or lack of form can be convalidated without renewal of consent by a radical sanation as long as the naturally sufficient consent originally given has continued.[114]

Even if it is naturally sufficient to bring about marriage, consent fails to achieve its juridic effect of bringing about an actual marriage unless it is exchanged between persons who are "qualified by law." The law has established a number of impediments to marriage which disqualify persons either from any marriage (e.g., the impediment arising from sacred orders) or from particular marriages (e.g., the impediment of consanguinity).[115] In addition, to be qualified for marriage, persons must possess at least the minimal psychological capacity to establish and nurture an intimate partnership of life, sufficient knowledge of the nature of this partnership, and the intention to undertake it. If these psychological, intellectual, or volitional requirements are lacking, a person's consent is deficient and fails to give rise to a marriage.[116]

For matrimonial consent to achieve its intended juridic effect, it must be legitimately manifested. Although consent itself is an internal act imperceptible to the senses, the social significance of the institution of marriage requires that it be given some public expression. For Latin Catholics, legitimate manifestation of consent normally entails the observance of the canonical form[117] or, in the case of Eastern Catholics, of the prescribed sacred rite.[118] Although consent alone is naturally sufficient to constitute marriage, unbaptized persons are bound to the observance of any civilly prescribed form for entering marriage.[119]

The Latin code is silent about the form for entering marriage that binds baptized non-Catholics when they marry one another. However, canon 781, 2° of the Eastern code stipulates that, when the Catholic Church judges marriage cases involving two baptized non-Catholics, it > recognizes any form prescribed or admitted by the law to which the parties were subject at the time of the celebration of the marriage, provided that the consent be expressed in a public form and, when at least one of the parties is a baptized member of an Eastern non-Catholic Church, the marriage be celebrated with a sacred rite.

If this prescription of the Eastern code is supplementary law for the Latin church (c. 19),[120] baptized non-Catholics are always bound to manifest their consent according to some public form. Moreover, they are obliged to observe the form of marriage prescribed by the law of their church or ecclesial community, if it has one, or that to which their church or ecclesial community defers.[121] Thus, Eastern non-Catholics are bound to marry according to their church's sacred rite which includes the priestly blessing and Protestants, whose churches generally defer to the authority of the State in matrimonial matters, are bound by the form prescribed by civil law.

[112] D. 35.1.15.

[113] Cappello, n. 573; Gasparri, n. 775; Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 451.

[114] See the commentary on cc. 1161–1165.

[115] See the commentary on cc. 1073, 1083–1094.

[116] See the commentary on cc. 1095–1107.

[117] See the commentary on cc. 1108–1123.

[118] See CCEO 828–842.

[119] Cappello, n. 78; Gasparri, nn. 240–246; Wernz-Vidal, 5: nn. 67–73.

[120] See J. Abbass, "Canonical Interpretation by Recourse to 'Parallel Passages': A Comparative Study of the Latin and Eastern Code," J 51 (1991) 296–298.

[121] CCEO 780, §2, 1°–2°.

Canon law, with its almost exclusive focus on the moment of the spouses' personal consent when marriage is constituted, is not easily harmonized with the marriage customs of cultures which envisage marriage as coming about in progressive stages and recognize a significant role for parents and other family members in "consent" to marriage. On the one hand, the Church's insistence on the principle that "consent makes a marriage" is often perceived as a manifestation of a cultural imperialism that denigrates traditional customs. On other hand, uncritical accommodation to traditional customs can lead to uncertainty about the status of couples who are on the continuum leading toward marriage and compromise the freedom of the spouses themselves. It seems unlikely that a genuine inculturation of the Church's law on marriage in traditional cultures can be achieved without some willingness on the part of the Church to soften its position on the exclusive role of the personal consent of the parties in effecting marriage.

§2. Matrimonial consent is an act of the will by which a man and a woman mutually give and accept each other through an irrevocable covenant in order to establish marriage.

The definition of matrimonial consent as "an act of the will" reflects the code's reliance on the rational psychology originated by Aristotle, Christianized by the Scholastic theologians, especially Thomas Aquinas, in the Middle Ages, and enshrined as the privileged vehicle for communicating Catholic doctrine at least since the neo-Scholastic revival of the nineteenth century. According to this traditional system, the human soul consists of two rational faculties or "proximate or immediate principles of mental operations":[122] the intellect, whose purpose is to discern the truth, and the will, whose purpose is to pursue the good.

Since the will is essentially a blind faculty which can choose only what is proposed to it by the intellect, the two faculties are reciprocally related and play complementary roles in every genuinely human act, such as the act of matrimonial consent. Nevertheless, Scholastic philosophy and the ecclesiastical jurisprudence based on it has not always adverted sufficiently to this essential complementarity, but has sometimes succumbed to "an exaggerated objectification of the faculties."[123] When the intellect and will are objectified and dichotomized, jurisprudence loses sight of the essential unity of the human person, and its findings are not easily harmonized with those of contemporary empirical psychology. While one cannot understand the code's presentation of matrimonial consent without a rudimentary grasp of Scholastic rational psychology, an adequate understanding of consent also requires an appreciation of modern behavioral sciences. "Matrimonial consent is in fact much more than a mere act of the will. Everything in a human psyche contributes to it in varying degrees."[124]

Matrimonial consent is an act of the will exchanged between "a man and a woman." The phrase "a man and a woman" replaces the phrase "both parties" of canon 1081, §2 of the 1917 code. The change was prompted by a desire to underscore the personal dimension of consent. Consent is no longer exchanged by impersonal contractants but between a concrete man and a concrete woman for the purpose of establishing an irrevocable covenant. This phrasing is also closer to classical Roman law definitions of marriage by Modestinus[125] and Ulpian,[126] both of which speak of "a man and a woman." There is no evidence that this phrasing was meant to respond to the contemporary phenomenon of "same sex marriages." Nevertheless, the new wording does suggest that an exchange of consent between persons of the same sex is not truly "marital," and does not, therefore, give rise even to the semblance of marriage.

[122] J. Donceel, Philosophical Psychology (New York: Sheed and Ward, 1961) 99.

[123] Ibid., 318.

[124] Örsy, Marriage in Canon Law, 63.

[125] D. 23.2.1.

[126] Inst. 1.9.1.

Canon 1081, §2 of the 1917 code specified the formal object of matrimonial consent (i.e., what the parties mutually gave and accepted) as "the perpetual and exclusive right to the body ordered to acts per se apt for the generation of offspring," a formulation that was susceptible to, and often received, a primarily biological interpretation. Vatican II attempted to transcend this narrowly biological understanding of the object of matrimonial consent by describing it as "that human act whereby spouses mutually bestow and accept each other (sese mutuo tradunt atque accipiunt)."[127] This conciliar formulation has been incorporated into the revised code.

Both the conciliar articulation of the object of matrimonial consent and its canonical formulation have been criticized as overly pastoral and insufficiently juridical in nature.[128] It is certainly true that the spouses' mutual giving and accepting of each other "cannot mean a total surrender of all human faculties annihilating the spouses' sense of autonomy fundamental to human dignity."[129] Nevertheless, the oblative self-donation of the spouses in matrimonial consent, which was stressed in Gaudium et spes and has continued to be underscored by the papal magisterium,[130] cannot be reduced to the right to the body for acts per se apt for the generation of children. Indeed, this right to the body is "a real symbol of the giving of the whole person."[131] For the spouses to give themselves and accept one another in the act of matrimonial consent, they must have the capacity for and the intention to establish a genuine interpersonal relationship, characterized by fidelity and steadfastness "in good times and in bad" and ordered to "the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring" (c. 1055, §1). Thus, the spouses must have the minimal capacity for and willingness to give themselves to one another not only physically but also emotionally and spiritually and to accept the other as a unique and equal partner.

In giving and accepting each other, the spouses themselves are what the Scholastics called the material object of matrimonial consent. They give and accept one another, however, not in an unqualified way, but "in order to establish marriage." The somewhat tautological phrase "to establish marriage" expresses the formal object of matrimonial consent. The phrase encompasses the whole complex of specifically marital rights and obligations that arise from the conjugal partnership of the whole of life. Although efforts have been made to identify these rights and obligations, no exhaustive listing yet exists. It will be the ongoing task of jurisprudence to undertake the painstaking task of articulating these rights and obligations.

The emphasis on conjugal love in Gaudium et spes, Humanae vitae, and Familiaris consortio has prompted the question whether love is an essential dimension of matrimonial consent. Since the question first was posed in the postconciliar period, the magisterium and ecclesiastical jurisprudence have consistently rejected the notion that romantic or erotic love is essential for valid matrimonial consent.[132] Such love is not a juridic element of marriage, but it is important as "a kind of force of the psychological order" without which "the spouses lack the strong inducement for carrying out with mutual sincerity all the tasks and duties of the conjugal community."[133] Indeed, at least in Western cultures where a genuine marriage can scarcely be conceived without the presence of romantic love, the absence of such love at [128] See U. Navarrete, "Structura iuridica matrimonii secundum Concilium Vaticanum II," P 57 (1968) 137–142; and C. Scicluna, The Essential Definition of Marriage according to the 1917 and 1983 Codes of Canon Law (Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1995) 292–295.

[127] GS 48.

[129] Scicluna, 167.

[130] See Paul VI, ency Humanae vitae, July 27, 1968, §8, AAS 60 (1968) 485–487; and FC 11.

[131] FC 80.

[132] See Paul VI, alloc, February 9, 1976, AAS 68 (1976) 206–207; CLD 8, 794. See also ApSig, decision, November 29, 1975, Apol 49 (1976) 31–48; CLD 8, 768–790.

[133] Paul VI, alloc, February 9, 1976, AAS 68 (1976) 207; CLD 8, 794.

the time of consent may give rise to a strong presumption that one or both parties did not intend a permanent union.[134]

In its most basic sense, however, "love" is not a mere subjective disposition, infatuation, or erotic inclination, but an act of the will. In fact, as Saint Thomas noted, "this is to love someone: to wish him or her good."[135] Matrimonial consent must will the good of the other spouse in this fundamental sense and must, therefore, be an act of love. Indeed, "unless this act of the will, which is essentially self-donative—and, hence, an act of love—is elicited, marriage is not entered into."[136] In this sense, love is essential to the formation of marriage. Thus, in the infamous hypothetical case proposed by Jemolo,[137] the marriage of a man who married with the intention to be open to children, to be faithful, and to enter a perpetual union but also with the intention, as part of a family vendetta, to make his wife's life absolutely miserable, would be invalid, because he "substituted hate" for loving mutual self-donation in his consent.[138]

Despite frequent assertions that "conjugal love is not included in the province of law,"[139] there does seem to be an emerging consensus that conjugal love does have juridic relevance, at least insofar as it is an essential dimension of the dynamic of mutual giving and accepting that is matrimonial consent.[140] Nevertheless, those who recognize the juridic relevance of conjugal love tend so to emphasize its oblative character that it seems reduced to mere impersonal benevolence or goodwill which Saint Thomas called the "beginning of friendship."[141] Such a one-sided emphasis on the oblative or "giving" dimension of conjugal love overlooks another essential dimension suggested in the revised code's emphasis that in matrimonial consent the spouses "mutually give and accept each other."

Wrenn proposes that the love necessary for matrimonial consent is "an affective tendency toward another person which is dialogical in nature and involves union with the other."[142] According to Aquinas, love is a function of the appetitive faculty[143] and one of the soul's passions,[144] but a passion that remains under the command of the will[145] and tends inexorably toward union of affection.[146] Love involves an ongoing "give and take." As Wrenn explains:

> These two poles were called by Aquinas amor concupiscentiae and amor benevolentiae, which Karl Rahner translates as love of desire and love of generosity. Love of desire, as the term implies, involves desiring the other as a source of legitimate self-fulfillment, whereas love of generosity involves wanting the best for one's beloved for one's beloved's own sake. In all healthy human love, however, both poles coexist and are more or less constantly active.[147]

Jurisprudence has, however, been slow to recognize a right to a loving relationship as an essential element of a valid marriage, perhaps because a thing as many splendored as love does not fit neatly into the inherited contractual model.

[134] Coram Palazzini, June 2, 1971, SRRDec 63 (1971) 473–474.

[135] Thomas Aquinas, STh, I-II, q. 77, a. 4.

[136] ApSig, decision, November 29, 1975, Apol 49 (1976) 42; CLD 8, 782.

[137] A. C. Jemolo, Il matrimonio nel diritto canonico (Milan: Casa Editrice Dr. Francesco Vallardi, 1941) 76.

[138] ApSig, decision, November 29, 1975, Apol 49 (1976) 43; CLD 8, 783.

[139] Paul VI, alloc, February 9, 1976, AAS 68 (1976) 206–207; CLD 8, 794.

[140] In addition to the aforementioned 1976 allocution of Paul VI and the 1975 decree of the Apostolic Signatura, see Navarrete, 208; Z. Grocholewski, "De 'communione vitae' in novo schemate 'De matrimonio' et de momento iuridico amoris coniugalis," P 68 (1979) 469.

[141] Thomas Aquinas, STh, II-II, q. 27, art. 2, sed contra.

[142] L. Wrenn, "Refining the Essence of Marriage," J 46 (1986) 543.

[143] Thomas Aquinas, STh, I-II, q. 26, art. 1.

[144] Ibid., q. 26, art. 2.

[145] See, e.g., ibid., q. 26, art. 1–2.

[146] Ibid., q. 28, art. 1.

[147] Wrenn, "Refining the Essence of Marriage," 544–545.

The Right to Marry

Canon 1058 — All persons who are not prohibited by law can contract marriage.[148]

Every person enjoys the natural right to marry. This fundamental right is rooted in the social nature of the human person and is recognized by Catholic social teaching.[149] Therefore, the right to marry and to marry freely must be respected by both civil and ecclesiastical authority. Marriage is not, however, a merely private matter that concerns only the spouses themselves. It is also a societal institution whose health and vitality have a significant impact on the common good. Consequently, civil and ecclesiastical authorities have the right to regulate the exercise of the right to marry in the interest of the common good.[150]

A traditional way of regulating the exercise of the right to marry is the establishment of impediments that preclude certain marriages which experience has shown are inimical to the stability of marriage itself or to basic community values.[151] Since impediments impinge on the natural right to marry, they may be legitimately established only when the dangers posed by these marriages genuinely threaten the common good. The Church has attempted to prevent the hasty and unconsidered introduction of impediments by reserving to the supreme authority of the Church the competence to declare what are divine law impediments and to enact ecclesiastical law impediments (c. 1075). The Church also makes provision for dispensations from ecclesiastical law impediments when adequate precautions have been taken to prevent the dangers threatened by certain marriages (cc. 1078–1080).

[148] Cf. CCEO 778.

[149] See John XXIII, ency Pacem in terris, 1963, §15; and GS §26.

[150] Canon 223, §2.

[151] See the commentary on cc. 1073 and 1075.

The Church's Authority over Marriage

Canon 1059 — Even if only one party is Catholic, the marriage of Catholics is governed not only by divine law but also by canon law, without prejudice to the competence of civil authority concerning the merely civil effects of the same marriage.[152]

All marriages, whether they involve a Catholic spouse or not, are governed by what the Church teaches to be the divine law. Thus, baptized non-Catholics and unbaptized persons, even when they marry among themselves, are bound by the canonical norms defining the nature and ends of marriage (c. 1055, §1), its essential properties (c. 1056), and the necessity and nature of matrimonial consent (c. 1057), since these norms are considered to derive from natural law. For the same reason, non-Catholics also enjoy the natural right to marry (c. 1058) and, once they have legitimately entered marriage, their unions are presumed to be valid (c. 1060). They are also bound by other norms of the code (e.g., certain impediments) that are considered to be founded in divine law.

Throughout history, the Church has accepted the human laws of various nations, especially those of imperial Rome, and has enacted its own laws to regulate the marriages of its members. Canon 1016 of the 1917 code bound all baptized persons, whether they were Catholic or not, to the observance of these merely ecclesiastical marriage laws, unless the law expressly exempted them.[153] By contrast, canon 11 of the revised code [152] The originally promulgated version of the revised code and the original CLSA translation had read, "even if only one party is baptized [etsi una tantum pars sit baptizata]." This error was subsequently corrected by the Holy See. Acta Ioannis Pauli PPII, "Codex Iuris Canonici," AAS 75 (1983) 324. This emended version of the canon is also found in CCEO 780, §1.

[153] This canon practically applied CIC 12, which subjected all the baptized to merely ecclesiastical laws, unless they were expressly exempted. The 1917 code did exempt baptized non-Catholics from the impediment of exempts baptized non-Catholics from the observance of merely ecclesiastical laws, including those governing marriage, when they marry other non-Catholics. However, canon 1059 stipulates an exception to this exemption of non-Catholics from the observance of ecclesiastical laws. Non-Catholics, whether baptized or not, are bound by ecclesiastical marriage laws when they marry Catholics.

The revised code has introduced the category of persons who were once baptized in or received into full communion with the Catholic Church, but who subsequently left it by a formal act.[154] Although such persons may consider themselves non-Catholics and even be popularly considered to be no longer Catholics, their leaving the Church by a formal act does not exempt them from the observance of ecclesiastical laws, unless the law expressly provides the contrary. The law exempts those who have left the Catholic Church by a formal act from only three ecclesiastical laws. They are not bound by the regulations for mixed marriage (1124), the impediment of disparity of worship (c. 1086, §1), and the obligation of observing the canonical form of marriage (c. 1117).

Since the Church considers the marital sacrament and the marital contract to be inseparable, it does not recognize the State's competence to regulate marriage itself when it involves a Catholic. Nevertheless, the Church does normally encourage the faithful to observe the prescriptions of civil law regarding marriage when they are reasonable and designed to promote the common good. Thus, it usually insists that Catholics comply with civil laws governing such issues as matrimonial impediments, obtaining a marriage license, and the form to be observed when celebrating marriage. The Church, however, reserves the right to ignore such laws if they are contrary to divine law or unreasonably restrict the freedom of Catholics to marry.[155]

The Church defers to the authority of the State over the "merely civil effects" of the marriages of Catholics. These merely civil effects are those that do not necessarily flow from the essence of marriage, such as conjugal rights and obligations, the unity and indissolubility of the bond, the legitimacy of children, and the mutual rights and responsibilities of parents and children. The merely civil effects of marriage, which fall within the proper competence of the State, include such things as inheritance rights, tax status, and other civil rights, obligations, and privileges based on marital status.

The marriages of the unbaptized are governed by laws enacted by civil authority, provided that these are not contrary to divine law and do not unreasonably abridge the right to marry.[156] Thus, the unbaptized are bound by the impediments and form for entering marriage required by civil law. The 1983 code frees baptized non-Catholics from the obligations of observing merely ecclesiastical marriage laws when they marry among themselves, but it makes no explicit provision for the regulation of these marriages by any other law, except, of course, divine law.

The provisions of divine law concerning marriage are relatively few, however. The health and stability of the institution of marriage are so important to the public good of society that it seems anomalous that the marriages of baptized non-Catholics should be subject to no additional positive legislation whatsoever. It seems equally anomalous that the sacramental marriages of baptized non-Catholics should be directly and immediately subject to the regulatory authority of the secular State. The only alternative is that the marriages of baptized non-Catholics be subject to the laws of the churches or ecclesial communities to which these Christians belong. This, at least, is the soludisparity of worship (CIC 1070, §1) and from the obligation of observing the canonical form of marriage (CIC 1099, §2).

[154] For a discussion of leaving the Catholic Church "by a formal act," see the commentary on c. 1117.

[155] See the commentary on cc. 1130–1133. See also Cappello, n. 69.

[156] See Cappello, nn. 75–81; Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 67.

tion of the Eastern code.[157] Baptized non-Catholics are bound by the marriage laws of their church or ecclesial community, if it has its own law, or by the law to which their church defers, if it lacks a proper law. Thus, baptized non-Catholics are subject indirectly and mediately to civil marriage law if their church or ecclesial community lacks a proper law but defers to the State for marriage regulations.[158]

The Favor of the Law

Canon 1060 — Marriage possesses the favor of law; therefore, in a case of doubt, the validity of a marriage must be upheld until the contrary is proven.[159]

Once it has been properly celebrated, a marriage is presumed to be valid unless the contrary is proven. When doubts are raised about its validity, this presumption requires that the validity of the marriage be upheld by refusing to allow the celebration of a new marriage until the invalidity or dissolution of the previous union has been demonstrated legitimately and certainly according to the norm of law (c. 1085, §2). This legal presumption is a "favor" accorded to marriage by the Church's law.

Although the law presumes the validity of marriage once it is properly celebrated, the fact that it was celebrated is not presumed, but must be proven. According to traditional commentators, however, the favor of the law also extends to a marriage whose celebration cannot be demonstrated with certainty but which is "in possession." A marriage is considered "in possession" when the parties in good faith consider themselves to be married and are commonly considered to be married by others in the community.[160] Both when a marriage has been properly celebrated and when it is in peaceful possession, the presumption of its validity is a simple one, which cedes to contrary proof.

This presumption of validity is a particular application of the general principle of law that "a juridic act placed correctly with respect to its external elements is presumed valid" (c. 124, §2). The presumption is considered necessary from the viewpoint of the community to protect the stability of marriage against all the more or less well-founded reasons that can be used to call the validity of any marriage into question. It is also considered necessary from the viewpoint of couples to prevent possible doubts of overscrupulous spouses about the validity of their marriages from discouraging them from dedicating themselves to salvaging difficult marriages and carrying out their marital obligations.

In its earliest formulation by Innocent III,[161] the presumption of validity was meant to favor an existing marriage's claim to legitimacy when doubts about its validity surfaced because of a possible impediment. The validity of the existing marriage was to be upheld until its nullity had been certainly proved. At the present time, however, the effect of the favor of the law has been reversed. The presumption now favors the marriage that has, existentially at least, ceased over an existing subse-

[157] CCEO 780, §2, 1°–2°.

[158] A similar argument was advanced by commentators on the 1917 code to establish that the non-baptized, who were not subject to ecclesiastical laws of the Catholic Church, were bound by civil law. See Cappello, n. 76; Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 70. Although these commentators were loath to recognize any authority other than the Catholic Church and the State as competent to regulate marriage, in the more ecumenical climate of the post-conciliar era with its recognition of the existence of many elements of the Church of Christ outside the boundaries of the Catholic Church (UR 3), it is no longer unthinkable that non-Catholic churches and ecclesial communities might legitimately regulate the marriage of their members. In fact, the Catholic recognition that the diriment impediment of mixed religion enacted by the Council of Trullo had been abrogated implicitly (ApSig, decision, July 1, 1972, CLD 8, 3–29) acknowledged the existence of some legislative authority over marriage in the Orthodox churches. See the commentary on cc. 1124–1129.

[159] Cf. CCEO 779.

[160] Cappello, n. 51; Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 44; Gasparri, n. 18.

[161] X, 2.20.47.

quent marriage in peaceful possession.[162] In addition, the presumption is at odds with the general principle that doubtful laws, contracts, and moral obligations do not oblige.[163]

Most commentators on the 1917 code held that the presumption favoring the validity of marriage was rooted in divine law.[164] During the code revision process, suggestions that this traditional presumption be modified at least implicitly questioned its divine law character. Justifying its refusal to modify the norm, the code commission asserted: "Although it is not of divine law itself, it is founded on the fundamental properties of marriage."[165] Since the presumption articulated in canon 1060 is applicable not only to the marriages of Catholics but also to those of non-Catholics, whether baptized or not, and since it is generally considered to bind in both the internal and the external fora, it is clearly something more than a merely ecclesiastical law or a procedural norm binding tribunal personnel.

While most commentators concentrate on the presumption of validity of a properly celebrated marriage as the "favor" accorded marriage by the law, there are various other ways in which the law favors marriage. The children of marriages enjoying the presumption of validity are considered legitimate, even if the marriage is subsequently proven to be invalid (c. 1137). The favor of the law toward marriage can also be seen in procedural law: a marriage whose validity is challenged is represented by its own attorney, the defender of the bond (c. 1432); marriage nullity cases are normally reserved to panels of at least three judges (c. 1425, §1, 1°); and affirmative decisions in marriage nullity cases must at least be reviewed and confirmed by a second and independent tribunal before the parties are free to remarry (c. 1684).

[162] R. Thrasher, "Canon 1014 and the External Forum and Internal Forum Solutions: An Update," in Marriage Studies I, ed. T. Doyle (Toledo, Ohio: CLSA, 1980) 146.

[163] See, e.g., cc. 14; 1084, §2; 1086, §3. But, on the contrary, see c. 1091, §4.

[164] Cappello, n. 54; Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 44.

[165] Comm 3 (1971) 169–170.

Some Definitions

Canon 1061 — §1. A valid marriage between the baptized is called ratum tantum if it has not been consummated; it is called ratum et consummatum if the spouses have performed between themselves in a human fashion a conjugal act which is suitable in itself for the procreation of offspring, to which marriage is ordered by its nature and by which the spouses become one flesh.

§2. After a marriage has been celebrated, if the spouses have lived together consummation is presumed until the contrary is proven.

§3. An invalid marriage is called putative if at least one party celebrated it in good faith, until both parties become certain of its nullity.[166]

A valid marriage between two baptized persons which has not yet been consummated is said to be "ratified" (matrimonium ratum). Ratified marriages are always sacramental and enjoy the essential properties of unity and indissolubility. Nevertheless, for a just cause, the obligations of a merely ratified marriage can be dispensed from, or it can be dissolved at the request of one of the spouses.[167]

A marriage between baptized persons is said to be ratified and consummated (matrimonium ratum et consummatum) if, after it has been validly entered into by consent, the spouses engage in a completed act of sexual intercourse in a human manner. A ratified and consummated marriage cannot be dissolved by any human power or for any cause (c. 1141). The sequence of ratification and consummation is critical. No matter how frequently a couple has had sexual relations prior to marriage, during an invalid marriage, or before it has become sacramental through the baptism of both spouses, this sexual activity does not constitute the consummation of a ratified marriage, because one cannot consummate or "complete" what does not yet exist.[168]

[166] The Eastern code has no comparable canon.

[167] See the commentary on c. 1142 and cc. 1697–1706.

[168] Gasparri, n. 1093.

The 1917 code defined the act by which marriage is consummated as "a conjugal act to which the matrimonial contract is by its nature ordered and by which the spouses become one flesh."[169] Commentators agreed that the minimum necessary for consummation was that the man's penis penetrate the woman's vagina at least partially and deposit semen there. Consummation was not effected, however, by coitus interruptus in which the man penetrated the woman's vagina but withdrew before ejaculation or by intercourse using a condom.[170] In both cases, consummation did not occur because of the failure to ejaculate semen in the vagina. Even though illicit, other methods of birth control which did not prevent the ejaculation of semen in the vagina did not prevent consummation. The marriage law coetus explicitly restated the traditional view that natural sexual intercourse constituted consummation and that contraception did not prevent consummation as long as the physical integrity of the act was maintained.[171] Unlike the 1917 code, the revised code does explicitly require that, for consummation to occur, the act of sexual intercourse be performed "in a human fashion," i.e., it must be a natural and voluntary act.[172]

Also unlike the 1917 code, the revised code has defined the conjugal act by which marriage is consummated as one "which is suitable in itself for the procreation of offspring." This expression has a long canonical history. Canon 1081, §2 of the 1917 code used it to specify the perpetual and exclusive right to the body that was considered the object of matrimonial consent, and it meant non-contraceptive sexual relations, even if conception did not result from the act of intercourse.[173] In the 1983 code, however, the expression "suitable in itself for the procreation of offspring" no longer qualifies the conjugal acts by which the right to the body is exercised but the conjugal act by which a marriage is consummated. The choice of these words in this context (c. 17) and in accord with canonical tradition (c. 6, §2) seems to require the interpretation that a conjugal act (or even numerous conjugal acts) performed while practicing some form of artificial birth control does not result in the consummation of a marriage. Thus, despite the protestation of the code commission to the contrary, the revised code seems to have introduced a radical revision of the traditional understanding of the consummation of marriage. Since this revision seems to have been unintended and has not been followed in the practice of the Holy See, canon 1061, §1 should be emended so that the mind of the legislator is expressed clearly in language consonant with the canonical tradition.

Once a couple has begun to cohabit, their marriage is presumed to have been consummated (c. 1061, §2). Couples who have cohabited after their marriage and who subsequently claim that their marriages were never consummated bear the burden of proving non-consummation. This presumption of the law is, however, a simple one that yields to contrary proof. Not stated in the code is a corollary to this presumption. If a couple has not cohabited after marriage, consummation is not presumed but must be proven.

A marriage is said to be "putative" when it is in fact invalid but was entered into in good faith by at least one of the partners (c. 1061, §3). In other words, he or she was unaware of the existence of an undispensed impediment or of a defect of consent, which de facto rendered the marriage invalid. A party may also be in good faith if he or she was aware of the condition giving rise to an impediment (e.g., a prior marriage) or a defect of consent (e.g., a firm intention never to have children) but was unaware of its invalidating effect. Since ignorance of or error about the law is not presumed (c. 15, §2), however, the party who claims to have been in good faith must prove that he or she was unaware of the invalidating effect

[169] CIC 1015, §1.
[170] Cappello, n. 383; Wernz-Vidal, 5:20–21.
[171] Comm 6 (1976) 180. See M. Pompedda, "La nozione di matrimonio 'rato e consumato' secondo il can. 1061, §1 del C.I.C. e alcune questioni processuali di prova in merito," in Studi di diritto matrimoniale canonico (Milan: Giuffrè, 1993) 367–371.
[172] See the commentary on c. 1142.
[173] Cappello, n. 574.

of an impediment or defect of consent. Given the widespread ignorance of canon law among people today, most non-Catholics and even most lay Catholics should not have a great difficulty proving their good faith.

For a marriage to be considered putative, it must have been celebrated according to the required form and, therefore, have the appearance of a marriage. Thus, when a Catholic enters marriage without observing the canonical form and without being dispensed from its observance, the attempted marriage is not considered putative but simply invalid. If, however, the canonical form was observed but was substantially defective (e.g., the official minister was not properly delegated), the marriage would be considered putative.

The most significant effect of a putative marriage is that any children born of it are considered legitimate, even if it is subsequently declared invalid (c. 1137). A putative marriage also enjoys the favor of the law. It remains putative until both spouses become certain of its nullity. Thus, the spouses' doubts, even grave doubts, about the validity of their marriage are not sufficient to deprive it of its status as putative. The spouses on their own may become certain of the invalidity of their marriage because of an impediment. However, most couples become certain that their marriage was invalid because of a defect of consent only through the decision of a church tribunal.

Canon 1015, §3 of the 1917 code called a validly celebrated marriage between unbaptized persons a "legitimate marriage" (matrimonium legitimum). Although the revised code has not retained this category, the term continues to be used in ecclesiastical practice to designate valid marriages between two unbaptized persons and between a baptized person and an unbaptized person.

Engagement

Canon 1062 — §1. A promise of marriage, whether unilateral or bilateral, which is called an engagement, is governed by the particular law established by the conference of bishops, after it has considered any existing customs and civil laws.

§2. A promise to marry does not give rise to an action to seek the celebration of marriage; an action to repair damages, however, does arise if warranted.[174]

For much of human history, engagement or betrothal was a necessary prelude to marriage at least for the upper classes of society and an institution fraught with social and juridical consequences. Thus, engagement has historically been regulated by laws setting requirements for its validity and liceity, the form in which the promise of marriage is to be made, the dowry, the effects of an engagement, and the requirements for its valid and lawful termination.[175] In most Western societies, however, engagements have lost most of their social and legal significance. An engagement is now a more or less formal but unenforceable promise to marry at some future date. As a result of the decline in significance of engagement in many places, the revised code has not attempted to regulate it in universal law.

The task of regulating engagements is left to particular law to be enacted by episcopal conferences for their own territories. To date, episcopal conferences in the English-speaking world have not regulated engagements. Possible subjects for particular legislation might be a liturgical rite for engagement, the form in which the promises are to be made, witnesses to the promises, and the role, if any, of parents in entering an engagement. Particularly in societies where engagement remains an important social institution, particular law governing engagements should take into account local customs and pertinent civil laws.

Although an engagement is expected to be a serious and morally binding promise to marry, it does not give rise to a legally enforceable right. Thus, a broken engagement does not give the disappointed fiancé an action or a right to sue in ecclesiastical court to compel the other party to go ahead with the celebration of the marriage. To authorize an ecclesiastical tribunal to compel unwilling persons to honor promises to marry that they have now retracted would compromise the freedom that is essential for true marital consent (cc. 219 and 1103). Nevertheless, a disappointed fiancé does have the right to approach an ecclesiastical tribunal to recoup material damages suffered as a result of a broken engagement. For example, a woman whose family made a non-refundable deposit for a wedding reception and forfeited this deposit when her fiancé abruptly broke their engagement could bring an action in an ecclesiastical tribunal to recover financial losses. Nevertheless, the absence of particular law governing engagements could make the successful prosecution of such a suit difficult.

[174] Cf. CCEO 782.

[175] Although CIC 1017 was the only canon on engagements in the 1917 code, Cappello devoted 59 pages of commentary to this canon. See Cappello, nn. 82–143, and Gasparri, nn. 50–125.

Bibliography

Bibliographical material for canons 1055–1062 can be found after the commentary on canon 1165.

CHAPTER I
PASTORAL CARE AND THOSE THINGS WHICH MUST PRECEDE THE CELEBRATION OF MARRIAGE[1]
[cc. 1063–1072][2]

The concerns in this chapter are broader than the parallel section of the 1917 code (CIC 1019–1034). The old code emphasized ensuring the freedom of the parties to marry, with some concern for their proper instruction concerning marriage (CIC 1033). The present code emphasizes more strongly the proper preparation of the parties for a valid and fruitful celebration of the sacrament.

Canons 1063–1065 speak of marriage preparation. Although the canons speak of the preparation required for sacramental and non-sacramental unions, the importance of the sacrament in the life of both parties and of the community is highlighted. These canons also remind us that concern for marriage involves much more than concern for the valid exchange of the consent of the parties. Preparation for forming children to become responsible Christian adults who understand and appreciate the sacrament in their lives is essential, as is the providing of support to those who are already married. The wedding is only the beginning of a long life together, a life that will include times of hardship. The Christian community has a duty to support married people in their vocation and to help them live out their married lives.

The canons emphasize the importance of marriage preparation and highlight a potential weakness. It is difficult to legislate adequate preparation for the sacraments and adequate care for those who are married. These canons and the 1996 document of the Pontifical Council for the Family on marriage preparation[3] depend for their implementation on the good will and concern of the Christian community. It is a pastoral challenge to ensure that these canons are well implemented in each diocese and parish, for the good of those receiving the sacrament of marriage, and for the good of the entire Christian community.

Canons 1066–1070 are concerned with ensuring that the canonical requirements for a valid and lawful celebration of marriage are met through the pre-nuptial inquiry. Canon 1071 addresses a number of difficult situations where the permission of the local ordinary is required for a lawful celebration of marriage to take place. Canon 1072 speaks of the concern that pastors should have for the marriages of young people who are below the age customary for marriage in the region.

Catechesis and Preparation for Marriage[4]

Canon 1063 — Pastors of souls are obliged to take care that their ecclesiastical community offers the Christian faithful the assistance by which the matrimonial state is preserved in a Christian spirit and advances in perfection. This assistance must be offered especially by:

1° preaching, catechesis adapted to minors, youth, and adults, and even the use of instruments of social communication, by which the Christian faithful are instructed about the meaning of Christian marriage and about the function of Christian spouses and parents;

2° personal preparation to enter marriage, which disposes the spouses to the holiness and duties of their new state;

3° a fruitful liturgical celebration of marriage which is to show that the spouses

[1] See T. Doyle, in CLSA Com, 746–757; J. Fornés, in Pamplona ComEng, 663–667; D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 578–588.

[2] Cf. CCEO 783–789.

[3] PCF, "Preparation for the Sacrament of Marriage," May 13, 1996, Origins 26 (1996–1997) 97, 99–109.

[4] Cf. CCEO 783, §1 and §3.

signify and share in the mystery of the unity and fruitful love between Christ and the Church;

4° help offered to those who are married, so that faithfully preserving and protecting the conjugal covenant, they daily come to lead holier and fuller lives in their family.

In speaking of the Church in the modern world, Vatican II addressed "some more urgent problems deeply affecting the human race," the first of which was "Marriage and the Family in the Modern World."[5] The council recognized that, while esteem for Christian marriage was growing among some people, in modern culture the dignity of Christian marriage was often "overshadowed by polygamy, the plague of divorce, so-called free love, and similar blemishes."[6]

Canon 1063 emphasizes the importance of marriage preparation. On May 13, 1996 the Pontifical Council for the Family published "Preparation for the Sacrament of Marriage,"[7] a document which addresses the three stages of preparation for marriage that are considered in the canon. The document sees preparation for marriage as "a broad and thorough process of education for married life which must be considered in the totality of its values."[8] It reflects the canon by stating: "Christian marriage preparation can be described as a journey of faith which does not end with the celebration of marriage but continues throughout family life."[9]

The canon begins by speaking generally about how the Christian community, specifically through its pastors, can preserve the marital state in a Christian spirit and perfect it further. This will be accomplished both through marriage preparation and the pastoral care of married couples. "Pastors of souls" (those bishops and priests who are entrusted with the pastoral care of a community) have the primary function of ensuring that Christian marriage is valued and lived in the community. All others in the community are encouraged to participate in this important task. Such participation could be furthered by enlisting the help of married couples, as well as others whose work or expertise would be useful to the couples preparing for marriage (e.g., lawyers, doctors, psychologists, etc.).[10] The canon does not explain in detail how pastors of souls and the community are to help married couples. Depending on local needs and resources, different programs exist in different places and include, for example, marriage preparation courses, pre-Cana programs, engaged encounter, marriage encounter, pastoral marriage counseling, etc. The programs chosen should respond to the pastoral needs of the community.

Because marriage between baptized Christians is a sacrament, the prospective spouses should be prepared to receive the sacrament as fruitfully as possible. Such preparation should be accomplished through the various means highlighted in the canon, especially preaching and catechesis, which seek to strengthen and nourish the faith of the parties.

Marriage is not only a private commitment between two individuals. As a sacrament, it is a commitment before God and the church community, and it involves the good of the community. Hence, marriage should be highly esteemed and cared for by the community. The document issued by the Pontifical Council for the Family calls for the entire diocese to be involved in marriage preparation and recommends creating a "diocesan commission for marriage preparation, including a

[5] GS 46–47.

[6] GS 47b.

[7] This document consists of guidelines from the Pontifical Council for the Family, which is an administrative body. In other words, the text is not a legislative document. It cannot derogate from universal law. Rather, it seeks to explain the law and give suggestions for practice.

[8] "Preparation for the Sacrament of Marriage," 101, n. 10.

[9] Ibid., 102, n. 16.

[10] Number 12 of the introduction to the new ritual of marriage speaks of the whole community as being responsible for marriage preparation. Number 26 also notes that the ministry of marriage preparation, while a concern of the whole Church, is of particular concern for the lay members of the faithful.

group for the pastoral care of the family."[11] The document emphasizes that marriage preparation relates not merely to the pre-marriage period but also to the couple's ongoing commitment to live out the marriage in the fullest way possible. The canon too sees marriage preparation as something that takes a lifetime.

Remote, Proximate, and Immediate Preparation

We speak of marriage preparation that is remote, proximate, and immediate. Remote preparation takes place in infancy, childhood, and adolescence, in the family, in school, and in formation groups. The purpose of this remote preparation is to "attain the goal whereby every member of the faithful called to marriage will understand completely that, in the light of God's love, human love takes on a central role in Christian ethics."[12] Through preaching, catechesis, and social communication, children, young people, and adults can learn more about the meaning of marriage and what being a Christian spouse entails (1°). Effective marriage preparation must begin in childhood. Children and young people who learn what the obligations of marriage are, and who learn to appreciate the importance of the sacrament, will be better able to apply those teachings to their own lives when they marry.

The canon emphasizes the importance of proximate preparation for those who are about to marry (2°). The document issued by the Pontifical Council for the Family foresees proximate preparation as a time during which the couple will have the opportunity to deepen their faith as well as to "identify any difficulties they may have in living an authentic Christian life."[13] Normally, proximate preparation takes place in marriage preparation courses offered by pastoral workers who have a solid formation. The preparation should include:

> instruction regarding the natural requirements of the interpersonal relationship between a man and a woman in God's plan for marriage and the family: awareness regarding freedom of consent as the foundation of their union, the unity and indissolubility of marriage, the correct concept of responsible parenthood, the human aspects of conjugal sexuality, the conjugal act with its requirements and ends, and the proper education of children.[14]

By the end of this period of proximate preparation, the engaged couple should have a good idea of what marriage entails and how they will take their place in the Christian community, as well as how to "preserve and cultivate marriage love later... and how to overcome the inevitable conjugal 'crises.'"[15]

Immediate preparation is the final stage before the wedding takes place (3°). As the couple prepares to celebrate the marriage, they should review all they have learned and receive spiritual and liturgical preparation.[16] Immediate preparation is all the more necessary in those cases where couples have not participated in a marriage preparation course.

What of those couples who refuse to take part in marriage preparation programs? "Is preparation for the sacrament of marriage a sine qua non? Or is it only a pastoral option?"[17] Huels notes that canon 1077, §1 could be used to delay a marriage temporarily until the couple are considered ready. However, it is very difficult to deny the celebration of a marriage only because of a couple's failure to participate in a specific marriage preparation program. One distinction that should be made is between concrete marriage preparation programs and preparation for marriage. What is important is that the couple be prepared for mar-

[11] "Preparation for the Sacrament of Marriage," 102–103, n. 20.
[12] Ibid., 103, n. 25.
[13] Ibid., 104, n. 32.
[14] Ibid., 104, n. 35.
[15] Ibid., 106, n. 46.
[16] Ibid., 106, n. 50.
[17] J. Huels, "Preparation for the Sacraments: Faith, Rights, Law," Stud Can 28 (1994) 56–57.

riage. How that preparation takes place might not be the same for every couple. Whether a couple is prepared for marriage must be assessed individually and objectively. If the couple is not prepared, then canon 1077, §1 could be invoked and the marriage temporarily delayed. However, the basic human right to marry (c. 1058) must also be taken into account in making such a decision and in evaluating such programs

Continued Pastoral Care after Marriage

The canon does not forget those who are already married: they too need to have continued pastoral care in order to sustain them in this vocation and to help them live it in an ever more fruitful manner (4°). This is especially important during the first five years of married life as the couple are adjusting to their new responsibilities as married people and possibly as parents. Continued pastoral care could take the form of "post-marriage courses to be carried out in parishes or deaneries."[18]

The Vocation to the Married or to the Celibate Life

We should speak of the married vocation and the vocation to the priestly or religious life in the same context.[19] It is important that young people understand the different vocations, and it is essential that married life be given its proper due. It is not a vocation that is secondary vis-à-vis the priestly or religious life, but the road to holiness that most of the baptized will follow.

Obligation of the Local Ordinary to Provide Marriage Preparation

Canon 1064 — It is for the local ordinary to take care that such assistance is organized fittingly, after he has also heard men and women proven by experience and expertise if it seems opportune.

It is the local ordinary (cf. c. 134) who should ensure that appropriate forms of pre- and post-matrimonial help spoken of in the previous canon are provided. The canon is practical in stating that the ordinary should consult, if it is opportune, with men and women whose experience in these matters can help him provide the best help possible. This means that the ordinary should do more than provide generic pre-marriage courses. He should ensure that assistance appropriate to the situation of the people living in the diocese is provided. He can learn what is appropriate through the people whom he consults. Such courses or assistance should be updated regularly to keep in touch with any changing issues that should be addressed.

Reception of Confirmation, Penance, and the Eucharist

Canon 1065 — §1. Catholics who have not yet received the sacrament of confirmation are to receive it before they are admitted to marriage if it can be done without grave inconvenience.

§2. To receive the sacrament of marriage fruitfully, spouses are urged especially to approach the sacraments of penance and of the Most Holy Eucharist.

This canon is concerned with the spouses' spiritual preparation for marriage. The canon presumes that the parties are baptized, or that at least the Catholic party is. However, it also refers to the other sacraments of initiation—confirmation and Eucharist—and mentions penance. The reception of these three sacraments should facilitate a fruitful reception of marriage. Although reception of these sacraments is not necessary for the validity of the marriage, they are important for the faith of the parties and the fruitfulness of marriage, whether that marriage is sacramental or not. For this reason the faithful are "urged especially" to receive the sacraments of Eucharist and penance.

Confirmation should be received from a bishop, unless a priest has been deputed to do so according to canon 884, §1. The present canon stresses that confirmation should be conferred only if it can be done "without grave inconvenience." The person should not be rushed into reception of the sacrament. Adequate preparation should take place so that the importance of confirmation in the person's life is realized (c. 889, §2).

[18] "Preparation for the Sacrament of Marriage," 108, n. 73; see also FC 66.

[19] FC 66; see also CCC 1620.

The question of the fruitfulness of the sacrament of marriage is an especially delicate one. The canons presume that the parties who approach the Church have at least a basic faith and a willingness to do as the Church intends when they receive the sacrament. Preparation for the fruitful reception of the sacrament advocated in paragraph two of this canon is the ideal situation, one in which both parties are persons of faith who are approaching the sacrament with the best of intentions. However, the opposite situation can occur, where the parties are not especially interested in a fruitful reception of the sacrament, or even in the sacrament at all.[20]

Certitude of Valid and Licit Celebration[21]

Canon 1066 — Before a marriage is celebrated, it must be evident that nothing stands in the way of its valid and licit celebration.

This general canon leads into the more particular requirements of the following canons (cc. 1067–1070) which establish ways to ensure the valid and lawful celebration of a marriage. The pastoral minister preparing the couple for marriage must be certain that nothing impedes a valid and lawful celebration. For a marriage to be valid, the parties must be canonically free to marry one another. In other words, an impediment to marriage must not exist (cc. 1083–1094), the parties must marry freely and give true matrimonial consent (cc. 1095–1107), and the marriage must be celebrated with the proper canonical form (c. 1108). For a marriage to be celebrated lawfully, the prescriptions of canons 1067–1072 as well as canon 1102, §3 should be followed.

[20] In the commentary on c. 1055 see the discussion of the related question of faith and sacrament.

[21] Cf. CCEO 785, §1.

The Investigation of Freedom to Marry[22]

Canon 1067 — The conference of bishops is to establish norms about the examination of spouses and about the marriage banns or other opportune means to accomplish the investigations necessary before marriage. After these norms have been diligently observed, the pastor can proceed to assist at the marriage.

Since marriage preparation is a matter in which it is desirable to have some uniformity in each region, the code empowers each conference of bishops to lay down the norms which establish the freedom of the parties to marry and all other prerequisites for marriage. However, the conference may still leave a certain amount of discretion to the diocesan bishop. Once the pertinent norms have been observed, then the pastor may proceed to assist at the marriage.

The canon states explicitly that there is to be some kind of examination of the spouses. Usually they are examined separately. The purpose of this examination is to ascertain, not merely the absence of impediments, but also the freedom of the parties to marry, their capacity to marry, their understanding of the obligations and rights of marriage, and their capacity to undertake those obligations and exercise those rights.

The canon does not state that a recent baptismal certificate must be produced. However, episcopal conference norms may so prescribe. A recent baptismal certificate is a useful tool for ascertaining the freedom of the parties to marry, since it may contain other pertinent information regarding a person's canonical status. Canon 535, §2 prescribes that a baptismal register, in addition to noting the fact of baptism, is to contain notations of the reception of confirmation, as well as any details regarding the aforementioned canonical status (marriage, adoption, reception of sacred orders, perpetual religious profession, change of sui iuris church, declaration of nullity or dissolution of a previous marriage, dispensation from the obligation of celibacy, etc.).

[22] Cf. CCEO 784.

Publication of Banns

The present canon allows for the possible publication of banns[23] if the local situation warrants it. Episcopal conferences and diocesan bishops should assess local situations to determine whether the publication of banns would be an effective way of proving that the parties to a proposed union are free to marry. In modern society, especially in cities, publishing banns would not be an effective means of determining people's freedom to marry, since people move around so much and are not necessarily well known in the area where they are living, not even in their parishes. In other circumstances (e.g., rural areas), however, banns could be an effective method of establishing freedom to marry.

Process to Be Followed in Establishing the Freedom of Catholic Parties Who Have Attempted Marriage without Following the Canonical Form

On August 7, 1984, the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts published a response to the following question:

> Whether, in order to prove the state of freedom of those who, although bound to the canonical form, attempted marriage before a civil official or a non-Catholic minister, is the documentary process mentioned in c. 1686 necessarily required, or does the pre-nuptial investigation dealt in cc. 1066–1067 suffice?

The council replied that the process outlined in canons 1066–1067 would suffice to prove the freedom to marry of someone who was bound to the canonical form of marriage yet who contracted a marriage without observing this form.[24] Nevertheless, many diocesan bishops have reserved the determination of freedom to marry in these cases to the chancery or to the tribunal.

Procedure in Danger of Death[25]

Canon 1068 — In danger of death and if other proofs cannot be obtained, the affirmation of the contracting parties, even sworn if the case warrants it, that they are baptized and are prevented by no impediment is sufficient unless there are indications to the contrary.

This canon provides an alternate method for examining the parties in cases where one or both of the parties is in danger of death. If both parties affirm that they are baptized and that they are not impeded by any impediments to marriage, they may marry. The danger of death may come from illness (intrinsic danger) or war, natural disaster, etc. (extrinsic danger). The danger is presumably grave enough that there is not enough time to proceed with the usual investigations.

The canon requires that the statement of the parties regarding their baptismal status be made under oath only "if the case warrants it," in other words, only "where there is real doubt about the truthfulness of the parties."[26]

The Obligation of the Faithful to Reveal Impediments[27]

Canon 1069 — All the faithful are obliged to reveal any impediments they know about to the pastor or local ordinary before the celebration of the marriage.

[23] CIC 1022 required the pastor publicly to announce those who were to be married. This was known as publishing the banns of marriage, which occurred on three successive Sundays and other holy days of obligation (CIC 1024).

[24] PCILT, response, August 7, 1984, in Pamplona ComEng, 1295. See L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 13–14.

[25] Cf. CCEO 785, §2.

[26] Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 582.

[27] Cf. CCEO 786.

This obligation is similar to that of canon 1027 of the 1917 code: anyone who knew anything that would invalidate the proposed union was to inform the pastor or the local ordinary. This obligation envisioned not only the good of the couple, but also the good of the community, since marriage affects the entire community.

Generally, anyone who is aware of any impediments to marriage, or anything that would invalidate the consent of one of the parties (an incapacity, an intention excluding one of the goods of marriage, etc.) is obliged to reveal this information to the pastor or the local ordinary before the marriage. Then, it is up to the pastor or the local ordinary to act on the information after having considered the nature and gravity of what he has learned, who informed him of it, how that person acquired the information, and whether it can be corroborated. The pastor or the local ordinary may need to speak with the parties or their parents to understand the situation more clearly.

However, not everyone who learns of an impediment affecting one of the parties is obliged to reveal it. Those who learn of it in sacramental confession can speak to the penitent about it only in the context of the confessional unless the penitent brings it up again in the extra-sacramental forum. Those who learn of such information in other confidential relationships (doctor-patient, lawyer-client, etc.) may not be free to reveal what they know. However, it is not universally held that these latter people are excused from the obligation of this canon. While upholding the confidential relationship is important, the good of the person who is perhaps unknowingly entering an invalid marriage must also be protected.[28]

[28] Those who learn information in a professional confidential context are excused from testifying about the information in a subsequent formal process, while those who learn information in the context of a sacramental confession are incapable of doing so. See cc. 1548, §2, 1° and 1550, §2, 2°.

Notification of the Parties' Completed Examination[29]

Canon 1070 — If someone other than the pastor who is to assist at marriage has conducted the investigations, the person is to notify the pastor about the results as soon as possible through an authentic document.

Because prospective spouses often live in different parishes, and because they may live in a parish different from the one in which they will be married, it is necessary to inform the pastor of the parish where the marriage is to take place of any preparations occurring outside his parish. In this way, he will be assured that the appropriate preparation and investigations have been accomplished. Since the pastor is responsible for fostering the spiritual welfare of his parish, he is responsible for ensuring proper preparation for marriages that take place in his parish. Even if he does not personally prepare the couple for marriage, he must be informed that all the prerequisites for a valid and lawful celebration have been fulfilled.

The canon states that the pastor should be informed by an "authentic document," which is a document that has been dated, signed by the person who conducted the investigation, and sealed with the parish seal (c. 535, §3).

Marriage Situations Requiring the Local Ordinary's Permission[30]

Canon 1071 — §1. Except in a case of necessity, a person is not to assist without the permission of the local ordinary at:

1° a marriage of transients;

2° a marriage which cannot be recognized or celebrated according to the norm of civil law;

3° a marriage of a person who is bound by natural obligations toward another party or children arising from a previous union;

[29] Cf. CCEO 787.

[30] Cf. CCEO 789.

4° a marriage of a person who has notoriously rejected the Catholic faith;

5° a marriage of a person who is under a censure;

6° a marriage of a minor child when the parents are unaware or reasonably opposed;

7° a marriage to be entered into through a proxy as mentioned in can. 1105.

§2. The local ordinary is not to grant permission to assist at the marriage of a person who has notoriously rejected the Catholic faith unless the norms mentioned in can. 1125 have been observed with necessary adaptation.

This canon lists a number of situations in which the person who officially assists at the marriage (the priest, deacon, or lay person delegated in virtue of c. 1112) on behalf of the Church needs the local ordinary's permission to do so. These delicate situations require special pastoral care when the couple is being prepared for marriage. If the prescriptions of this canon are not followed, the validity of the marriage is not affected. However, the appropriate permission from the local ordinary is necessary for the lawfulness of the marriage. The prescriptions of this canon should be followed even when only one party fits into one of the categories mentioned in the canon. In all these instances, referral to the local ordinary is obligatory except in case of necessity, that is, in instances of danger of death and > any situation in which an undue delay could involve a serious pastoral risk. It will be for the person who is to assist at the marriage to make a prudent judgement in this regard, bearing in mind that the purpose of the rule is to protect both the sacrament and the ultimate well-being of the partners.[31]

The cases that the canon highlights as requiring special care are the following:

[31] Kelly, in CLSBGI Com, 584.

*1°–A Marriage of Transients or Wanderers (Vagi)*

These are people who have no domicile or quasi-domicile (cc. 100–101). The fact of their having no fixed address can make it difficult to establish their freedom to marry. In addressing these cases, it is important to determine the reason why the person has no domicile or quasi-domicile. For example, some people have no fixed address because of their lifestyle; they are transients, travelers, migrants. However, other transient people live this way because of mental or physical illness. The local ordinary would need to take extra care in such cases to ensure that the person is capable of entering marriage.

2°–A Marriage Prohibited by Civil Law

Civil law impediments (for example, minimum age required for marriage, degree of consanguinity permitted, etc.) or laws regarding remarriage may be different from canon law impediments. If a marriage cannot be recognized in civil law, special care needs to be taken so that church practice is not unnecessarily in conflict with civil law. However, there may be circumstances in which, for good reason, the local ordinary can allow a marriage to be celebrated despite the prohibition of civil law.

3°–A Marriage of a Person Bound by Previous Marital and Parental Obligations

If a marriage involves a person who has been married before but who is free to marry in the eyes of the Church (because of a dissolution or declaration of nullity, the death of a former spouse, a civil union that was not recognized by the Church, or a common law union followed by a separation), that person may be bound by natural obligations toward children from the previous union. Such obligations cannot be ignored (see cc. 1136, 1154). In the same way, obligations to a former spouse may still bind. In such cases, the children or the previous spouse may need financial or other assistance that would put a strain on the second union, or the community could be scandalized if the new union were to take place and the children or spouse of the previous union were not being provided for.[32] The Church could not condone the abandonment of a person's obligations to dependents. The local ordinary must assess the situation to ensure that all who need support and care are being provided for. If in his view the person is neglecting his or her obligations to a former spouse or children, the ordinary could even forbid the proposed marriage, at least for a time (c. 1077, §1).

4°–A Marriage of Someone Who Has Notoriously Rejected the Catholic Faith

The difficulty here is evaluating when someone has notoriously rejected the Catholic faith. To reject the faith means more than simply no longer practicing the Catholic faith. Rejecting the faith can mean professing to believe something contrary to the Catholic faith or joining a sect or a group that does not profess the Catholic faith.[33] One can reject the faith without embracing another religion.

Proving notorious rejection is a serious matter. It must be demonstrated that the person has consciously rejected the Catholic faith and that the rejection is publicly known. This understanding of the term "notorious" is taken from canon 2197 of the 1917 code which spoke of notorious delicts. A crime is notorious if "it is publicly known and was committed under such circumstances that no maneuver can conceal nor any legal defense excuse it."[34] A person who notoriously rejects the Catholic faith is different from someone who simply no longer practices the faith or who has stopped believing what the Church teaches without absolutely rejecting that teaching publicly.

In evaluating a notorious rejection of the faith, one can be guided by the words of Pope John Paul II in Familiaris consortio:

> When in spite of all efforts engaged couples show that they reject explicitly and formally what the Church intends to do when the marriage of baptized persons is celebrated, the pastor of souls cannot admit them to the celebration of marriage.[35]

For most of the situations listed in paragraph one of this canon, the resolution of the pastoral issues is left entirely to the discretion of the local ordinary. Paragraph two of the canon, however, somewhat qualifies that discretion with regard to those who have notoriously rejected the Catholic faith. Because this is such a serious situation for the faith of the person as well as for the faith of his or her prospective spouse and children, the ordinary is not to permit the marriage to take place unless the promises required of the partners in mixed marriages are made (c. 1125) with appropriate adaptations. This is necessary to ensure that both parties realize the religious obligations they have undertaken and what it will mean to live them out in their marriage.

5°–A Marriage of a Person under Censure

Canon 209 speaks of the obligation of the faithful to remain in communion with the Church. Implicit in this number of canon 1071 is the person's responsibility to try to restore the communion that has been broken.

A person under certain censures (excommunication or interdict) is forbidden to receive any of [32] What are these obligations? Canon 1689 speaks of "moral and even civil obligations." In addition to financial or material assistance, such obligations could also include such things as the education of the children and the emotional and spiritual support of the children or the other spouse.

[33] Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 586, notes that this notorious rejection of the Catholic faith "is not to be confused with that of a 'defection from the Catholic Church by a formal act' (see Cann. 1086, §1, 1117, 1124...)." In his opinion, this canon is addressing something less strong than that. It is addressing those persons who have not defected, but who, at the same time, cannot be considered Catholics in good standing.

[34] T. L. Bouscaren and A. C. Ellis, Canon Law: A Text and Commentary, 3rd rev. ed. (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1957) 838.

[35] FC 68g.

the sacraments (cc. 1331, §1, 2°; 1332). The purpose of the present provision is to balance the effects of the censure (exclusion from the sacraments) with a person's natural right to marry. Thus it is important for the local ordinary to be involved in order to help rectify the situation and to facilitate reconciliation with the Church on the part of the person under censure.

6°– A Marriage of a Minor

Because parents play such an important role in the education and upbringing of their children, they can help in the discernment of their children's choice of a state in life, without forcing their children into such a choice (c. 219) especially as regards a marriage partner (GS 52). It is natural that parents normally be part of the decision to marry. This is especially true if the children are still young adults, or for some reason not prepared to make a responsible choice of a marriage partner. Although the code also upholds the right of such minors to marry, the parents should usually be informed of what is happening, and should agree to the proposed marriage.

This number of the canon speaks only of marriages of minors whose parents are unaware of the proposed marriage, or whose parents are opposed to it. A minor is a person who has not completed his or her eighteenth year (c. 97, §1). Not all marriages of minors must be referred to the ordinary, but only those cases in which the parents of the person (or persons) to be married are unaware that the marriage is to take place, or have reasonable objections to it. Here the law presumes that the parents know the young people well enough to help them decide if they have the necessary maturity to enter marriage. However, if the young people have serious reasons why their parents should not be notified, or why the marriage should take place even though their parents oppose it, the local ordinary can permit the marriage, after assessing the reasons presented.

7°– A Marriage to Be Entered by Proxy

In a marriage entered by proxy one of the parties (or both) is not present and is represented by another person (c. 1105). Such marriages raise certain pastoral questions, e.g., how well do the parties know one another and how genuine and free is their consent? Furthermore, if such marriages are prohibited in a particular place, certain civil law issues might arise. Thus, such marriages should be referred to the local ordinary.

Eastern Code

Canon 789, 5° of the Eastern code adds another situation in which the permission of the local ordinary is to be obtained before proceeding with the wedding:

> the marriage of one who is forbidden by an ecclesiastical sentence to enter into a new marriage unless the person fulfills certain conditions.

This is the potentially delicate situation in which a judgment has been given in a marriage nullity case and a prohibition (vetitum) to remarry has been imposed (CCEO 1370, §1). Such a prohibition might be imposed on a person when a marriage is declared invalid because one party was incapable of consenting, or did not understand what he or she was consenting to, or had a different view of marriage from the one the Church teaches. The prohibition would state that this person cannot marry again in the Catholic Church unless it is clear that through adequate preparation he or she understands the commitment that is being undertaken. Such cases are more difficult if the prohibition states that the person was incapable of understanding or committing himself or herself to the obligations of marriage. Sometimes, however, it can be shown that the person has grown and is now able to understand and embrace what marriage entails.

It is interesting that this provision is not included in canon 1071 of the Latin code. However, in practice, the permission of the local ordinary is required to lift any such prohibition and permit the marriage to take place. Thus, although the provision is not explicit in this chapter of the Latin code, the necessity of official consultation to ensure that adequate preparation for marriage has taken place should be the same in practice under both codes.

Marriages of the Young

Canon 1072 — Pastors of souls are to take care to dissuade youth from the celebration of marriage before the age at which a person usually enters marriage according to the accepted practices of the region.

A man cannot validly marry before he is sixteen, and a woman before she is fourteen (c. 1083, §1). However, episcopal conferences may establish an older minimum age for the lawful celebration of marriage than that prescribed by the code (c. 1083, §2). This last norm provides for the fact that there are different customs in different parts of the world. In some cultures, children mature early and are expected to take a responsible place in society at an earlier age than in other cultures. Nevertheless, even the minimum age prescribed by the episcopal conference may be younger than is the norm according to the culture of the country. Recently it has become clear that marriages of the very young often fail because they do not possess sufficient maturity to cope with the stresses and obligations of marriage. Thus, the canon exhorts pastors of souls to take care that the youth to whom they minister do not marry before they are ready. This is not an absolute prohibition, but a pastoral guideline based on experience.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical material for canons 1063–1072 can be found after the commentary on canon 1165.

CHAPTER II
DIRIMENT IMPEDIMENTS IN GENERAL[1]
[cc. 1073–1082][2]

The code devotes ten canons to general principles about impediments to marriage and their dispensation. These canons treat: general notions about impediments (cc. 1073–1076), the prohibition of a particular marriage (c. 1077), dispensations from impediments in various circumstances (cc. 1078–1080), and the recording of dispensations (cc. 1081–1082).

Basic Principles

The Nature and Effect of an Impediment

Canon 1073 — A diriment impediment renders a person unqualified to contract marriage validly.

An impediment is a circumstance that bars a person from marrying. An impediment is called impedient if it results only in the unlawfulness of the marriage;[3] it is called diriment (from the Latin dirimere, to put an end to or terminate) if it results in the invalidity of an attempted marriage. Laws establishing diriment impediments to marriage (cc. 1083–1094) are disqualifying laws (c. 10) in that they render a person ineligible either for any marriage or for a particular marriage. Diriment impediments invalidate attempted marriages even when the parties bound by them are ignorant of or in error about them and their effects (c. 15, §1).

Although it is difficult to render the nuances of Latin in English, it is important to distinguish an incapacity (incapacitas) for marriage from the disqualification (inhabilitas) for marriage that results from an impediment. Those incapable of marriage suffer from a serious deficiency, often psychological in nature, that prevents them from giving true marital consent;[4] those bound by an impediment are generally capable of marriage but are legally disqualified from it.

Impediments restrict the exercise of the natural right to marry, which has long been understood in the Church's positive law and its social teaching as a fundamental human right.[5] Nevertheless, both civil and ecclesiastical law have long restricted the freedom to marry in the interest of the common good by establishing impediments. These restrictions are justified by appeal to the experience that certain marital relationships are injurious to both civil and ecclesiastical society and to the institution of marriage and often harm the parties themselves and their children.

Historical Overview

Impediments to marriage emerged rather early in the history of church law. The early Church observed, absorbed, and adopted impediments from Roman law and, to a lesser extent, the Old Testament. Early councils, both local and ecumenical, established new impediments and modified or abrogated existing ones. The current discipline of the Eastern churches on impediments was essentially in place by the time of the Council of Trullo in 691. Although its legislation was not received by the churches of the West, they observed some [1] See T. Doyle, in CLSA Com, 757–764; K. Lüdicke, in Münster Com, 1073/1–1082/1; J. Fornés, in Pamplona ComEng, 667–674; and D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 588–598.

[2] This material is treated also in CCEO 790–799. Because of its close similarity to the Latin code, the Eastern code will be discussed explicitly only where it is substantially different.

[3] Although the 1983 code contains no impedient impediments, canon 1083, §2 authorizes episcopal conferences to establish an impedient impediment of lack of age.

[4] See the commentary on c. 1095.

[5] See the commentary on c. 1058.

elements of it as custom (e.g., the impediment of disparity of worship). In addition, conciliar activity throughout the Middle Ages down to Trent continued to add, modify, and occasionally abrogate matrimonial impediments.

The existence of impediments induced by custom and their modification through conciliar activity led to considerable confusion in the post-Tridentine period. Among canonists estimates of the number of diriment impediments ranged from fourteen to nineteen and of impedient impediments from two to eleven.[6] The confusion was dispelled by the 1917 code which established an exhaustive list of impediments and abolished all others. This approach of limiting impediments to those explicitly mentioned in the positive law has been continued in the 1983 code, which has also eliminated impedient impediments.

Classifications of Impediments

Besides the distinction between impedient and diriment impediments, canonical tradition has used various other distinctions to classify impediments. The most important of these is the distinction between those impediments considered to be founded in divine law, whether natural or positive, and those established by positive ecclesiastical law alone. Most commentators speak of the impediments of impotence, prior bond, and consanguinity, at least in all degrees of the direct line and up to and including the second degree of the collateral line, as deriving from divine law. Some include in this category the impediment of age if one or both parties have not yet reached the age of discretion and the impediment of disparity of worship to the extent that there is grave danger of the Catholic party apostatizing. The rest of the impediments are considered matters of merely ecclesiastical law.

The implications of this distinction are twofold. First, to the extent that impediments derive from divine law, they bind all persons, whether they are baptized or not, whether they marry Catholics or not; ecclesiastical law impediments bind only Catholics and non-Catholics who marry them. Second, ecclesiastical law impediments are, in principle, subject to dispensation; impediments said to be of divine law are not.

Canonists also distinguish impediments as absolute or relative and as perpetual or temporary. Absolute impediments bar a person from any marriage (e.g., prior bond); relative impediments preclude only specific marriages (e.g., consanguinity). An impediment is perpetual if it does not cease with the passage of time (e.g., sacred orders); otherwise it is temporary (e.g., age).

[6] F. Wernz and P. Vidal, Ius Canonicum (Rome: Apud Aedes Universitatis Gregorianae, 1946) 5: n. 148.

Public and Occult Impediments

Canon 1074 — An impediment which can be proven in the external forum is considered to be public; otherwise it is occult.

An impediment is considered public not because its existence is well known in the community but because it is susceptible to proof in an ecclesiastical process, either judicial or administrative. Otherwise, the impediment is considered occult. The public character of an impediment depends on the availability of one or more of the types of evidence admissible in ecclesiastical processes that can provide full proof of the existence of the impediment when evaluated in accord with the norm of law. Some impediments (e.g., age, prior bond, sacred orders) arise from a public event whose occurrence can often be established by a public document which is fully probative of the existence of the resulting impediment (c. 1541). Although these impediments are sometimes referred to as "of their nature public," the reality may be quite different. One has only to think of the clandestine ordinations conducted in the former Czechoslovakia during the Soviet era and the consequent difficulty of proving the existence of the impediment of sacred orders to realize that the public or occult character of an impediment depends less on its nature than on attendant circumstances.

Whether an impediment is public or occult does not alter its disqualifying effect. The public or occult character of an impediment does, however, determine who is the authority competent to dispense from it, what is required to convalidate a marriage invalid because of the impediment, and whether the invalidating effect of the impediment can be declared in the external forum to permit the parties to enter new marriages in the Church.

The Authority to Establish Impediments

Canon 1075 — §1. It is only for the supreme authority of the Church to declare authentically when divine law prohibits or nullifies marriage.

§2. Only the supreme authority has the right to establish other impediments for the baptized.

Only "the supreme authority of the Church" may declare authoritatively when divine law establishes impediments to marriage and establish additional impediments. This same authority has sole competence to interpret the meaning and define the scope of impediments of both divine and ecclesiastical law. As Vatican II taught (LG 22), this "supreme authority" is the Roman Pontiff as head of the college of bishops and the college of bishops acting together with its head. In this context, the reference to "the supreme authority of the Church" recognizes the significant role played by ecumenical councils in shaping canonical discipline on matrimonial impediments. The term "supreme authority of the Church" is not simply interchangeable with the terms "the Apostolic See" or "the Holy See." In law, the latter terms denote the Roman Pontiff and the institutions of the Roman Curia through which he carries out his ministry for the universal Church (c. 361). These curial agencies have no authority to establish and interpret impediments except to the extent that the Roman Pontiff has delegated this authority to them.

Since impediments gravely restrict the exercise of the natural right to marry, they should be established only when the common good clearly requires it and should be construed as narrowly as is consistent with protection of the common good (c. 18). Moreover, the fact that their invalidating effect may disrupt the social order suggests that they should be uniform throughout the Church. By restricting the authority to establish and interpret impediments to the supreme authority of the Church, the law seeks to ensure that there is uniformity and consistency in ecclesiastical discipline and that impediments are established only after due deliberation.[7]

Custom and Impediments

Canon 1076 — A custom which introduces a new impediment or is contrary to existing impediments is reprobated.

The Church has long recognized custom as a source of law and as the best interpreter of laws.[8] Throughout history, impediments have been introduced by custom. For example, the impediment of disparity of worship was binding in the Latin church by virtue of universal custom long before it was incorporated into statutory law in the 1917 code. Similarly, custom has been influential in shaping the interpretation and application of the law on impediments. For example, in the early Middle Ages, custom largely influenced the shift from the Roman to the Germanic method of computing degrees of consanguinity and affinity[9] and the extension of the scope of these impediments far beyond the degrees prohibited in Roman law.

Following the lead of the 1917 code (CIC 1041), the present code bars the introduction of new impediments through custom. It also bars customary interpretations of existing impediments that are contrary to a strict construction of the [7] Out of deference to the autonomy of the Eastern churches, CCEO 792 allows for the establishment of other diriment impediments in the particular law of Eastern churches sui iuris after consultation with the Apostolic See and with the eparchial bishops of other interested churches sui iuris.

[8] See the commentary on cc. 23–28.

[9] See the commentary on c. 108.

canons themselves. By reprobating such customs, the law not only abrogates any such pre-1983 code customs but also declares them unreasonable and, therefore, incapable of obtaining binding force as customs in the future (c. 24, §2).

Prohibition of Particular Marriages

Canon 1077 — §1. In a special case, the local ordinary can prohibit marriage for his own subjects residing anywhere and for all actually present in his own territory but only for a time, for a grave cause, and for as long as the cause continues.

§2. Only the supreme authority of the Church can add a nullifying clause to a prohibition.

Nature and Source of a Prohibition

Impediments are general laws that disqualify or prohibit specified categories of people from marriage. While only the supreme authority of the Church can establish impediments, local ordinaries can, for a grave cause, prohibit the celebration of a marriage in a particular case. This authority, which is an exercise of the executive power of governance in the form of a personal precept (c. 49), derives from the obligation of ecclesiastical authorities to promote the common good of the particular and the universal Church and to prevent abuses of ecclesiastical discipline, especially in the celebration of the sacraments (c. 392).[10] The local ordinary can prohibit the marriage of a person who has a domicile (c. 102, §1) or quasi-domicile (c. 102, §2) in his territory even if the marriage is to be celebrated elsewhere. He can also prohibit the marriage in his territory of a person who is actually present there although he or she resides elsewhere.

The prohibition of a particular marriage by ecclesiastical authority emerged as a canonical institute distinct from matrimonial impediments in the twelfth century.[11] The prohibition seems to have been used especially to bar a couple from marriage while the status of one party's previous marriage was under investigation by an ecclesiastical court and to prevent the celebration of a marriage when the existence of some other impediment seemed probable. These prohibitions were issued by popes, bishops, and, at times, pastors. Failure to obey a personal prohibition did not of itself invalidate the marriage although, if proven to exist, the impediment that prompted the prohibition might do so. Observance of a personal prohibition was enforced by the threat of penal sanctions.

The current law states that only the local ordinary may prohibit a marriage. However, this authority can be delegated to others.[12] The local ordinary may issue a personal prohibition only for a particular case. Thus, he cannot prohibit all marriages of a particular class, e.g., all marriages in which the parties are cohabiting before marriage or all marriages involving teenagers. Such a blanket prohibition would be equivalent to a new impediment.

A personal prohibition differs from a minister's refusal to witness a marriage because of doubts as to whether its celebration will be valid and licit (c. 1066). In the case of such a refusal, the couple may seek another minister who will be more sympathetic to their situation; however, when a personal prohibition has been imposed, it binds other ministers as well. When a local ordinary prohibits [10] See S. Gherro, "Il divieto al matrimonio stabilito dall'ordinario ex can. 1077," in Gli impedimenti al matrimonio canonico (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1989) 41–52.

[11] See J. Waterhouse, The Power of the Local Ordinary to Impose a Matrimonial Ban, CanLawStud 317 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1952) 9–56.

[12] Canon 1684, §1 empowers tribunal judges to impose prohibitions on parties to marriage cases when the evidence brought forward during the process suggests the continuing existence of problems that led to the nullity of a prior union (e.g., psychological disorders, deeply rooted errors about the substance of marriage) and that threaten to vitiate a subsequent union. Although an administrative act, the prohibition by a judge is distinct from the prohibition by a local ordinary because the basis of the former is the evidence collected during the judicial process and its aim is solely to avert another invalid marriage. See Gherro, 42–43.

a marriage of people who reside in his territory, the prohibition binds them (and indirectly potential official witnesses to their marriage) even when they are outside his territory. However, when a local ordinary prohibits the marriage of a couple who do not have a stable residence in his territory, the prohibition does not bind them when they depart from his territory.

Conditions for Imposing a Prohibition

The legitimacy of a personal prohibition depends on the existence of a grave cause. The proposed marriage must threaten serious harm to the parties themselves, to the good of the community, or to the dignity of the sacrament. Historically, the prohibition has most frequently been used to avert marriages that would probably be null because of an impediment or a defect of consent. However, the probable invalidity of a proposed marriage is not the only ground for a personal prohibition. Failure to allay the concerns that prompted the law to require the local ordinary's permission in the seven cases mentioned in canon 1071, §1, especially the reasonable objections of parents to the marriage of their minor children, could justify a prohibition. The threat of scandal posed by the proposed marriage could also justify a personal prohibition. Commentators on the 1917 code suggested that the existence of a communicable disease, especially a sexually transmitted disease, about which the other party was unaware was a reason to prohibit a particular marriage until either the other party was informed or the disease had been cured or at least rendered non-communicable.[13] This opinion is still valid. However, withholding such information today would probably nullify the marriage on the basis of fraud (c. 1098).

Cessation of a Prohibition

Although the existence of a grave cause is sufficient reason to issue a personal prohibition of marriage, this prohibition can only be temporary and must be revoked when the motivating cause ceases. Personal prohibitions of marriage are not meant as punishments but as protections of the personal good of the spouses and the public good of the community. Once imposed, a prohibition of a marriage can be revoked by the local ordinary who issued it, another competent local ordinary, or the delegate of either of them.[14]

Issuing a Prohibition

Whatever the grave reason prompting the prohibition of a marriage in a particular case, such a prohibition restricts the exercise of the fundamental right to marry. Therefore, a careful effort to establish the relevant facts and to weigh the harm that might result from allowing the celebration of the marriage against the hardships that may result from deferring it should always precede the imposition of a personal prohibition (c. 50). When concern about the maturity of young people or the impact of a premarital pregnancy on their freedom are issues, mental health professionals should be consulted. As a precept, a prohibition should be issued in writing with at least a summary of the reasons prompting it (c. 51) and be communicated to the affected persons (cc. 54–56). If a prohibition is imposed, the affected persons should be assisted in overcoming the problems that prompted it.

Effect of a Prohibition

A prohibition of the celebration of a marriage by a local ordinary affects only the lawfulness and not the validity of a marriage celebrated in violation of the prohibition. Only prohibitions imposed by the supreme authority of the Church invalidate the subsequent attempt at marriage.[15] The provision of canon 1077, §2 resolves a controversy about the juridic effect of prohibitions attached to sentences of the Roman Rota. Although it is a tribunal of the Apostolic See, the Roman Rota does not enjoy the supreme power of the Church. Thus, its prohibitions affect only the lawfulness and not the validity of marriages celebrated in contravention of them.

[13] Waterhouse, 110–114.

[14] For the conditions for the validity of the revocation of a personal prohibition, see the commentary on c. 58, §1.

[15] CCEO 794, §2 provides that the patriarch can add an invalidating clause to the prohibition of a local hierarch who exercises his authority within the territorial boundaries of the patriarchal church.

DISPENSATION FROM IMPEDIMENTS

Although impediments are established to prevent grave harm to the common good, to the institution of marriage, and to the spouses and their children, there are often circumstances in which there are adequate protections against the feared harm that prompted the establishment of an impediment or in which the damage resulting from the refusal to permit a marriage may outweigh the harm from allowing it. Thus, church law makes provision for dispensations or relaxations of the law in particular cases to permit the valid and licit celebration of otherwise proscribed marriages when there is a proportionate cause for doing so. The current law contains specific norms governing the granting of dispensations from impediments in ordinary circumstances, in situations of danger of death, and in situations where the impediment is discovered only after all preparations have been made for the wedding.

Dispensations in Ordinary Circumstances

Canon 1078 — §1. The local ordinary can dispense his own subjects residing anywhere and all actually present in his own territory from all impediments of ecclesiastical law except those whose dispensation is reserved to the Apostolic See.

§2. Impediments whose dispensation is reserved to the Apostolic See are:

1° the impediment arising from sacred orders or from a public perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute of pontifical right;

2° the impediment of crime mentioned in can. 1090.

§3. A dispensation is never given from the impediment of consanguinity in the direct line or in the second degree of the collateral line.

Before Vatican II, only the Holy See had ordinary power to dispense from matrimonial impediments in ordinary circumstances, but local ordinaries were often authorized to dispense from certain impediments through delegations contained in quinquennial faculties. Christus Dominus §8b and postconciliar legislation[16] recognized the authority of diocesan bishops to dispense from universal disciplinary laws unless their dispensation had been reserved to a higher authority. Canon 1078 reflects these conciliar and postconciliar developments by situating the authority to dispense from most matrimonial impediments of ecclesiastical law at the level of the particular church. Unlike the more general canon 87, however, canon 1078 extends this dispensing power over matrimonial impediments to all local ordinaries, a category broader than that of diocesan bishops (see c. 134). This dispensing power is ordinary, i.e., it is joined to the office of local ordinary (c. 131, §1). It can, therefore, be delegated either generally for all cases or specifically for a particular case (c. 137, §1).

A local ordinary can exercise this dispensing authority on behalf of those who have a domicile or quasi-domicile in his territory even if he or they are in fact temporarily absent from it. A local ordinary can also exercise his dispensing power on behalf of travelers who are actually present in his territory but who habitually reside elsewhere (c. 136).

The dispensing power of local ordinaries in ordinary circumstances extends only to ecclesiastical law impediments. Thus, a local ordinary can never dispense from the impediments of prior bond, impotence, or consanguinity in any degree of the direct line and up to the second degree inclusive of the collateral line.[17] Also beyond the scope of the dispensing power of local ordinaries in ordinary circumstances are the impediments arising from sacred orders, a perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute of pontifical right, and crime as defined in canon 1090. In ordinary circumstances, dispensations from these three impediments are reserved to the Apostolic See.[18] If these impediments are public, dispensations should be sought from the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments for the impediments of sacred orders and crime and from the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life for the impediment of perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute of pontifical right.[19] If the impediments are occult, the dispensation is to be sought from the Apostolic Penitentiary.

[16] EM 11–16, CLD 6, 399.

[17] Canon 1078, §3 states: "A dispensation is never given from the impediment of consanguinity in the direct line

In light of the circumstances of the case and the gravity of the dangers the impediment is intended to avert, a cause that is just and reasonable is required for the validity of a dispensation from an impediment by a local ordinary.[20] Although commentators on the 1917 code had suggested various causes that could be sufficient to dispense from impediments, Paul VI held that "the spiritual good of the faithful is a legitimate cause for a dispensation."[21] The phrase "spiritual good of the faithful" should not, however, be used as a shibboleth that excuses from a careful examination of the merits of individual cases.

or in the second degree of the collateral line." This oblique wording reflects the doubts expressed by some as to whether consanguinity in the second degree of the collateral line is a divine law impediment. In fact, on at least one occasion, Pope Paul VI, asserting that it was a matter of ecclesiastical law, granted a dispensation to permit the convalidation of the marriage of a blood half brother and sister. See CLD 9, 627–628.

[18] CCEO 795, §2 allows the patriarch of an Eastern church sui iuris to dispense from the impediments arising from conjugicide and from a perpetual vow of chastity.

[19] See the commentary on c. 1088.

[20] See the commentary on c. 90.

[21] EM viii, CLD 6, 397.

Dispensations in Situations of Danger of Death

Canon 1079 — §1. In urgent danger of death, the local ordinary can dispense his own subjects residing anywhere and all actually present in his territory both from the form to be observed in the celebration of marriage and from each and every impediment of ecclesiastical law, whether public or occult, except the impediment arising from the sacred order of presbyterate.

§2. In the same circumstances mentioned in §1, but only for cases in which the local ordinary cannot be reached, the pastor, the properly delegated sacred minister, and the priest or deacon who assists at marriage according to the norm of can. 1116, §2 possess the same power of dispensing.

§3. In danger of death a confessor possesses the power of dispensing from occult impediments for the internal forum, whether within or outside the act of sacramental confession.

§4. In the case mentioned in §2, the local ordinary is not considered accessible if he can be reached only through telegraph or telephone.

In situations of danger of death, the law expands both the scope of the authority of local officials to dispense from matrimonial impediments and the range of authorities empowered to do so. A person is considered to be "in urgent danger of death" (urgente mortis periculo) not only when death is imminent (in articulo mortis) but also when a life-threatening condition is present or very near and the person's survival or death is equally probable. The life-threatening condition can come from within (e.g., illness) or from without (e.g., capital punishment, major surgery, impending combat). It is not necessary that both parties be in danger of death or that the one in danger of death be the cause of the impediment.

In situations of danger of death, the local ordinary can dispense from all ecclesiastical law impediments except the impediment arising from the order of presbyterate. Thus, the scope of the local ordinary's dispensing power is expanded in these situations to include the impediments arising from the diaconate, a perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute of pontifical right, and crime. He is also empowered to dispense from the observance of the canonical form of marriage, even if both parties are Catholic. However, even in these dire situations, the local ordinary cannot dispense from the impediments considered to be based in divine law. While a just cause for a dispensation is required even in danger-of-death situations, it seems that it would always be for the spiritual good of the parties to dispense when death threatens.

When the local ordinary cannot be reached in a danger-of-death-situation, the law extends the power to dispense to pastors, presbyters, and deacons who are properly delegated to assist at the marriage in question, and presbyters or deacons who lack the faculty to witness the marriage but who are present for its celebration according to the extraordinary form (c. 1116, §2). In these circumstances, pastors and sacred ministers who are either delegated to witness a marriage or present for an extraordinary form celebration enjoy the same competence as local ordinaries to dispense from ecclesiastical law impediments and from observance of the canonical form. Notably absent from this list of persons who may dispense in danger-of-death situations is the lay person delegated to assist at marriages (c. 1112).

Canon 1079, §4 incorporates into the code a 1922 authentic interpretation by the then code commission clarifying when the local ordinary is to be considered inaccessible in danger-of-death situations.[22] The local ordinary is considered inaccessible if he can be reached only by telephone or telegraph. A fortiori, he is inaccessible if he can be reached by facsimile transmission or electronic mail. Positively stated, the local ordinary is considered accessible if a petition for a dispensation can be brought to him in person or by ordinary mail. Thus, the accessibility of the local ordinary is dependent on the efficiency of local mail and transportation services. Commentators on the 1917 code noted that it was not necessary to use the time needed to deliver a petition by air mail as the criterion for determining the accessibility of the local ordinary. By analogy, it is not necessary to send the petition by express mail or next day service by a commercial carrier.

Even if the local ordinary is accessible in danger-of-death situations, confessors may dispense from occult impediments for the internal forum. In situations of danger of death, every validly ordained presbyter is to be considered a legitimate confessor (c. 976). Unlike canon 1044 of the 1917 code, canon 1079, §3 does not make the dispensing power of confessors in danger-of-death situations coextensive with that of local ordinaries or restrict the confessor's use of this faculty to danger-of-death situations when the local ordinary is inaccessible. In danger-of-death situations, the confessor can dispense only from occult impediments but the law places no explicit restriction on the occult impediments from which he can dispense. A confessor cannot dispense from the so-called divine law impediments in danger-of-death situations. However, the designation of his competence as "occult impediments" with no further qualification does not seem to exclude his dispensing from the impediment arising from the order of presbyterate if this impediment were truly occult.

The confessor's dispensing power in danger-of-death situations is explicitly limited to occult impediments. However, it is disputed whether the phrase "occult impediments" in this canon is to be understood as occult impediments in the strict sense of those that cannot be proved in the external forum (c. 1074) or in the more popular sense of those which are de facto unknown when it can be prudently foreseen that they will not be divulged in the future. The discussions of the code revision committee suggest that it was the latter sense that was intended.[23] However, since dispensing power is to be strictly interpreted (c. 92), canon 1079, §3 should be understood as limiting the dispensing power of confessors to "occult impediments" in the strict sense. Moreover, the confessor's dispensing power does not extend to the canonical form of marriage.

[22] CodCom, November 12, 1922, AAS 14 (1922) 662; CLD 1, 502.

[23] Comm 9 (1977) 348–350.

The 1917 code had restricted the dispensing power of confessors to the internal sacramental forum, i.e., to the act of sacramental confession. At the suggestion of the Apostolic Penitentiary,[24] the current legislation extends that competence in danger-of-death situations to the internal non-sacramental forum as well.

Dispensations When Everything Is Prepared for the Wedding

Canon 1080 — §1. Whenever an impediment is discovered after everything has already been prepared for the wedding, and the marriage cannot be delayed without probable danger of grave harm until a dispensation is obtained from the competent authority, the local ordinary and, provided that the case is occult, all those mentioned in can. 1079, §§2–3 when the conditions prescribed therein have been observed possess the power of dispensing from all impediments except those mentioned in can. 1078, §2, n. 1.

§2. This power is valid even to convalidate a marriage if there is the same danger in delay and there is insufficient time to make recourse to the Apostolic See or to the local ordinary concerning impediments from which he is able to dispense.

The law makes provision for dispensation from impediments in other situations which are less dire than danger of death but, nonetheless, extraordinary, namely, when an impediment is discovered only after everything has been prepared for the wedding. An impediment is "discovered" not when it becomes known to the public or to the parties themselves but when it comes to the attention of the local ordinary or the pastor responsible for preparing the couple for marriage.[25] Thus, if the parties either inadvertently or intentionally fail to reveal the existence of an impediment until shortly before the wedding, it is not considered to have been discovered until it is actually divulged. On the other hand, the conditions for the exercise of the dispensing power regulated by canon 1080 are not meant to include cases when the pastor is aware of the existence of the impediment but neglects to seek a dispensation from the competent authority until the wedding is imminent.

There is a lack of unanimity among commentators on when everything is to be considered prepared for the wedding. It is clear that the dispensing power of canon 1080 must be strictly interpreted (c. 92). However, to subject it to such a strict interpretation that the dispensing power is rendered unusable would thwart the purpose of the law. To insist that each and every preparation for the marriage be made before a hitherto undisclosed impediment could be dispensed would, in practice, limit the use of this dispensing power to rare cases when the impediment is discovered in the sacristy minutes before the wedding is to begin. On the other hand, to allow this dispensing power to be exercised when an impediment is discovered after a wedding date has been set or after the required canonical examination of the spouses (c. 1067)[26] has taken place would ignore the clear meaning of the words of the canon and implicitly encourage lackadaisical marriage preparation.

Canon 1080 clearly intends to provide for dispensations from impediments in cases of grave and urgent necessity other than situations of danger of death when the authority ordinarily competent to grant the dispensations cannot be reached. The canon establishes two criteria for the exercise of dispensing power: (1) everything has already been prepared for the wedding and (2) the marriage cannot be delayed until a dispensation can be obtained from the competent authority without "probable danger of grave harm." These two criteria are not independent of but complementary to one another. The more preparations that have been made for the wedding and the shorter the time until its celebration, the more probable the danger of harm and the more grave this harm resulting from a delay of the wedding will become. The harm is not simply financial, but especially spiritual in nature. Nevertheless, the exercise of dispensing power in these extraordinary circumstances still requires a sufficient cause for granting the dispensation, a cause which is independent of the urgency of the situation.

[24] Ibid., 350.

[25] CodCom, March 1, 1921, CLD 1, 502.

[26] Fornés, in Pamplona ComEng, 673–674.

In these urgent situations, the dispensing power of the local ordinary is extended slightly to encompass the impediment of crime. However, the praxis of the Holy See suggests that there is rarely if ever sufficient cause to dispense from this impediment if it is public. The local ordinary still cannot dispense from divine law impediments or from the reserved impediments arising from any sacred order and a perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute of pontifical right. Nor can he dispense from the observance of the canonical form in the urgent situations foreseen by canon 1080.

When the local ordinary is inaccessible (in the sense described in canon 1079, §4) in situations where everything is prepared for the wedding before the impediment is discovered, pastors, sacred ministers who are properly delegated for the marriage or are participating in an extraordinary form celebration, and confessors (but not lay ministers delegated in accord with canon 1112) have the same dispensing power as local ordinaries. However, their dispensing power extends only to "occult cases." This category is broader than that of occult impediments and includes not only impediments that cannot be proved in the external forum but also those that are public in nature but are de facto occult.[27] Since pastors and the others mentioned in canon 1080 are authorized to dispense only for occult cases in omnia parata situations, the dispensation is usually granted in the internal forum.

Dispensing power for situations when an impediment is detected only after all preparations for the wedding have been made is applicable as well to convalidations of invalidly attempted marriages.[28] However, convalidations often involve much less extensive and expensive social preparations than weddings and allow for much more flexible scheduling. Thus, in the case of a convalidation it may be difficult to demonstrate the urgency required to resort to the dispensing power of canon 1080.

Recording Dispensations

Canon 1081 — The pastor or the priest or deacon mentioned in can. 1079, §2 is to notify the local ordinary immediately about a dispensation granted for the external forum; it is also to be noted in the marriage register.

Dispensations from matrimonial impediments in the external forum are public records with juridic effects. Therefore, they should be committed to writing even if they are granted orally (c. 37) and should be recorded in the curia where they were granted or, in the case of a dispensation granted by the Holy See, the curia from which the dispensation was requested, as well as in the matrimonial register of the place where the marriage was celebrated (c. 1121). The rescript granting the dispensation is usually retained in the prenuptial file in the parish where the marriage was celebrated or, in the case of a dispensation from the observance of the canonical form for a mixed marriage, in the parish of the Catholic party from which the petition for a dispensation came. When a dispensation is granted for the external forum by someone other than the local ordinary in a danger-of-death situation, that person must report the fact to the local ordinary and to the pastor so that it can be properly recorded.

Canon 1082 — Unless a rescript of the Penitentiary provides otherwise, a dispensation from an occult impediment granted in the non-sacramental internal forum is to be noted in a book which must be kept in the secret archive of the curia; no other dispensation for the external forum is necessary if afterwards the occult impediment becomes public.

[27] CodCom, December 28, 1927, III, CLD 1, 503.

[28] See the commentary on cc. 1156–1160.

A dispensation granted for the internal non-sacramental forum is also to be recorded, but in a manner that preserves the couple's privacy and the occult character of the impediment or case. The ordinary way of recording these dispensations is to enter them in a special book to be maintained in the secret archives of the diocesan curia.[29] When a dispensation has been granted in the internal non-sacramental forum, the one who granted it will have to approach the diocesan bishop, who alone has a key to the secret archive (c. 490, §1), in order to record the dispensation. Pastors and the others mentioned in canon 1079, §2 as well as confessors who dispense from occult impediments in danger-of-death situations or from impediments in occult cases in other urgent situations will also have to approach the diocesan bishop to fulfill their obligation to see that the dispensations are properly recorded.

If those who grant these dispensations were required to reveal the names of the parties and the nature of the impediment to the diocesan bishop in order to have the dispensation recorded, the confidentiality of the internal forum would be breached. Thus, they should inform the bishop only of their need for access to the secret archives to record dispensations, and they should be permitted to record them personally. The special book for this purpose should be arranged so that those recording dispensations cannot see previous entries. These dispensations are not to be recorded in parish marriage registers.

When the Apostolic Penitentiary grants dispensations in the internal non-sacramental forum, it sometimes attaches provisions to its rescripts mandating an alternate method for recording these dispensations. Such dispensations are always recorded in the secret archive of the Apostolic Penitentiary itself. However, whether the dispensation is to be recorded in the particular church and what form it is to take must be determined from the rescript in the particular case.[30] Rescripts from the Penitentiary sometimes prohibit revelation of the dispensation to the diocesan bishop, presumably because he previously had refused to grant it or his knowledge of the circumstances attendant to the dispensation would prejudice his ability to conduct the external forum governance of the diocese (c. 984).

When a dispensation has been granted in the internal non-sacramental forum because an impediment or case is occult, no additional dispensation is required for the external forum if the impediment subsequently becomes public. Dispensations granted by confessors for the internal sacramental forum are not to be recorded anywhere, nor can the confessor attest to its granting should the existence of the impediment later become public. To record the dispensation or attest to its granting would violate the sacramental seal (c. 983). Thus, when an impediment legitimately dispensed by a confessor in the internal sacramental forum becomes public, a new dispensation and a convalidation of the marriage may be necessary for the external forum.

CHAPTER III
DIRIMENT IMPEDIMENTS SPECIFICALLY[31]
[cc. 1083–1094][32]

Lack of Age

Canon 1083 — §1. A man before he has completed his sixteenth year of age and a woman before she has completed her fourteenth year of age cannot enter into a valid marriage.

[29] See the commentary on cc. 489–490.

[30] For an example of a case where the dispensation was to be recorded in the secret archive of the parish from which the petition arose, see CLD 1, 503.

[31] See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 764–774; Fornés, in Pamplona ComEng, 674–684; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 598–610; Lüdicke, in Münster Com, 1083/1–1094/2; J. Banares and J. Mantecón, in Com Ex, 1160–1210.

[32] CCEO 800–812.

§2. The conference of bishops is free to establish a higher age for the licit celebration of marriage.

Matrimonial consent is an act of the will which establishes between the spouses a partnership of the whole of life, which, of its nature, is exclusive and perpetual (cc. 1055, §1 and 1057, §2). To give valid consent, a person must possess sufficient intellectual and emotional maturity to appreciate and assume the responsibility for lifelong obligations and the physical maturity to consummate the marriage by sexual relations. Even ancient societies recognized that a person's chronological age is an important indicator of the attainment of both intellectual-emotional and physical maturity. Thus, to avert the often detrimental effects of youthful marriages on the spouses, their children, and the common good, societies, including the Church, have long stipulated a minimum age for entering marriage.

In Roman law the minimum age for marriage was fourteen for men and twelve for women. These were the ages by which most young people had reached biological puberty. Fourteen was also the age at which boys were freed from guardianship and acquired the full rights of citizenship.[33] Thus, the law presumed that by these ages young people had achieved both the physical and the intellectual-emotional maturity necessary for marriage. Although some jurists held that this law was merely a presumption that ceded to contrary proof, Justinian established fourteen and twelve as the statutory ages for the marriage of men and women, regardless of when biological puberty actually occurred.[34] Since the emperor was more actively involved in the life of the Church in the East than in the West, Eastern canon law incorporated many imperial constitutions.[35] In this way, legal puberty rather than actual puberty became the minimum age for marriage in the Eastern churches.

In the West, however, the Church received the Roman law on the minimum age for marriage as a rebuttable presumption rather than as a strict legal norm. Preoccupation with the parties' capacity for sexual intercourse soon overshadowed concern for their capacity for personal responsibility. Marriages were not recognized as valid until the man had completed his fourteenth year and the woman her twelfth, unless the couple demonstrated that they had actually reached puberty by engaging in sexual relations. In these cases, "wickedness had supplied for [lack of] age."[36] Actual puberty rather than legal puberty remained the norm in the West until the 1917 code.

The 1917 code raised the minimum age for marriage to sixteen for men and fourteen for women and invalidated marriages entered into before these minimum ages regardless of the level of physical and psychological maturity the partners had attained.[37] The 1983 code retains these minimum ages for valid marriage. Thus, a marriage is invalid if it is entered into by a man who has not yet completed his sixteenth year or by a woman who has not yet completed her fourteenth year.[38]

Although the natural law invalidates marriages of those who lack sufficient psychological maturity for matrimonial consent (c. 1095), the impediment of lack of age is a matter of ecclesiastical law. The local ordinary can dispense from the impediment for a sufficiently grave cause, but prudence suggests that such dispensations should rarely be granted.[39] The impediment invalidates

[33] S. Treggiari, Roman Marriage (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991) 39–43. See also F. Ameriso, El fundamento del impedimento de edad (Rome: Athenaeum Romanum Sanctae Crucis, 1995) 19–32.

[34] Cod. 5.60.3. See W. Onclin, "L'âge requis pour le mariage dans la doctrine canonique médiéval," Proceedings of the Second International Congress of Medieval Canon Law, in Monumenta Iuris Canonici, Series E: Subsidia 1 (Vatican City: Sacra Congegatio de Seminariis et Studiorum Institutibus, 1965) 237; and Ameriso, 25–32.

[35] See C. van de Wiel, History of Canon Law (Louvain: Peeters, 1991) 30–32, 41–45.

[36] X, 4.2.9.

[37] CIC 1067.

[38] See c. 203, §2 on the computation of time.

[39] Gasparri noted that "the necessary discretion of mind, even if it is had before this age, is weak, and the use of marriage usually greatly harms the health both of parents marriages involving at least one Catholic party, whether the party who lacks the required age is Catholic or not. Unbaptized persons are bound by minimum age requirements established by civil authority. Eastern non-Catholics are bound by the impediment of lack of age in their own law (CCEO 780, §2, 1°). Eastern code canon 780, §2, 2° suggests that other non-Catholics are bound by the minimum age requirement of the law of their own church or ecclesial community, if there is one, or by that of civil law, if their church or ecclesial community defers to it.

During the code revision process, it was suggested that the minimum age for marriage be raised to spare young people the tragedy of divorce, which, experience shows, is often the fate of youthful marriages, and to bring ecclesiastical law into conformity with the civil law of many places.[40] These suggestions were rejected, however, because it was thought a code for the universal Church should not legislate in light of conditions prevailing only in some regions and because marriage is a natural right whose exercise should not be unduly restricted.[41] As a concession, however, the code authorizes episcopal conferences to establish for their territories a higher minimum age for marriage than the one specified in the code. However, this higher age would not affect a marriage's validity but only its liceity.

To set such a higher age for marriage is to establish an impedient impediment, that is, one that renders marriage illicit but not invalid. Since this provision is an exception to the law that only the supreme authority of the Church can establish impediments (c. 1075, §2), it must be strictly interpreted (c. 18). Thus, no ecclesiastical authority below the level of the episcopal conference may establish an age for marriage higher than the one set by the code. However, if there is sufficient evidence of immaturity, local ordinaries can prohibit the celebration of particular marriages until the young people give evidence of the required maturity.[42] and children." P. Gasparri, De Matrimonio (Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis, 1932) n. 493.

[40] See Comm 9 (1977) 360.

[41] Ibid. See also U. Navarrete, "Gli impedimenti relativi alla dignità dell'uomo: aetas, raptus, crimen," in Gli impedimenti al matrimonio canonico, Studi giuridici 19 (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1989) 73–77.

Impotence

Canon 1084 — §1. Antecedent and perpetual impotence to have intercourse, whether on the part of the man or the woman, whether absolute or relative, nullifies marriage by its very nature.

§2. If the impediment of impotence is doubtful, whether by a doubt about the law or a doubt about a fact, a marriage must not be impeded nor, while the doubt remains, declared null.

§3. Sterility neither prohibits nor nullifies marriage, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1098.

The Nature of Impotence

Impotence is the incapacity of a spouse to perform a complete conjugal act. To be potent, a man must have a penis, be capable of maintaining an erection long enough to penetrate the vagina at least partially, and to ejaculate there; a woman must have a vagina and be capable of receiving the erect penis. While plastic surgery may be able to create an artificial vagina where one is lacking or to open or widen one that is severely occluded, these procedures are dangerous and painful and are, therefore, considered to be extraordinary medical means, to which resort need not be made.

By defining the impotence that gives rise to an impediment as "impotence to have intercourse [impotentia coeundi]," the 1983 code has settled several controverted jurisprudential issues. A woman is not considered impotent but sterile if she lacks post-vaginal reproductive organs, either because of a defect of nature or because of surgical intervention, or if her vagina does not open into the uterus.[43] The definition of impotence also implicitly incorporates a 1977 CDF ruling on the nature of male impotence. Following Sixtus VI's 1587 constitution Cum frequenter,[44] many distinguished canonists held that a man was impotent if he could not ejaculate semen articulated in his testicles, whether the incapacity was the result of a natural defect, an accident, or surgery.[45] In a 1977 decree, the CDF ruled that impotence results only from incapacity for complete conjugal intercourse and not from the composition of the ejaculate.[46]

[42] See the commentary on c. 1077.

Canonists distinguish between organic and functional impotence. Organic impotence results from the absence, malformation, or underdevelopment of the genital organs, which renders the completion of intercourse impossible. Functional impotence results from a nervous or psychological condition that prevents the person from completing the act of sexual intercourse despite his or her possession of intact genital organs. Either type of impotence can be absolute or relative. Absolute impotence prevents marital relations with any partner; relative impotence renders one incapable of marital relations only with some partners.

Antecedence and Perpetuity

To invalidate marriage, impotence must be both antecedent to the exchange of consent and perpetual. If a person's inability to complete a conjugal act emerges during the first attempt at marital relations and continues thereafter, the antecedence of the impotence can often be presumed. The existence and antecedence of organic impotence can often be proved by the testimony of medical experts who have examined the affected person. Organic impotence is considered perpetual when it cannot be cured by licit and ordinary means. Licit means are forms of treatment that do not violate Christian sexual morality. What constitutes ordinary or extraordinary treatment depends on the state of medical science and the practical availability of treatments to affected persons.

Rotal judges have been reluctant to find that functional impotence is either antecedent or perpetual, especially when it does not have a psychosomatic substratum.[47] Since it is often difficult to identify the precise cause of functional impotence, judges cannot easily rule out the possibility that the post-marital conditions (including such things as "performance anxiety" at the time of attempts at consummation) contributed to this impotence. It can also be difficult to reach certainty about the perpetuity of functional impotence when its cause or causes are purely psychological in nature.

The different standards of certainty used respectively by medical experts and judges have fostered misunderstandings in impotence cases before tribunals. Scientific certainty (what Pius XII called "absolute certainty"[48]) is the standard used by medical experts when they offer their prognoses in impotence cases. Thus, they tend to couch their opinions in language that suggests they harbor prudent doubts about the perpetuity of impotence ("It is very likely," "I am inclined to believe"). This cautious language can lead a judge unfamiliar with the standard of certainty being used by experts to conclude erroneously that they cannot reach moral certainty (the exclusion of a well-founded doubt but not the absolute possibility of the contrary[49]) about the perpetuity of impotence in a particular case.[50] Only such moral certainty is required in church tribunals.

[43] Comm 6 (1974) 196–197. See G. Candelier, "Impuissance: Empêchement et signe d'une incapacité," RDC 44 (1994) 101–108. For a debate regarding whether the absence of post-vaginal organs constitutes impotence, see F. Cappello, De Matrimonio (Rome: Marietti, 1961) nn. 354–358.

[44] CICFontes 1:298–299.

[45] Cappello, De Matrimonio, nn. 343 and 377; Gasparri, n. 506; Wernz-Vidal, 5: nn. 224 and 232.

[46] CDF, decree, May 13, 1977, AAS 69 (1977) 426; CLD 8, 676–677.

[47] See Candelier, 108–124.

[48] Pius XII, alloc, October 1, 1942, AAS 34 (1942) 339.

[49] Ibid., 360.

[50] Coram Serrano, October 22, 1971, SRRDec 63 (1980) 770. See Candelier, 112–117.

Doubts about Impotence

Since the impediment of impotence is intimately connected to the essential purposes of marriage, it is generally considered to derive from divine natural law. It is not, therefore, subject to dispensation. Nevertheless, doubts can easily arise about the existence of impotence and about its antecedence or perpetuity. These doubts can be about the law (e.g., whether the 1977 CDF decree on "true semen" has retroactive effect) or about the facts of a concrete case (e.g., whether the impotence of a particular paraplegic is perpetual). Since the impediment of impotence restricts the free exercise of the natural right to marry, marriage is to be impeded only if the existence of the impediment is certain. Thus, if a doubt about impotence arises but cannot be resolved prior to a marriage, the person is to be permitted to marry.

As long as prudent doubt about the existence of impotence or its antecedence or perpetuity persists, the marriage may not be declared null. This is simply a practical application of the principle that, once properly celebrated, a marriage is presumed to be valid until the contrary is proven (c. 1060). In many doubtful cases, however, it is possible to refer the matter to the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments with a petition for the dissolution of the unconsummated marriage.

Sterility

While impotence, the incapacity to complete a conjugal act, invalidates marriage, sterility, the incapacity to generate offspring, does not. In matrimonial consent, the spouses exchange the perpetual and exclusive right to conjugal acts per se apt for the generation of children, but not the right to have children. Although marriage is of its nature ordered to the procreation and education of children (c. 1055, §1), the Church has long held that those incapable of procreation still have the right to marry. Thus, Gaudium et spes 50 insisted:

> Marriage to be sure is not instituted solely for procreation.... Therefore, marriage persists as a whole manner and communion of life, and maintains its value and indissolubility, even when offspring are lacking—despite, rather often, the very intense desire of the couple.

Although sterility itself does not invalidate marriage, it may be a circumstance that suggests an invalidating defect of consent. Sterility is a quality that can seriously disrupt the partnership of conjugal life. Hence, a marriage may be invalid because of deceit, if, to induce the other party to marry, one party deliberately fails to disclose his or her sterility (c. 1098). Voluntary sterilization (tubal ligation or vasectomy) shortly before or after marriage may be an index of an intention against the good of children (c. 1101, §2).

Prior Marriage Bond

Canon 1085 — §1. A person bound by the bond of a prior marriage, even if it was not consummated, invalidly attempts marriage.

§2. Even if the prior marriage is invalid or dissolved for any reason, it is not on that account permitted to contract another before the nullity or dissolution of the prior marriage is established legitimately and certainly.

Valid matrimonial consent gives rise to a perpetual and exclusive bond (vinculum) between the spouses, whether they are baptized or not (c. 1134). At least since the time of Augustine, this bond has been understood to be not merely moral but ontological in nature.[51] That is, the continued existence of the marriage bond even after the existential breakdown of the marital relationship renders a new marriage during the lifetime of one's spouse not only immoral but impossible.

This long tradition was reaffirmed in personalist language by the Second Vatican Council:

[51] See the commentary before c. 1141.

> [Marriage] is rooted in the conjugal covenant of irrevocable personal consent.... For the good of the spouses and their offspring as well as of society, the existence of this sacred bond no longer depends on human decisions alone.... As a mutual gift of two persons, this intimate union, as well as the good of the children, imposes total fidelity on the spouses and argues for an unbreakable oneness between them.[52]

The impediment of prior bond is generally understood to have its source in divine law, both positive and natural. As a result, the impediment invalidates all subsequent marriages, not merely those of Catholics. The divine law origin of the impediment of prior bond also entails that it is not dispensed even in danger-of-death situations. However, the impediment ceases with the death of one of the spouses. In some cases, moreover, the bond can be dissolved. Unconsummated sacramental marriages can be dissolved (the canons speak of "dispensation") by the Roman Pontiff for a just cause at the request of one of the spouses (c. 1142). Marriages entered into by two unbaptized persons can be dissolved in virtue of the Pauline privilege after the baptism of one of them and the departure of the still unbaptized spouse (c. 1143). Non-sacramental marriages can be dissolved by the Roman Pontiff in favor of the faith of a Catholic party.[53] Only the bond arising from sacramental, consummated marriages is not subject to dissolution.

The impediment of prior bond arises only from a valid marriage, whether it is consummated or not. Its existence is presumed once the marriage has been lawfully celebrated (c. 1060). A declaration of nullity is an assertion that a particular union gave rise to no bond. Thus, when a marriage is declared null, a new marriage entered after the civil divorce but before the formal declaration of nullity may be valid.

[52] GS 48.

[53] See the commentary after c. 1149.

To avoid confusion and uncertainty about the validity of second and subsequent marriages, canon 1085, §2 prohibits the celebration of a new marriage until the nullity or dissolution of all the party's previous marriages is legitimately proven. Some see this prohibition as an ecclesiastical law impediment of prior bond, which complements the divine law impediment.[54] Whether or not it should be classified as an impediment, the prohibition does not invalidate marriages entered into in violation of it (c. 10) and does not bind non-Catholics when they marry among themselves (c. 11). If a Catholic re-marries according to the canonical form after a divorce but before a declaration of nullity is granted, the marriage is illicit but valid and need not be convalidated after the previous marriage is declared null. The validity of second and subsequent marriages of two non-Catholics depends on whether their previous marriage was, in fact, valid. However, their first marriages are presumed to be valid until the contrary is proven (c. 1060). Since an ecclesiastical dissolution terminates a valid bond, marriages entered before dissolutions are granted are invalid.

Those who maintain that canon 1085, §2 establishes a distinct impediment of ecclesiastical law have also advanced a novel approach to dealing in a tribunal setting with a petitioner who had multiple marriages. They propose that the tribunal declare the petitioner's second and subsequent marriages invalid on the ground of the impediment of prior bond and then declare the nullity of the first union, the presumed source of the impediment, on the ground of some defect of consent. This approach, while convenient, has been "directly condemned" by the Apostolic Signatura as having [54] F. Morrisey, "The Impediment of Ligamen and Multiple Marriages," J 40 (1980) 406–418; and B. Griffin, "The Samaritan Woman and the Matrimonial Tribunal," in Marriage Studies II, ed. T. Doyle (Washington: CLSA, 1982) 99–110. For a critique of this position, see J. Johnson, "Ligamen and Multiple Marriages: Too Good to Be True?" J 42 (1982) 222–228.

"no trace in law or approved doctrine."[55] A tribunal must deal with each of a petitioner's marriages as a separate case and on its own merits.

Disparity of Worship

Canon 1086 — §1. A marriage between two persons, one of whom has been baptized in the Catholic Church or received into it and has not defected from it by a formal act and the other of whom is not baptized, is invalid.

§2. A person is not to be dispensed from this impediment unless the conditions mentioned in cann. 1125 and 1126 have been fulfilled.

§3. If at the time the marriage was contracted one party was commonly held to have been baptized or the baptism was doubtful, the validity of the marriage must be presumed according to the norm of can. 1060 until it is proven with certainty that one party was baptized but the other was not.

The Church has long recognized that marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics pose particular dangers to the Catholic's continued practice of the faith and to the Catholic baptism and formation of children. The Church's concern is especially grave when a Catholic proposes to marry a non-Christian. As an expression of this concern, ecclesiastical law has established the impediment of disparity of worship, which invalidates marriages between Catholics and unbaptized persons.

Although marriages between Christians and pagans were prohibited by several early councils, disparity of worship was established as an invalidating impediment for the Eastern churches at the Council of Trullo in 692.[56] Although the canons of Trullo were not received by the Church in the West, the impediment spread throughout the West between the seventh and the eleventh centuries and ultimately obtained the force of a universal custom. It was finally incorporated into church legislation in canon 1070 of the 1917 code.

As an ecclesiastical law impediment, disparity of worship binds only Catholics and those who marry them. Exempt from the impediment are baptized non-Catholics and those who have left the Catholic Church by a formal act.[57] However, Eastern non-Catholics (i.e., Orthodox) remain bound by the impediment of their own church's law which invalidates marriages between the baptized and the unbaptized (CCEO 781, 1°).

A dispensation can be granted to permit a Catholic to marry an unbaptized person if there is sufficient assurance that the proposed marriage will not pose a threat to the Catholic's ability to continue the practice of his or her faith and to hand on the Catholic faith to their children. This assurance is given the Catholic party in the form of promises (cautiones). He or she must declare a readiness to remove all dangers of lapsing from the Catholic faith and promise to do all within his or her power to ensure the Catholic baptism and formation of all children. The unbaptized party is not required to make a promise, but must be made aware of what the Catholic party has promised.[58] If this declaration and promise are not made, a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship is invalid.

When, at the time a marriage was celebrated, one of the parties was generally reputed to be baptized or doubts had arisen about his or her baptism or its validity, the validity of the marriage is to be upheld until it has been proven that one party was baptized and the other was not. However, if the doubts about the baptism of one party or its validity surfaced prior to the marriage, the impediment of disparity of worship can be dispensed conditionally (ad cautelam) if the doubt cannot be resolved.[59]

Sacred Orders

Canon 1087 — Those in sacred orders invalidly attempt marriage.

[55] ApSig, "Procedure to Deal With Serial (i.e., Multiple and Successive) Marriages," RRAO 1987, 60.

[56] Council of Trullo, c. 72.

[57] See the commentary on c. 1117 for a discussion of the notion of leaving the Catholic Church by a formal act.

[58] See the commentary on cc. 1125–1126.

[59] See the commentary on c. 869, §§1–2.

From its origin, the Church has cherished the charisms of virginity and celibacy as witnesses to the Kingdom of God. Consequently, the celibate state was seen as particularly appropriate, even if not strictly required, for ordained ministers. As celibates, the ordained > more easily hold fast to [Christ] with undivided heart. They more freely devote themselves to Him and through Him to the service of God and men. They more readily minister to His kingdom and to the work of heavenly generation, and thus become more apt to exercise paternity in Christ, and do so to a great extent. (PO 16)

It was only gradually, however, that the Latin church came to require celibacy of most candidates for ordained ministry (c. 1042, 1°) and to establish sacred orders as an impediment to marriage.

As the qualification in the pastoral epistles that various ministers "be married only once" suggests,[60] the early Church routinely ordained married men. Nevertheless, once ordained, these ministers were prohibited from marrying if they were unmarried at the time of their ordinations or from remarrying if their wives died. Ordained ministers who married in violation of this prohibition were subject to the penalty of deposition but their marriages were not declared invalid.[61] The Eastern churches have continued the tradition of ordaining married men but of subjecting those who attempt marriage after ordination to the penalty of deposition (CCEO 1453, §2). Moreover, the impediment of sacred orders now invalidates these attempted marriages (CCEO 804).

In the West, from the early fourth century there were periodic movements to require continence of all ordained ministers, even those who were married, and to prohibit the ordained from marrying. The prohibition of marriage by ordained ministers was enforced by threatening penal sanctions such as deposition rather than by invalidating their marriages. However, the Second Lateran Council in 1139 established the sacred orders of bishop, presbyter, deacon, and subdeacon as a diriment impediment to marriage. The rationale given for this impediment was that ordination entailed a tacit solemn vow of chastity.[62]

The impediment of sacred orders arises from the valid reception of the orders of bishop, presbyter, and deacon. In addition, the one ordained must have received the order freely and with sufficient knowledge of his obligation not to marry (or, in the case of one who is already married at the time of his ordination, not to remarry).[63] Ignorance of this obligation cannot be presumed (c. 15, §2). The requirements that all candidates for ordination attest in writing that they are receiving sacred orders "of [their] own accord and freely" (c. 1036) and that unmarried candidates publicly assume the obligation of celibacy or perpetual vows (c. 1037) are designed to ensure that candidates possess the requisite freedom and knowledge.

In ordinary circumstances, dispensations from the impediment of sacred orders are reserved to the Apostolic See. In danger-of-death situations, the local ordinary and, when he is not available, pastors and the others mentioned in canon 1079, §2 can dispense from the impediment arising from the order of deacon. The Apostolic See does not grant dispensations to those ordained to the episcopate. Dispensations from the impediment arising from the order of presbyter are normally granted only by the pope as part of the process of returning to the lay state (cc. 290, 3°; 291). Until recently dispensations from the impediment arising from the order of deacon were also rarely granted except as part of the process of return to the lay state. However, in a 1997 circular letter, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments expressed a willingness to dispense widowed permanent deacons from the impediment of sacred orders if their ministry is of [60] See 1 Tim 3:2 (bishops); 1 Tim 3:12 (deacons); Titus 1:6 (presbyters).

[61] Apostolic Constitutions 6, c. 17; Council of Neo-Caesarea, c. 1; Council of Trullo, cc. 3 and 6.

[62] Lateran II, c. 6; VI 3.15.

[63] Cappello, De Matrimonio, n. 437.

"great and proven usefulness" to their dioceses or they need assistance from wives to care for minor children or aging parents (including the aging parents of their deceased wives).[64]

A person in sacred orders who attempts marriage not only does so invalidly, but is subject to penal sanctions. He ipso facto loses any ecclesiastical office he may hold (c. 194, §1, 3°) and incurs a latae sententiae suspension. If he continues to give scandal after a warning, he can be subjected to progressively graver deprivations, including eventually dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1394, §1).

Perpetual Vow of Chastity

Canon 1088 — Those bound by a public perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute invalidly attempt marriage.

Throughout the history of the Church, men and women have sought to live together in community according to the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience. These communities eventually received recognition by the Church as what are now called institutes of consecrated life. The Church cherishes the celibate chastity promised and lived in these institutes.

> For it liberates the human heart in a unique way and causes it to burn with love for God and all mankind. It is therefore an outstanding token of heavenly riches, and also a most suitable way for religious to spend themselves readily in God's service and in works of the apostolate (PC 12).

Because of the incompatibility between marriage and the life of chaste celibacy in community promised in religious profession, the Church has made a public and perpetual vow of chastity in a religious institute an impediment to marriage.

A vow is "a deliberate and free promise made to God about a possible and better good [which] must be fulfilled by reason of the virtue of religion" (c. 1191, §1). A vow is public "if a legitimate superior accepts it in the name of the Church" (c. 1192, §1). A vow is perpetual if a person intends to be bound by it for the rest of his or her life; otherwise it is temporary. To give rise to an impediment, a public and perpetual vow of chastity must be made in a religious institute, i.e., "a society in which members, according to proper law, pronounce public vows, either perpetual or temporary which are to be renewed, however, when the period of time has elapsed, and lead a life of brothers or sisters in common" (c. 607, §2). Thus, the "sacred bonds" taken by members of secular institutes (c. 712) and some societies of apostolic life (c. 731, §2) do not give rise to an impediment to marriage.

Although the obligation to fulfill a vow derives from the virtue of religion, the impediment is a matter of ecclesiastical law. In ordinary circumstances, dispensations from the impediment are reserved to the Apostolic See for members of pontifical right institutes and to the local ordinary for members of diocesan right institutes. In danger-of-death situations, local ordinaries can also dispense members of pontifical right institutes, and when the local ordinary is unavailable, pastors and the others mentioned in canon 1079, §2 can dispense members of all religious institutes.

Although dispensations from the impediment alone are possible in theory, they are rarely granted in practice since marriage and the demands of religious life in community are radically incompatible. Hence, the usual practice is to dispense a religious who desires to marry from the obligation of observing all the vows as part of an indult of departure from the institute (cc. 691–693). When this indult is accepted by the member, both the obligation of the vows and the impediment based on them cease.

Religious who attempt marriage are ipso facto dismissed from their institutes (c. 694, §1, 2°). A religious who is not a cleric also incurs a latae sententiae interdict (c. 1394, §2).

[64] CDWDS, "Circular Letter to Diocesan Ordinaries and to Superiors General of Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life," June 6, 1997, Prot. N. 263/97, 8; Origins 27 (1997) 171.

Abduction

Canon 1089 — No marriage can exist between a man and a woman who has been abducted or at least detained with a view of contracting marriage with her unless the woman chooses marriage of her own accord after she has been separated from the captor and established in a safe and free place.

A corollary of the Church's acceptance of the principle that the personal consent of the parties alone constitutes marriage (c. 1057, §1) is that this consent must be free (c. 219). The freedom of this consent is inevitably called into question when one of the parties (usually the woman) has been violently abducted. To avoid uncertainty and protracted litigation about the freedom of consent in these cases, the Church has established the impediment of abduction. This impediment creates an unrebuttable presumption (praesumptio iuris et de iure) that, as long as she remains in the control of her abductor, the abducted woman lacks the freedom to consent to marriage with him.

For the impediment to arise, a woman must be abducted or kidnapped against her will or at least forcibly retained in a place to which the abductor has access.[65] The abductee could even be detained in her own home if the abductor has free access to it. The violence involved in the abduction or detention can be either physical (e.g., use of force) or moral (e.g., threats to harm the woman's family members or her reputation). Thus, the impediment does not arise when a woman more or less voluntarily cooperates in her being spirited away as in cases of elopement or seduction. The violence involved in the abduction or detention can be inflicted either by the abductor himself or by others acting as his agents.

The existence of the impediment also requires that the abduction or forcible detention be for the sake of marriage with the abductee. The impediment does not arise, therefore, in cases where the abduction was motivated by factors unrelated to marriage (e.g., ransom). However, an abduction or detention may begin for purposes other than marriage but later continue for the sake of marriage. In this case, the impediment arises only from the time when the abductor's intention changed.

The impediment ceases when the abducted woman is separated from her abductor and placed in a safe place, i.e., one where she is free from the abductor's power over her. Only when she is released from the abductor's control is the woman considered sufficiently free to decide whether she wishes to marry her onetime abductor. Since abduction is an ecclesiastical law impediment, it can be dispensed by the local ordinary while the woman is still in the abductor's power. The strong presumption of the woman's lack of freedom in these circumstances would, however, counsel against granting a dispensation.

Crime

Canon 1090 — §1. Anyone who with a view to entering marriage with a certain person has brought about the death of that person's spouse or of one's own spouse invalidly attempts this marriage.

§2. Those who have brought about the death of a spouse by mutual physical or moral cooperation also invalidly attempt a marriage together.

The "crime" that gives rise to an impediment to marriage is conjugicide, although historically the primary focus of this impediment was adultery.[66] The principle underlying this impediment is [65] While the Latin code establishes an impediment only for the abduction of a woman by a man, c. 806 in the Eastern code makes this impediment applicable also to situations where a woman has abducted a man.

[66] See Navarrete, "Gli impedimenti relativi alla dignità dell'uomo," 88–94; and Wernz-Vidal, Ius Canonicum, 5: n. 322.

that no one should receive a benefit as a direct result of his or her crime.

The impediment arises when, for the sake of marriage with a definite person, one murders his or her own spouse or the spouse of that other person. Since an impediment that restricts the free exercise of the right to marry must be interpreted strictly (c. 18), the impediment arises only when the marriage bond which ceases with the murder is a valid one. Otherwise, the crime involved would not be conjugicide but homicide.

It is not required that the other person participate in or even be aware of the murderer's actions and intent. It is required, however, that one's actions actually bring about the death of a spouse and that the murder be carried out for the purpose of marrying a certain person. Thus, the impediment does not arise from the accidental killing of one's own or another person's spouse. Nor is it sufficient that one murder one's own spouse for the purpose of becoming free to re-marry in general; the murder must open the way to a marriage with a definite person.

The impediment of crime also arises when two people conspire to bring about the death of the spouse of one of them. The impediment arises whether or not the murder was prompted by the conspirators' desire to marry, whether their cooperation in the murder was physical or moral, and whether the murder was carried out by the parties personally or through their agents.

The impediment of crime is of its nature relative but perpetual. In ordinary circumstances, a dispensation from the impediment is reserved to the Apostolic See, which does not usually grant the dispensation when the facts on which it is based are public.[67] In danger-of-death situations, the impediment can be dispensed by the local ordinary and, when he is not accessible, by pastors and the others mentioned in canon 1079, §2. In situations when the impediment is detected only after everything is prepared for the wedding, the local ordinary and, as long as it is an occult case and the local ordinary is inaccessible, pastors and the others mentioned in canon 1079, §§2–3 can dispense from the impediment. In the latter situation, however, it seems unlikely that there would be a sufficiently grave cause to dispense validly from the impediment.[68]

Consanguinity

Canon 1091 — §1. In the direct line of consanguinity marriage is invalid between all ancestors and descendants, both legitimate and natural.

§2. In the collateral line marriage is invalid up to and including the fourth degree.

§3. The impediment of consanguinity is not multiplied.

§4. A marriage is never permitted if doubt exists whether the partners are related by consanguinity in any degree of the direct line or in the second degree of the collateral line.

Consanguinity is the blood relationship between persons who descend, either legitimately or illegitimately, from a common ancestor. All societies, both ancient and modern, have attempted to prevent marriage between close blood relatives. This aversion to consanguineous marriages has its roots in the near universal incest taboo and the experience of the deleterious effects on family harmony and stability of tolerating sexual relations between close relatives. In more modern times, the opposition to these marriages has been buttressed by scientific data about their negative genetic consequences for children.

The canonical impediment of consanguinity was influenced by Mosaic law[69] and Roman law[70] prohibitions of marriages between those related by blood or marriage. Between the sixth and the tenth centuries, however, the Church shifted the method of computing degrees of consanguinity from the Roman practice of counting the persons descending from a common ancestor to the Ger-

[67] T. Bouscaren and A. Ellis, Canon Law (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1946) 487.

[68] See the commentary on c. 90.

[69] Lev 18:6–18.

[70] Treggiari, Roman Marriage, 37–39.

manic practice of counting the generations after the common ancestor. At the same time, the scope of the impediment was expanded so that it invalidated marriage up to and including the seventh generation of the collateral line. While this expansion of the impediment (and a similar expansion of the impediment of affinity) strongly encouraged exogamy, it also caused an explosion of annulment cases. The Fourth Lateran Council reduced the scope of the impediment to the fourth generation in the collateral line.[71] The impediment was further reduced to the third generation in the collateral line by canon 1076, §2 of the 1917 code.

The 1983 code has returned to the Roman law method of computing degrees of consanguinity by counting persons descending from a common ancestor.[72] Consanguinity invalidates marriage in all degrees of the direct line (father-daughter-granddaughter) and up to the fourth degree of the collateral line inclusive (first cousins). The impediment of consanguinity no longer invalidates marriages of second cousins (sixth degree of the collateral line in the current method of computation, third degree in the old).[73]

Commentators agree that consanguinity in any degree of the direct line is a divine law impediment and that consanguinity in the third and fourth degrees of the collateral line is an ecclesiastical law impediment. There is, however, some disagreement as to whether consanguinity in the second degree collateral line (brother-sister) is a divine law or ecclesiastical law impediment.[74] To avoid having to resolve this issue, the code says simply that "a dispensation is never given from the impediment of consanguinity in the direct line or in the second degree of the collateral line" (c. 1078, §3). The local ordinary can dispense from the impediment in the third (uncle-niece) and fourth degrees (first cousins) of the collateral line. Nevertheless, civil laws may well prohibit marriages within these degrees of consanguinity.

The 1917 code foresaw the possibility that the impediment of consanguinity could be multiplied in the collateral line when a couple shared more than one common ancestor (CIC 1076, §2). The multiplication of the impediment necessitated multiple dispensations. However, the current law has eliminated the multiplication of the impediment.

When the existence of an impediment is doubtful, the general principle is that the parties should not be impeded from marrying.[75] However, canon 1091, §4 establishes an exception to this principle for the impediment of consanguinity. Marriage is never permitted if there is any doubt as to whether the parties are related by consanguinity in any degree of the direct line or the second degree of the collateral line.

Affinity

Canon 1092 — Affinity in the direct line in any degree invalidates a marriage.

While the impediment of consanguinity arises from a blood relationship, the impediment of affinity is based on a marital relationship. Affinity arises from a valid marriage, whether it is consummated or not, between the man and the blood relatives of the woman and between the woman and the blood relatives of the man (c. 109, §1). It does not arise, however, between the blood relatives of the man and those of the woman. Like consanguinity, affinity is computed in lines and degrees. A person is related by affinity to his or her spouse's blood relatives in the same line and degree as his or her spouse is related to them by consanguinity (c. 109, §2). Thus, a man is related to his wife's mother in the first degree of the di-

[71] Lateran IV, c. 50. See J. Brundage, Law, Sex and Christian Society in Medieval Europe (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1987) 191–193, 355–356.

[72] See the commentary on c. 108.

[73] CIC 1076, §2.

[74] In one reported case, Paul VI declared that consanguinity in the second degree of the collateral line was an ecclesiastical law impediment and dispensed from it to permit the convalidation of a marriage of a blood half-brother and half-sister who had been raised apart. Paul VI, rescript, January 21, 1977, CLD 9, 627–628.

[75] See cc. 1084, §2 and 1086, §3.

rect line and a woman is related to her husband's brother in the second degree of the collateral line.

The impediment of affinity invalidates marriage in all degrees of the direct line. The 1917 code made affinity in the collateral line a diriment impediment up to the fourth degree (second degree according to the Germanic method of counting) inclusive.[76] Thus, if a woman's husband died, she was barred from marrying his brother or first cousin. The 1983 Latin code abrogated affinity as an impediment in the collateral line. Nevertheless, affinity in the second degree of the collateral line (e.g., a woman and her deceased husband's brother) remains an impediment in the law of the Eastern churches (CCEO 809, §1). Hence, attention must be paid to the possible impediment of affinity in the collateral line in inter-ritual marriages.

Since affinity is an ecclesiastical law impediment, it no longer affects the marriages of two non-Catholics, whether baptized or not. It does, however, invalidate a marriage involving a Catholic who has left the Church by a formal act. The local ordinary and, when he is inaccessible in urgent situations, those mentioned in canons 1079–1080 can dispense from the impediment of affinity.

Public Propriety

Canon 1093 — The impediment of public propriety arises from an invalid marriage after the establishment of common life or from notorious or public concubinage. It nullifies marriage in the first degree of the direct line between the man and the blood relatives of the woman, and vice versa.

Although neither an invalid marriage nor public concubinage gives rise to the impediments of affinity or, except with regard to the offspring of the union, of consanguinity, the Church has judged that there is something unseemly about the marriage of one of the parties to such irregular unions with close relatives of the other. This sense of the inappropriateness of such marriages is the basis for the impediment of public propriety.

The impediment arises from an invalid marriage after a common life has been established and, therefore, there is a presumption that the union has been consummated (c. 1061, §2). It also arises from notorious and public concubinage. Concubinage is the more or less stable cohabitation of a man and a woman. It is considered public if it is known in the community and notorious if it is publicly known and carried out in such circumstances that it cannot be concealed or excused.[77] Thus, the impediment arises from the fact that a couple "lives together" without marriage, but not from the mere fact that they engaged in premarital sexual relations.

Strictly speaking, a union entered into without the observance of the required canonical form is not an invalid marriage since it lacks even the semblance of marriage. Nor can such a union be reduced to mere concubinage because "there is at least a certain commitment to a properly defined and probably stable state of life."[78]

In 1929, the code commission held that the impediment of public propriety arises as a result of such unions after cohabitation has begun.[79] The issue has been further clarified by canon 810, §1, 3° of the Eastern code, which stipulates that the impediment of public propriety arises "from the establishment of common life of those who, although bound to a required form for the celebration of marriage, attempted it before a civil official or non-Catholic minister."

The impediment of public propriety invalidates marriage between the man and the blood relatives of the woman and the woman and the blood relatives of the man, but only in the first degree of the direct line. That is, the impediment invalidates a marriage between the man and the woman's mother or daughter from another union and between the woman and the man's father or son from another union. Public propriety is an impediment of eccle-

[76] CIC 1077, §1.

[77] CIC 2197, 3°.

[78] FC 82c.

[79] CodCom, response, March 12, 1929, CLD 1, 516–517.

siastical law and can be dispensed by the local ordinary in ordinary circumstances and by those mentioned in canons 1079–1080 in the exceptional circumstances foreseen in those canons.

Those who validly marry after a period of notorious concubinage or who convalidate an invalid union become, by that fact, bound by the impediment of affinity. However, they remain bound by the impediment of public propriety as well. Thus, if one of the spouses seeks to marry a blood relation of the other in the first degree of the direct line after his or her spouse's death or the ecclesiastical dissolution of their marriage, dispensations from both the impediment of affinity and the impediment of public propriety are necessary for the validity of the new marriage.[80]

Adoption

Canon 1094 — Those who are related in the direct line or in the second degree of the collateral line by a legal relationship arising from adoption cannot contract marriage together validly.

Although adopted children are not related either by blood or marriage to their adoptive parents and siblings, the possibility of marriage between adopted children and the immediate members of their adoptive families raises the same concerns about family harmony and stability that led to the establishment of the impediments of consanguinity and affinity. Hence, these concerns have long prompted civil and ecclesiastical authorities to restrict the possibility of marriage between those adopted and their adoptive family members.

Roman law barred marriages between those adopted and the ones who adopted them, their spouses, and their other children. This impediment arising from the legal relationship of adoption was taken into canon law by Gratian.[81] The 1917 code abandoned the impediment of adoptive relationship derived from Roman law and deferred completely to the civil law governing the region where the marriage was to be contracted. If the prevailing civil law had no such impediment, there was no canonical impediment; if the civil law impediment merely prohibited marriage, the canonical impediment was also only impedient (CIC 1059); but, if the civil law impediment invalidated marriage, it was invalid in canon law as well (CIC 1080).

The 1983 Latin code and the 1990 Eastern code establish an ecclesiastical law impediment arising from an adoptive relationship, an impediment which is independent of the existence or not of a civil law impediment. The impediment invalidates marriage between the adopted person and those related to him or her by adoption in all degrees of the direct line and up to the second degree of the collateral line. That is, adopted persons cannot validly marry their adoptive parents and grandparents or their adoptive siblings.

Although the existence of an ecclesiastical law impediment arising from an adoptive relationship no longer depends on the existence of a comparable civil law impediment, establishing what constitutes legal adoption remains within the competence of civil law. The impediment of adoptive relationship does not arise unless there is first an adoption recognized by civil law. Consequently, a person incurs no impediment if he or she grows up in a family with a stepparent and children from that stepparent's previous marriage but who is not legally adopted by the stepparent.

The impediment arising from an adoptive relationship is one of ecclesiastical law. The local ordinary can dispense from it as can those mentioned in canons 1079–1080 in the circumstances foreseen in those canons. Before a dispensation is granted, however, one should ascertain whether there is also a civil law impediment based on adoption.

Spiritual Relationship

Canon 1079 of the 1917 code continued a long tradition by establishing as a diriment impediment

[80] J. Gallagher, The Matrimonial Impediment of Public Propriety, CanLawStud 304 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1952) 140–141.

[81] C. 30 q. 3 c. 5.

the spiritual relationship arising from baptism. This impediment invalidated marriages between the person baptized and both the minister of baptism and the godparents.[82] This impediment was abrogated by the 1983 Latin code. However, the Eastern code has retained the impediment. It arises between the godparents and both the person baptized and his or her parents (CCEO 811, §1). If baptism is conferred conditionally, the impediment does not arise unless the godparents at the conditional baptism are the same as those at the doubtfully valid baptism (CCEO 811, §2). This impediment may be an issue not only in marriages between two Eastern Catholics but also in inter-ritual marriages.

CHAPTER IV
MATRIMONIAL CONSENT[83]
[cc. 1095–1107][84]

Since consent alone brings marriage into existence, substantial defects in consent render the marriage invalid. Although titled "Matrimonial Consent," the present chapter is devoted primarily to an enumeration of invalidating defects of consent, the "dark" or "shadow" side of matrimonial consent.

The definitive triumph in the twelfth century of the Roman law principle that consent makes a marriage coincided both with the movement first among canonists and then among theologians to treat marriage as a consensual contract and with the flowering of Scholasticism. As a result, the Roman law of contracts was the primary source for deriving and analyzing invalidating defects of matrimonial consent. These defects, which were generally considered to be rooted in natural law, were, in turn, interpreted by canonists and theologians in light of Scholastic rational psychology which distinguished intellect and will as the faculties of the soul.

Since consent is an act of the will, all defects of consent ultimately invalidate marriage because of their impact on the will. Nevertheless, valid consent requires the harmonious interaction of all of a person's mental faculties—the cognitive, the critical or deliberative, and the volitional. Thus, to use the Scholastic framework, consent is defective: (1) when a lack or disturbance of the use of reason disables the will; (2) when, as a result of the absence of even the most rudimentary knowledge of the nature of marriage or an error about the identity or a critical quality of one's partner or about the essential nature of marriage, a substantially defective object is proposed by the intellect to the will; and (3) when the will itself either lacks freedom because of external coercion or intends something other than marriage as it is defined by the Church. In fact, however, it is two concrete human persons in all their complexity, who "mutually give and accept each other... to establish marriage" (c. 1057, §2). Consequently, consent cannot be adequately understood merely as a disembodied juridic act. An adequate understanding of consent must also include an appreciation of its personal and interpersonal dimensions and its concreteness. Thus, one can never overlook the influence of culture, society, family, and personal experience on individual couples' consent.

[82] CIC 768.

[83] See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 774–792; Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Überblick vor 1095/1–1107/1; F. Aznar Gil, in Pamplona ComEng, 684–700; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 610–622.

[84] Cf. CCEO 817–827. Although the Eastern code's treatment of matrimonial consent is generally parallel to that of the 1983 Latin code, there are some noteworthy differences between the two codes. CCEO 817 introduces this section by defining matrimonial consent. This definition is substantially the same as the one the Latin code places among the foundational canons in c. 1057, §2. CCEO 826 on conditioned consent is located after the treatment of the invalidating effect of force and fear, while the Latin code deals with these two defects of consent in the opposite order. The Latin code allows for marriage to be entered validly with a condition concerning the past or the present, but the Eastern code declares invalid marriages contracted with any type of condition. The Eastern code has no regulations governing marriages by proxy like the regulations in c. 1105 of the Latin code, but the former does allow particular law to make provision for such marriages (CCEO 837, §2). The Eastern code also has no provision for marriage through an interpreter like c. 1106 of the Latin code. Finally, the Eastern code transfers the requirement that the spouses be present when they exchange consent to the article on the form for celebrating marriage (CCEO 837, §1).

The present chapter begins with an exposition of consensual incapacity because of difficulties of a psychological nature (c. 1095). The chapter then treats the impact on the validity of consent of various defects of the intellect: ignorance (c. 1096), error concerning the person or a critical quality of one's spouse (c. 1097), error about a quality of one's spouse imposed by error (c. 1098), and error about the essential nature of marriage (c. 1099). Interjected at this point is the presumption that knowing or believing that a marriage will be invalid does not necessarily preclude a person from consenting validly (c. 1100). Three canons then treat defects of the will itself: positive intentions excluding marriage itself or one of its essential elements or properties (c. 1101), conditional consent (c. 1102), and consent extracted by force and fear (c. 1103). There follow three canons on the manner in which consent is to be expressed: the requirement that the parties be present together, either personally or through their proxy, for the exchange of consent (c. 1104), the requirements for the celebration of marriage by proxy (c. 1105), and the possibility of celebrating marriage through an interpreter (c. 1106). A final canon asserts the presumption that, when a marriage is entered invalidly, the consent given perdures until the contrary is proven (c. 1107).

Consensual Incapacity

Canon 1095 — The following are incapable of contracting marriage:

1° those who lack the sufficient use of reason;

2° those who suffer from a grave defect of discretion of judgment concerning the essential matrimonial rights and duties mutually to be handed over and accepted;

3° those who are not able to assume the essential obligations of marriage for causes of a psychic nature.

To consent to marriage, a person must: (1) possess sufficient use of reason to posit a responsible human act; (2) be able to evaluate the nature of marriage itself and the concrete marriage to be entered and so to choose it freely; and (3) be capable of assuming and carrying out the essential obligations of marriage. All of these capacities can be substantially undermined by disturbances, both transient and permanent, that are psychic or psycho-somatic in nature.[85]

Lack of Sufficient Use of Reason

Canonists have long recognized that serious mental disorders or disturbances can incapacitate a person for the performance of responsible human acts in general and for marital consent in particular. Gratian cited a Roman law fragment from Justinian's Digest as authority for the proposition that "neither a madman nor a madwoman can contract marriage,"[86] and Innocent III authorized the separation of a woman from a habitually insane man on the ground that "because of the alienation of the madness, consent could not occur."[87] Nevertheless, insanity (amentia) did not figure prominently in matrimonial jurisprudence until relatively recently.

The marginal role played by the ground of amentia in traditional jurisprudence was due, in part, to widespread ignorance about mental illness both in the Church and in society at large. Consequently, the claim was often raised that an otherwise habitually insane person had consented to marriage during a "lucid interval" and that the consent was, therefore, valid. Moreover, following Sanchez, the test for capacity for consent was generally the degree of the use of reason required for someone to commit a mortal sin, a level that [85] Coram Ragni, Nov. 26, 1985, SRRDec 77 (1985) 554. See A. Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," J 54 (1994) 482–486.

[86] C. 32 q. 7 c. 26. Gratian's source goes on to add, "But if it has been contracted let them not be separated." The reason for not separating the spouses was presumably because the insanity surfaced only after consent had occurred. See Gasparri, n. 785.

[87] X, 4.1.24.

was normally achieved around a person's seventh year. Later jurists argued that, although children may have sufficient use of reason to perform a human act after the age of discretion, they usually lack sufficient knowledge of the nature of marriage to consent to it until they reach the age of puberty (twelve for women, fourteen for men).[88] In both cases, setting the bar at such minimal levels was thought necessary to prevent simple folk from being judged incapable of marriage and thus depriving them of access to the only legitimate remedy for concupiscence.[89]

During the twentieth century, an enhanced understanding of mental illness has prompted jurisprudence to reject both the "mortal sin" and the "puberty" tests for assessing the level of mental functioning necessary for eliciting valid matrimonial consent. Although the law continues to presume that young people have achieved the use of reason by the age of seven (c. 97, §2) and thus may be able to commit mortal sins whose consequences concern the present, they may not necessarily be able to consent to marriage whose consequences affect the future. The law also presumes that those who have reached the age of puberty have sufficient use of reason to know the substance of marriage (c. 1096, §2), but consent requires more than due knowledge. Thus, jurisprudence has come to insist that a person must possess the use of reason proportionate to the act of matrimonial consent itself which entails obligations that are both serious and perpetual.[90]

Consequently, canon 1095, 1° declares incapable of contracting marriage not only those who lack the use of reason altogether but also those who lack "sufficient use of reason." When a disruption of the "psychological process involved in forming the human act . . . seriously impeded the rational function of the mind" and deprived a person "of any meaningful deliberation concerning personal capacity for marital commitment and the choice of the object of consent,"[91] he or she may be judged to lack sufficient use of reason. To deprive a person of sufficient use of reason to contract marriage, a mental impairment must be relatively severe and pervasive in its effect. The cause can be a habitual disorder such as a psychosis or severe mental retardation or a transient disturbance such as drug or alcohol intoxication or a serious psychic trauma.[92]

In judging cases on the ground of lack of sufficient use of reason, careful attention must be paid to the mental competence of the person at the time consent was elicited. Although jurisprudence has largely abandoned its former preoccupation with so-called "lucid intervals," some habitual mental disorders are susceptible to treatment by medications that restore a person's "sufficient use of reason." For example, persons suffering from bi-polar disorder (manic-depressive syndrome) may have experienced periods when they lacked sufficient use of reason for marriage, but, thanks to medication, may possess sufficient use of reason at the time of consent, even though they may lose the use of reason again later in the marriage when they cease taking their medication. In a similar way, a person may habitually possess the use of reason and have formed an intention to enter a particular marriage in the future, but, if the person was completely drunk at the time of the wedding, he or she may have lacked sufficient use of reason for marriage. At the time of the actual consent, the parties must be capable of manifesting their consent by a human act.[93]

When a person's lack of sufficient use of reason appears to be caused by a serious and habitual mental disorder, proof of this ground usually re-

[88] J. Keating, The Bearing of Mental Impairment on the Validity of Marriage (Rome: Gregorian University, 1973) 124–136.

[89] J. Noonan, The Power to Dissolve (Cambridge: Belknap, 1972) 123–158.

[90] Keating, 123–170.

[91] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 490.

[92] Ibid.; L. Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1998) 22.

[93] See coram Heard, December 4, 1943, SRRDec 35 (1943) 885–903; coram Grazioli, July 1, 1933, SRRDec 25 (1933) 403–419; and coram Jullien, July 30, 1932, SRRDec 24 (1932) 364–382.

quires the services of psychological experts. However, in cases involving serious but transient disturbances such as intoxication, psychological experts may shed little light on the critical issues, and the judge may have to rely on the declarations of the parties and the testimony of witnesses.

Lack of Due Discretion

A person may possess sufficient use of reason to have a rudimentary and abstract understanding of marriage and its obligations and to intend marriage so understood but still be incapable of consent, if he or she lacks the ability to deliberate critically about this choice in the concrete. For example, a teen-aged girl captivated by the story of Romeo and Juliet may have adequate abstract knowledge of marriage and intend a marriage with her first boyfriend like the one portrayed in Shakespeare's play, but still be unable to consent validly to the marriage because of her immature assessment of her own and her boyfriend's readiness for marriage. Canon law calls this incapacity for critical deliberation lack of maturity or discretion of judgment.

The Church requires the human maturity proportionate to the state of life in question for all life-choices, since they entail lifelong obligations.[94] The minimum age for marriage is sixteen for men and fourteen for women (c. 1083, §1), two years higher than the ages for puberty. At these ages, men and women respectively presumably possess the minimal maturity or discretion of judgment to consent to marriage. Following Aquinas, canon law has traditionally set a lower minimum age for marriage than for professing vows in a religious institute or for embracing celibacy as an ordained minister because marriage is something toward which people are inclined by nature and, therefore, marriage consent requires less maturity or discretion than does entry into the other states.[95] The presumption that men and women possess minimally sufficient discretion for marriage at the ages of sixteen and fourteen respectively is a simple one that cedes to contrary proof. Such contrary proof may not be difficult to acquire in Western cultures where adolescence with its attendant dependence and immaturity is typically extended well into a person's twenties.

The maturity or discretion of judgment that is required for capacity for matrimonial consent must be proportionate to the serious and perpetual obligations of marriage. Mature or due discretion requires that consent be informed, prudent, and free.[96] Consent is informed if the person has "sufficient cognitive (intellectual) knowledge of self and of the other, and of the essential rights and duties, constitutive of the permanent and exclusive 'consortium totius vitae.'"[97] While such cognitive knowledge is necessary for a person to consent to marriage, it is not in itself sufficient. The person must also be capable of critically evaluating this knowledge in view of a decision about a concrete pending marriage.

In an often cited 1957 decision, Felici explained: "To be able to perform a responsible act, which can be characterized as morally imputable, it certainly does not suffice to be capable of exercising the cognitive function, but one must exercise the critical faculty, which alone renders one capable of forming judgments and moving the will."[98] This critical faculty, a function of the practical intellect, is the capacity to evaluate knowledge of one's self, one's prospective partner, and the complex of rights and obligations constitutive of the partnership of the whole of life by comparing, integrating, and deducing new judgments. In [94] For example, superiors of religious institutes are to admit only those who have "sufficient qualities of maturity to embrace the proper life of the institute" (c. 642); candidates must be at least seventeen for valid entrance into the novitiate (c. 643, §1, 1°), eighteen for valid temporary profession (c. 656, 1°), and twenty-one for valid perpetual profession (c. 658, 1°).

[95] Thomas Aquinas, STh, III, suppl., q. 58, a. 5, ad 1–2.

[96] M. Pompedda, "Maturità psichica e matrimonio nei canoni 1095, 1096," Apol 57 (1984) 134 and idem, "L'incapacità consensuale," IC 31 (1991) 107–138.

[97] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 495.

[98] Coram Felici, December 3, 1957, SRRDec 49 (1957) 788.

short, the critical faculty is the capacity to make a prudent judgment about this marriage with this person at this time.

To be a genuinely human act, matrimonial consent must be free from both external coercion and internal compulsion. While human actions are never entirely free from instinctual and unconscious influences, valid consent requires freedom "from immature, obsessive and overpowering ideas, fantasies, instinctual excitations, fear, and so forth in the process of choosing the object of consent."[99] In other words, a person must be able to evaluate his or her motives for marriage and to exercise mastery over impulses and anxieties.[100]

The notion of due discretion that has emerged in jurisprudence is well summarized in a 1979 decision by Pinto:

> Discretion of judgment that is proportionate to marriage demands the capacity firstly of understanding the essential obligations of marriage, at least in substance, and secondly of freely choosing to assume those obligations. As regards the capacity of understanding, a speculative or abstract understanding is not enough; one must also have a practical understanding, which presupposes experience in living, about the particular marriage to be celebrated, with this person, in these circumstances, with some understanding of the particular difficulties both present and future insofar as they can be seen and with a sense of the responsibility and seriousness of the obligations that are being undertaken. As regards the capacity of freely choosing marriage, it is required that the decision to enter marriage be based on reasonable motives after sufficient deliberation and not on pathological motives, and it is also required that the will be able to order the decision into execution.[101]

[99] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 496.

[100] Pompedda, "Maturità psichica e matrimonio," 134.

[101] Coram Pinto, December 18, 1979, SRRDec 71 (1979) 587–588. Emphasis in the original.

The maturity or discretion of judgment required for matrimonial consent can be subverted by a variety of habitual mental disorders. Psychoses can deprive a person of the capacity for critical deliberation; neuroses can compromise a person's internal freedom. Personality disorders are "enduring patterns of perceiving, relating to, and thinking about the environment and oneself in a wide range of social and personal contexts" which "are inflexible and maladaptive and cause significant functional impairment."[102] These disorders are sometimes treated in jurisprudence as disorders that impair critical deliberation and sometimes as disorders that restrict internal freedom.[103] Since consent requires the harmonious interaction of the intellect and the will, "it cannot be determined a priori when the judge should examine someone's intellective capacity alone, and when he or she should investigate the volitive capacity."[104] In practice, whether to concentrate on the impact of a personality disorder on a person's critical faculty or internal freedom is dictated by the facts of the particular case.

Despite the firm assertion of John Paul II that "the hypothesis of a real incapacity is to be considered only when an anomaly of a serious nature is present,"[105] Rotal jurisprudence has continued to issue affirmative decisions in cases where lack of due discretion is alleged, not only when the basis for the defect is a serious habitual mental disorder, but also when the defect is rooted in a serious but transitory disturbance of the mind.[106] Thus, traumatic events or stress-related experiences can induce psychological disturbances that temporarily deprive a person of the due discretion for marriage.

[102] American Psychiatric Association, Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 4th ed. (Washington, D.C.: American Psychiatric Association, 1994) 630.

[103] See A. Mendonça, "The Effect of Personality Disorders on Matrimonial Consent," SC 21 (1987) 67–123.

[104] C. Lefebvre, "De defectu discretionis iudicii in rotali jurisprudentia," P 69 (1980) 562.

[105] John Paul II, alloc, February 25, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1457.

[106] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 500–504.

A not uncommon example of a traumatic event that can disturb a person's psychological equilibrium is the discovery of a premarital pregnancy.[107] A person can also be temporarily deprived of due discretion by desperation arising from the need to flee an intolerable situation (e.g., an abusive home situation) or by extreme dependence on one's parents arising from an infantile relationship.[108]

Due discretion can also be undermined by mentalities and attitudes that pervade the socio-cultural milieu in which a person is immersed. For example, where family honor is a prominent cultural value, a person who has committed an act that, if disclosed, would bring disgrace on the family may feel compelled, even without external coercion, to marry in order to prevent damage to the family name.[109] Moreover, inveterate attitudes contrary to the Christian understanding of marriage can also result in a fundamentally flawed decision-making process. Thus, in a case involving a young man who married while steeped in the "hippy" life-style, the Rotal turnus concluded: "This sentence presents the clearest example of deliberation which was simply not there, perhaps not because of some psychopathy, but because of a life-style which precludes any serious consideration of the value of things."[110]

In cases where lack of due discretion is suspected, judges must reconstruct the marital decision-making process, as investigators reconstruct the scenes of traffic accidents, to attempt to identify critical faults or omissions in the reasoning process that may have rendered it fatally flawed. Often, this reconstruction involves a two-step process. First, one identifies an underlying disorder or disturbance that has impaired a person's psychic functioning. Then one weighs the seriousness of the impact of this impairment on the faculties involved in the decision-making process against the seriousness of marital rights and obligations. Psychological experts can provide invaluable assistance to judges in identifying the nature, seriousness, and impact of psychic disorders and disturbances and in reconstructing the dynamics of the process that led to the choice of marriage.[111]

Inability to Assume the Essential Obligations of Marriage

Jurisprudence has long recognized that physical impotence, i.e., the incapacity to complete the marital act in a human manner, invalidates marriage, when the impotence is both antecedent to marriage and perpetual. During the last half century, tribunals encountered cases involving people who seemed to have an adequate grasp of the nature of marriage, intact discretionary capacity, and proper intentions toward marriage, but who were affected by disorders that prevented them from fulfilling its obligations. Many of these cases involved sexual disorders (usually satyriasis and nymphomania) that compelled people to engage in promiscuous behavior despite their intention to remain faithful to their spouses. Jurisprudence began to treat such cases as cases of "psychic" or "moral" impotence, by analogy to physical impotence.[112]

Following the teaching of Vatican II, jurisprudence gradually began to recognize that the essential rights and obligations of marriage extend well beyond the perpetual and exclusive right to the body for acts in themselves apt for the procreation of offspring, which was formerly articulated as the formal object of marital consent (CIC 1081, §2) and considered its only truly essential obligation in the jurisprudence based on the 1917 code.[113] As the range of marital obligations considered essential expanded, jurisprudence quietly abandoned the analogy to physical impotence and [107] Coram Ragni, July 11, 1986, SRRDec 78 (1986) 444–457.

[108] Coram Giannecchini, June 17, 1986, SRRDec 78 (1986) 382.

[109] Coram Faltin, November 11, 1988, SRRDec 80 (1988) 626.

[110] Coram Davino, March 20, 1985, SRRDec 77 (1985) 187.

[111] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 497–499.

[112] See Keating, 176–200.

[113] See coram Wynen, January 22, 1944, SRRDec 36 (1944) 55–79 and AAS 36 (1944) 179–200.

began to speak of the inability to assume or fulfill the essential obligations of marriage as an autonomous ground for the invalidity of marriage because of consensual incapacity.

The incapacity for consent of persons unable, at the time of consent, to fulfill an essential marital obligation follows from the general principle rooted in natural law that "no one can be obliged to the impossible."[114] The defect lies not in the elements of consent itself but in its object. What is at issue is not the person's capacity for critical deliberation, but his or her inability to put into effect one or more of the rights and obligations given and accepted in consent. Canon 1095, 3° roots the incapacity for consent not in the inability to "fulfill" the essential obligations of marriage but rather in the inability to "assume" them. The word "assume" makes clear that the psychic defect that gives rise to the incapacity must be present at the moment of consent and not something that emerges during common life. Moreover, the source of the inability to "fulfill" the essential obligations of marriage may be extrinsic to consent, e.g., when the inability arises from a person's physical impotence or his incarceration. However, the source of the inability to "assume" them is always intrinsic, i.e., it "pertains to the content of the very act of consent as its object."[115]

To be incapable of consent, a person must be prevented from assuming an essential obligation of marriage. While postconciliar jurisprudence has continued to require that the spouses enjoy the capacity to give and accept the perpetual and exclusive right to the body for acts appropriate for the procreation of offspring, it has tended to cast this essential obligation in more personalist terms. Thus, Stankiewicz speaks of the essential "obligation to the gift of conjugal love, ordered to procreate and educate the child, to be shared with the partner in a human way perpetually and exclusively."[116] However, this jurisprudence has also devoted particular attention to the capacity of the spouses to establish and sustain the partnership of the whole of life that is perpetual and exclusive and ordered both to the good of the spouses and to the procreation and education of offspring.[117] Initiating and sustaining such a partnership presupposes the capacity for a genuinely interpersonal relationship. "Two persons should, before anything else, be able and willing to be friends, to love, to respect, to trust, to relate to and communicate with each other, or in Wrenn's words, be capable of 'self-revelation,' 'understanding' and 'loving.'"[118]

To invalidate marriage, the incapacity to assume the essential obligations of marriage must be rooted in "causes of a psychic nature." In his 1987 allocution to the Rota, John Paul II explained that the cause of this incapacity must be "a serious form of anomaly which, however it may be defined, must substantially impair the contractant's capacity to intend and/or will."[119] In his 1988 allocution, the Holy Father was more specific. He insisted that "only very serious forms of psychopathology reach the point of impairing substantially the freedom of the person."[120] Although some have interpreted the Holy Father's remarks as requiring the existence of an identifiable mental illness for declaring a marriage invalid because of a party's incapacity to assume the essential obligations of marriage,[121] most commentators have not accepted this interpretation. Instead, they recognize that any disorder or disturbance of the human mind, if it is sufficiently severe, can prevent a person from assuming the essential obligations of marriage, whether the disorder or disturbance is a recognized mental illness or [114] RI 6. See also A. Stankiewicz, "De accommodatione regulae 'impossibilium nulla obligatio est' ad incapacitatem adimplendi matrimonii obligationes," P 68 (1979) 643–672.

[115] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 507.

[116] Coram Stankiewicz, December 16, 1982, EIC 39 (1983) 258–259.

[117] M. Pompedda, "Determining What Are Essential Obligations," in Incapacity for Marriage: Jurisprudence and Interpretation, ed. R. Sable (Rome: Gregorian University, 1987) 190–193.

[118] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 515. See also L. Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 45–46.

[119] John Paul II, alloc, February 5, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1457.

[120] John Paul II, alloc, January 25, 1998, AAS 80 (1988) 1182.

[121] Coram Burke, July 22, 1991, Forum 4 (1993) 110–111.

not. For them, "anomaly should not be confused with psychiatric illness. 'In reality, every true dysfunction of the psychic or psychological process constitutes a real psychopathology; but this does not mean that here one is faced with a person who suffers from a psychic illness.'"[122]

The mental disorder or disturbance that incapacitates a person from assuming the essential obligations of marriage must be antecedent to marriage, i.e., present at the time of consent. Psychological problems that surface only during the marriage cannot invalidate consent already given. Nevertheless, a disorder or disturbance that only became apparent during the marriage may actually have been present at the time of consent, but was overlooked or not recognized for what it was. To invalidate marriage, it is not sufficient that the disorder or disturbance render the assumption and fulfillment of essential marital obligations difficult; it is necessary that it render the fulfillment of these obligations impossible. As John Paul II has made clear, "For the canonist the principle must remain clear that only incapacity and not difficulty in manifesting consent and in realizing a true community of life and love invalidate marriage."[123]

Since the ground of incapacity to assume essential marital obligations emerged by analogy to the impediment of impotence, some canonists have maintained that, in order to invalidate marriage, the incapacity must be perpetual or incurable by ordinary means, like the incapacity involved in impotence.[124] This position has not, however, been embraced by the mainstream of Rotal jurisprudence,[125] which has treated the incapacity to assume essential marital obligations as a ground of nullity distinct from impotence. Adherents of this position argue that, although the essential obligations of marriage bind perpetually, an incapacitating disorder need not be perpetual or incurable. It is enough that the person be incapable of assuming essential obligations of marriage at the time of consent.[126]

Since a marriage can be declared invalid only if a party is truly incapable of assuming essential marital obligations and not merely because the party experienced difficulty in fulfilling them, the underlying disorder or disturbance must be severe. Identifying the nature of the disorder and assessing its severity usually require the services of a psychological expert.[127] "Practically all recent rotal sentences speak of the necessity of using experts in cases of 'consensual incapacity.'"[128]

Ignorance

Canon 1096 — §1. For matrimonial consent to exist, the contracting parties must be at least not ignorant that marriage is a permanent partnership between a man and a woman ordered to the procreation of offspring by means of some sexual cooperation.

§2. This ignorance is not presumed after puberty.

Ignorance is the absence of knowledge. One cannot consent to marriage without at least a minimal knowledge of what one is intending and willing. Canon 1096 deals not with the critical knowledge discussed in canon 1095, 2°, but with the required abstract or speculative knowledge for marriage. However, ignorance invalidates a juridic act, including matrimonial consent, only if it [122] Coram Colagiovanni, March 20, 1991, ME 117 (1992) 33. See also Pompedda, "Determining What Are Essential Obligations," 197, and Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 526–529.

[123] John Paul II, alloc, February 5, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1457. Emphasis in the original.

[124] J. Pinto Gomez, "L'immaturità affettiva nella giurisprudenza rotale," in L'immaturità psico-affettiva nella giurisprudenza della Rota Romana, ed. P. Bonnet and C. Gullo (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1990) 50–51.

[125] Coram Bruno, July 19, 1991, ME 117 (1992) 171.

[126] M. Pompedda, "Annotazioni circa la 'incapacitas adsumendi onera coniugalia,'" in Studi di diritto matrimoniale canonico (Milan: Giuffré, 1993) 97–100. See Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 531–534.

[127] See the commentary on cc. 1574–1581.

[128] Mendonça, "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage," 541.

involves an element of the object of the act which constitutes its substance (c. 126). The substance of an act does not encompass all its elements or even all of its essential elements, but only those which must be explicitly intended for the act to exist.[129] For example, perpetuity or indissolubility is a property that belongs to the essence of marriage (c. 1056), but, for a valid marriage, it is sufficient that a person know only that marriage is permanent, i.e., that it is a stable relationship.

According to canon 1096, the substance of marriage is "a permanent partnership between a man and a woman ordered to the procreation of offspring by means of some sexual cooperation." Although the 1917 code had required only that parties know that marriage is a societas, a term that was often used for a business partnership, the revised code requires knowledge that it is a consortium, a partnership that involves mutual cooperation, support, and companionship. They must also know that this partnership is permanent (i.e., a stable relationship of some duration), but not necessarily that it is perpetual (i.e., that it is indissoluble).[130] Finally, the partners must know at least that marriage is heterosexual in nature (but not that it is exclusive). The parties cannot be ignorant that marriage is ordered to the procreation of children or that this procreation comes about by sexual cooperation between a man and a woman. It is not necessary that the parties have extensive knowledge of human sexuality, but they must know at least that procreation comes about through the bodily interaction of specific organs of the man and the woman.[131] Thus, a marriage would be invalid because of ignorance if a person thought that marriage entailed no exchange of the right to the body or that this right was substantially different from what it is (e.g., that it consisted in a right to warm hugs.)[132]

Invalidating ignorance is most likely to be found in those who are developmentally disabled, who are quite young and naive, or who experienced a very sheltered upbringing. Ignorance is not presumed after puberty. It is, however, presumed prior to puberty. Although the revised code sets the age for valid marriage at sixteen for men and fourteen for women, the age of puberty remains twelve for women and fourteen for men, as it was in Roman law and in pre- and post-1917 code canon law.[133]

Error about the Person

Canon 1097 — §1. Error concerning the person renders a marriage invalid.

§2. Error concerning a quality of the person does not render a marriage invalid even if it is the cause for the contract, unless this quality is directly and principally intended.

Error of Person

While ignorance involves a lack of knowledge, error is a positive judgment that is objectively false. Like ignorance, error does not invalidate a juridic act unless it concerns an element "which constitutes its substance or which amounts to a condition sine qua non" (c. 126). Since the parties to a marriage are themselves the material object of consent and, therefore, an element of the substance of the act, error about the identity of the physical person one marries invalidates consent. Thus, had the Code of Canon Law been in effect at the time, Jacob's marriage to Leah would have been invalid because of his error about the person of his spouse.[134] In Western societies where young people usually enjoy a relatively long and unregulated courtship before they marry, cases involving error of person are rare. Nonetheless, such cases [129] F. Urrutia, Les normes générales (Paris: Tardy, 1994) 296; and G. Michiels, Principia generalia de personis in Ecclesia (Tournai: Desclée, 1955) 653.

[130] But see coram Di Felice, December 14, 1977, SRRDec 69 (1987) 505–508, where a marriage was declared null because of the woman's ignorance that marriage is indissoluble.

[131] See coram Masala, March 30, 1977, SRRDec 69 (1987) 157–171.

[132] Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 94.

[133] CIC 88, §2.

[134] Gn 29:15–30.

may occur in societies where families play the primary role in arranging marriages or where personal contacts between young people are strictly restricted before their marriage. Error of person may also occur when people use "mail-order-bride" services.

Error of Quality of the Person

While cases involving error about the physical identity of one's spouse may be rare, not so rare are cases in which people claim to have been in error about qualities of their spouses that were so important that their absence made their spouses fundamentally different persons from the ones they thought they were marrying. A quality is an enduring characteristic of person that significantly defines who that person is. Qualities include such things as one's physical and mental health, marital status, religious adherence, educational attainment, occupation, legal status, and socio-economic status. In themselves, errors about such qualities in a prospective spouse do not affect the validity of marital consent, but sometimes a particular quality may be so important to a person that he or she implicitly makes its presence (or, in some cases, its absence) a condition attached to consent.

Jurisprudence has, until recently, been reluctant to recognize the invalidating effect of an error about a quality of the person. Saint Thomas held:

> If, however, the error about a person's rank or position amounts to an error about the person [redundat in errorem personae], it is an impediment to matrimony. Hence, if the woman consent directly to this particular person, her error about his rank does not void the marriage; but if she intend directly to consent to marry the king's son [or, a king's son (filium regis)], whoever he may be, then, if another man than the [or a] king's son be brought to her, there is error about the person, and the marriage will be void.[135]

Unfortunately, the absence of definite and indefinite articles in Latin has left Aquinas's meaning ambiguous. If he meant that consent was invalid if the woman directly intended to marry the son of the king, then the invalidating error concerned a quality that individuated or distinguished Prince Charles from Prince Andrew and amounted to an error of person. If, however, Aquinas meant that the woman directly intended to marry a king's son, the error redounding to an error of person concerned the quality of "princeship" and would invalidate marriage with anyone not of princely rank. Sanchez interpreted Aquinas in the first sense and limited the category of invalidating errors strictly to qualities that definitively distinguished one individual from another;[136] Alphonsus Liguori interpreted Aquinas more broadly and extended the category of invalidating error to qualities that, although common to many people, were directly and principally intended by the one giving consent.[137] Canon 1083, §2, 1° of the 1917 code declared that consent was invalid if it was elicited under the influence of an error of quality that amounted to an error of person. However, Sanchez's narrow interpretation of error redundans prevailed in jurisprudence until 1970, when a Rotal decision by Canals rejected this jurisprudence as not faithful to Saint Thomas and based on social conditions that no longer exist and espoused the position of Liguori.[138] Canals's view quickly became the predominant position in Rotal jurisprudence.[139]

This development in jurisprudence is reflected in canon 1097, §2, which avoids the traditional phrase an "error of quality which amounts to (redundet in) an error of person." Instead, error about a quality of a person invalidates consent only if that quality was directly and principally intended.

[135] Thomas Aquinas, STh, suppl., q. 51, a. 2, ad 5.

[136] T. Sanchez, De matrimonio, lib. 7, 18, 38.

[137] A. Liguori, Theologia Moralis, 5, 6, 31.

[138] Coram Canals, April 21, 1970, SRRDec 62 (1980) 370–375; CLD 8, 796–801.

[139] See coram Funghini, February 24, 1988, SRRDec 80 (1988) 144; and coram Jarawan, February 6, 1991, SRRDec 83 (1991) 77.

"In marriage a quality is directly intended when the quality rather than the person is intended in and of itself; it is principally intended when the quality is more important than the person."[140] Thus, when a woman marries a man whom she erroneously believes to be a physician, her error does not invalidate her consent unless the quality of "being a physician" was so important to her that she intended the quality more than the person of her spouse and, if the quality was not present, she did not want the marriage.

The mere fact that an error about a quality of a person caused the contract is not, in itself, sufficient to invalidate consent. In other words, it is not enough to show that a person decided to marry another precisely because he erroneously believed that she possessed a particular quality and that he would not have married her had he known that she did not possess that quality. One must be able to show in addition that he directly and principally intended the quality. However, proof that an error about a quality caused the marriage contract may generate a strong presumption that the quality was indeed directly and principally intended.

To invalidate marriage, one must directly and principally intend by a positive act of the will a quality erroneously believed to be present in one's spouse. Thus, this intention must be something more than a presumed intention (i.e., one that can be surmised from facts known about the person), an interpretive intention (i.e., one that the person would have had if she had stopped to think about the matter), a generic intention (i.e., a disposition or general preference), or a habitual intention (i.e., a more or less firm and long-standing inclination which remains merely an intellectual preference). On the other hand, the intention need not be actual (i.e, formulated at the time of the actual consent) or explicit (i.e., articulated in precise and definite terms). It is sufficient that the intention be virtual (i.e., formulated prior to the marriage ceremony but never retracted) and implicit (i.e., expressed only indirectly or obliquely).[141]

In his celebrated 1970 decision, Canals suggested a third way in which error about a quality of a person could invalidate consent. "The third interpretation considers the case of a moral, social or juridical quality which is so intimately connected with the physical person that the person would be altogether different if that quality did not exist.... The reason for this invalidity would not arise from any implicit condition, but due to an error of quality amounting to an error concerning the person understood in a more complete and integral way."[142]

For example, this approach would allow a marriage to be declared invalid because of a person's error about a quality of her spouse that is of such great objective importance (e.g., not being a member of the Mafia) that the absence of the quality rendered him an essentially different person from the one she thought she was marrying, whether the quality was directly and principally intended or not. However, this "third way" has been rather pointedly rejected by Rotal jurisprudence because this "more complete and integral way" of understanding the person has been judged at odds with the traditional Scholastic understanding of "person."[143] In addition, it is feared that, by eliminating the requirement that a quality be directly and principally intended, this third way would open the door to a spate of claims of nullity when spouses turned out to be less than the men and women of the others' dreams.

Fraud or Imposed Error

Canon 1098 — A person contracts invalidly who enters into a marriage deceived by malice, perpetrated to obtain consent, concerning some quality of the other partner which by its very nature can gravely disturb the partnership of conjugal life.

[140] Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 97. Emphasis in the original. See coram Stankiewicz, October 24, 1991, SRRDec 83 (1991) 676.

[141] Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 101.

[142] Coram Canals, April 21, 1970, SRRDec 62 (1970) 371.

[143] See U. Navarrete, "Error in persona (c. 1097, §1)," P 87 (1998) 351–401.

As a rule, juridic acts performed under the influence of deceit are valid unless the law provides otherwise (c. 125, §2), as it does here with regard to marriages entered under the influence of error induced by deceit. Thus, although mere error about a quality of a person does not per se invalidate marriage unless it is directly and principally intended, such an error can invalidate marriage if it results from fraud or deceit.

The personalist understanding of marriage flowing from the teaching of Vatican II prompted the incorporation of deceit as a ground of nullity into the revised code. Consent consists in the spouses' mutually giving and accepting of one another. When one spouse has been deprived of knowledge of an important quality of the other by deceit, what is given and accepted in consent is incomplete or truncated. Thus, the material object of consent is defective. Moreover, such deceit is inimical to the honesty and self-revelation that is necessary to establish and sustain the partnership of the whole of life. To bind a person perpetually in marriage to a person who has deceived him or her about a significant personal quality is now deemed so unjust that the deceit leads to the invalidity of the marriage.

It is somewhat misleading, however, to speak of the ground of nullity treated in canon 1098 as that of fraud or deceit. It is not the deceiver who marries invalidly, but the one deceived. It is not the fraud or deceit itself that causes invalidity, but the error about a quality of the person of the spouse that results from it. Thus, it is more accurate to call this ground of nullity "imposed error" (error dolosus).

Several essential elements must be proved for a marriage to be declared null on this ground.

(1) Deceit must be employed to secure the other party's consent to marriage. The deceiver must know or, at least, suspect that the other party would not consent to marriage if he or she were aware of the existence (or absence) of a particular quality. Although deceit is always morally wrong, the motivation for it need not be malicious. One may sincerely think that what his future spouse "doesn't know won't hurt her," that the presence or absence of the quality on which the deceit bears will never come to light, that his spouse's discovery of the presence or absence of the quality after the marriage would cause only a temporary ripple in conjugal life, or that the quality is of no objective importance. Nor is it necessary that the deceit be perpetrated by one of the parties to the marriage. For example, family members may intentionally conceal from a prospective spouse their son's history of mental illness or the family's history of genetic abnormalities for fear that she will break the engagement. What is critical is that the deceit be aimed at securing consent to marriage.

(2) The deceit must bear on a quality of the person "which by its very nature can gravely disturb the partnership of conjugal life." A quality of a person is an inherent or distinguishing characteristic or trait of a person. Isolated actions in the past are not normally considered to be qualities. Thus, the fact that a man once smoked marijuana is not one of his qualities, but the fact that he was once incarcerated for drug possession and, therefore, has a criminal record or that he is a recovering drug addict is one of his qualities.

To disturb the partnership of conjugal life by its very nature, the quality that is the object of deception must be grave. The quality is considered objectively grave if most people would consider it so important to the happy outcome of a marriage that they would consider its concealment a serious injustice to the other party. However, a quality that is considered of little importance by most people may be subjectively grave for some individuals. For example, most people would not consider the quality of being a social drinker to be of its nature disruptive of conjugal life, but, for the child of alcoholic parents, it may be serious. The use of the phrase "by its very nature" (suapte natura) suggests that the quality that is the object of deceit must have some objective gravity to give rise to the invalidity of consent. Among the qualities that Rotal sentences have mentioned as of their nature possibly disruptive of conjugal life are: deceit about one's chronological age, having contracted AIDS, feigned affection for one's future spouse's children of a previous marriage, homosexuality, mental illness, marital status, membership in a subversive group, pregnancy, sterility, moral rectitude, and virginity.[144] These qualities do appear to be objectively grave. Nevertheless, some Rotal decisions have found for invalidity on the basis of imposed error about qualities that do not seem especially objectively grave. These decisions seem to emphasize more the injustice of the deceit itself than the objective gravity of the quality that was the object of deceit.[145]

(3) The quality must be present (or absent) at the time of consent. The quality that is the object of the deceit cannot be one that is expected or hoped for in the future. Thus, a woman who married a man who had led her to believe that he intended to enter law school, even though he had no such intention, cannot claim that her marriage was invalid because of the deceit. On the other hand, a woman who was led to believe that the man she was about to marry already was a lawyer or had been accepted at a law school may have a basis for claiming that her marriage was invalid as a consequence of this deceit.

(4) The deceived person must be unaware that the quality that is the object of the deceit is (or is not) present in the other person. The essential requirement for this ground of nullity is that a person is actually led into error about a quality of the other party as a result of deceit. Thus, if, despite a fiancé's efforts to deceive her, a woman independently becomes aware or strongly suspects that he lacks an important quality, the validity of the marriage cannot be challenged on this ground because the deceit has failed to induce error about the quality. A crucial indicator of whether deceit has led to error is the response of the allegedly deceived person on discovering the presence (or absence) of the quality that had been the object of the deceit. If she promptly moves to terminate the conjugal relationship, the deceit presumably had been effective and she had been unaware of the quality.

Since the promulgation of the 1983 code, jurists have debated whether the source of the invalidity of marriage because of error resulting from deceit is the natural law or positive ecclesiastical law.[146] The answer to this question is not merely of theoretical interest. If this ground of nullity is based in natural law, then canon 1098 has retroactive application and can also be used to resolve marriage cases involving two non-Catholics. If, however, it is based in positive ecclesiastical law, it cannot be applied to marriages entered prior to November 27, 1983 and is inapplicable to cases involving two non-Catholics, who are normally no longer bound by merely ecclesiastical law (c. 11).

In 1986, the then Commission for the Interpretation of the Code of Canon Law responded privately to the request from the Archbishop of Freiburg for a clarification of the possible retroactivity of canon 1098. While noting that a definitive judgment on the natural or positive law character of the canon was a matter of doctrine and, therefore, beyond its competence, the commission stated that it was [144] J. Johnson, "Fraud and Deceit in the Rota: The First Ten Years," J 56 (1996) 577.

[145] See coram Pompedda, February 6, 1992, IE 6 (1994) 573–591, where the man and his family had led the woman to believe that he was thirty years old when, in fact, he was thirty-eight. See Johnson, "Fraud and Deceit," 569–577.

[146] See U. Navarrete, "Canon 1098 de errore doloso estne iuris naturalis an iuris positivi ecclesiastici?" P 76 (1987) 161–181; Johnson, "Fraud and Deceit," 559–569; idem, "On the Retroactive Force of Canon 1098," Stud Can 23 (1989) 61–83; and coram Stankiewicz, January 27, 1994, Forum 8 (1997) 382–390.

> inclined to regard the wording of Canon 1098 as of merely positive law and consequently as nonretroactive. Given, however, the great variety of cases which the canon could embrace, one could not rule out a priori the possibility that some of those cases could involve nullity deriving from the natural law, in which case it would be legitimate to render an affirmative decision.[147]

Thus, canon 1098 is primarily a norm of positive ecclesiastical law and, as such, is not applicable to marriages celebrated before the revised code took effect or to marriages of two non-Catholics. Nevertheless, there may be cases in which the error induced by deceit so bears on "qualities of the partner which are necessary for the exercise of the essential rights and obligations of marriage" that, when a quality is assessed in the light of the demands of marriage, the error is substantial and, therefore, invalidates marriage in virtue of the natural law, even though the quality had not been directly and principally intended by the deceived party.[148] In other words, deceit induces substantial error when its object is a quality that is so objectively important that its presence (or absence) renders the deceiver an essentially different person than he or she pretended to be.

Error of Law or Determining Error

Canon 1099 — Error concerning the unity or indissolubility or sacramental dignity of marriage does not vitiate matrimonial consent provided that it does not determine the will.

In 1767, Benedict XIV articulated the presumption that, when people marry, their general intention to marry as Christ willed prevails over any personal or private errors they may harbor about the nature of marriage.[149] This presumption dominated jurisprudence until recent decades and was reflected in canon 1084 of the 1917 code which stipulated that "simple error concerning the unity or indissolubility or sacramental dignity of marriage, even if it gives cause to the contract, does not vitiate matrimonial consent."

For many years, this presumption that the general will to marry according to the will of Christ prevailed over private errors about the nature of marriage corresponded with everyday experience. Although people might know that civil divorce was available as a solution to an unhappy marriage, they generally did not apply this knowledge to their own practical judgment when they decided to marry. Despite their theoretical knowledge about the availability of divorce, they wanted the marriage they entered into with this person at this time to be "forever." However, the validity of the presumption has been steadily eroded in recent years as a result of the secularization of society and the proliferation of divorce. Consequently, Pompedda opines:

> In our judgment it is not a legitimate conclusion from canon 1084 [CIC 1917] to say there exists a presumption in favor of marriage for those people who, perhaps largely because of their religious beliefs or secular education, are laboring under a misunderstanding of the essential properties of marriage. This is particularly true since such a presumption is arrived at only by gratuitously conjecturing to a second presumption, namely, that it never occurs to such people, when they enter marriage, to apply their intellectual error to their intention.[150]

During the code revision process, the changing social situation led to a reassessment of the impact of error about the nature of marriage on mar-

[147] CodCom, private response, December 12, 1986, AkK 155 (1986) 482; Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 109.

[148] Coram Stankiewicz, January 27, 1994, Forum 8 (1997) 389–390. See also Navarrete, "Canon 1098 de errore doloso," 179–181.

[149] Benedict XIV, De synodo dioecesana 1, 13, c. 22, nn. 3 and 8.

[150] Coram Pompedda, January 23, 1971, SRRDec 63 (1971) 54.

ital consent. Canon 1099 reiterates the traditional position that error about the unity, indissolubility, or sacramental dignity of marriage does not invalidate consent but adds, "provided that it [the error] does not determine the will." The implication is clear: if an error about the unity, indissolubility, or sacramental dignity of marriage does determine the will, consent is invalid.

The recognition of the relevance of such errors for the validity of consent is not an innovation of the revised code. Rotal jurisprudence had already recognized that firmly held errors about the nature of marriage can so infect people's minds that they cannot will any other kind of marriage than the erroneous version they know. Thus, as early as 1954, Felici held:

> If error is so rooted in the mind of the contractant that it constitutes, as it were, a new nature, it is more difficult to admit the dissension about which we have spoken [the dissension between the positive act of the will and the erroneous opinion]. For generally man acts as he deeply believes on account of the dynamic nature of ideas and images, whereby the more vivid and profound they are and the deeper they lie within the personality, then to that extent they possess more influence and they more forcefully induce to action.[151]

By the 1970s, jurisprudence had universally recognized that deeply rooted or stubborn error (error pervicax) can cause the invalidity of marriage.[152] If it is sufficiently intense, the error itself can invalidate marriage. Even less intense error can, however, bring about invalidity when some circumstance, albeit slight, prompts the person to translate his or her erroneous idea of marriage into the act of the will by which he or she consents to a concrete marriage and thereby to simulate consent.[153]

Jurists agree that, to affect the validity of marriage, error about the nature of marriage must "acquire such intensity as to condition the act of the will."[154] There is less unanimity, however, about how error brings about marital invalidity. Some hold that the error that determines the will referred to in canon 1099 is equivalent to the "condition sine qua non" mentioned in canon 126. Thus, the error brings about marital nullity by attaching to the will an implicit condition sine qua non contrary to the substance of marriage. In other words, the person says, "If I cannot have a marriage as I understand it, I do not want the marriage at all."[155] Others agree that such determining error is not an autonomous ground of nullity. However, they argue, error influences the will by prompting an implicit positive act of the will excluding an essential property or the sacramental dignity of marriage. Thus, determining error is a species of implicit simulation.[156] Still others hold that error of law is an autonomous ground of nullity. Since the will is a "blind" faculty that can intend only what is presented to it by the intellect, stubborn error determines the will and brings about marital invalidity by presenting the will with a fundamentally deficient object.[157]

[151] Coram Felici, July 13, 1954, SRRDec 46 (1954) 616.

[152] I. Parisella, "De pervicaci seu radicato errore circa matrimonii indissolubilitatem: Iurisprudentia Rotalis recentior," in Ius Populi Dei (Rome: Gregorian University, 1972) 3: 513–540.

[153] D. Fellhauer, "The Exclusion of Indissolubility: Old Principles and New Jurisprudence," Stud Can 9 (1975) 128–130. See also the commentary on c. 1101.

[154] John Paul II, alloc, January 30, 1993, AAS 85 (1993) 1259.

[155] U. Navarrete, "De sensu clausulae 'dummodo non determinet voluntatem' can. 1099," P 81 (1992) 469–520; and J. Kowal, "L'errore circa le proprietà essenziali o la dignità sacramentale del matrimonio (c. 1099)," P 87 (1998) 287–327.

[156] Z. Grocholewski, "L'errore circa l'unità, indissolubilità e la sacramentalità del matrimonio," in Error determinans voluntatem (can. 1099), Studi giuridici 35 (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1995) 7–22; and V. De Paolis, "L'errore che determina la volontà," ME 120 (1995) 69–98.

[157] A. Stankiewicz, "L'errore di diritto nel consenso matrimoniale e la sua autonomia giuridica," P 83 (1994)

No matter how error determines the will, it results in marital invalidity only if it bears on the unity, indissolubility, or sacramental dignity of marriage. Unity requires that marriage be an exclusive relationship between one man and one woman and that it exclude polygamy. Since polygamy is barred by the secular law of most Western countries and is held in disrepute by societal mores, error about the unity of marriage is likely to be relatively rare in these countries. Such error may occur more frequently, however, among peoples shaped by non-Western cultures in which polygamy continues to be practiced and socially accepted.

Error about marital indissolubility is likely to be encountered with some frequency in societies like those of the West where civil divorce is readily available and fairly common. A "divorce mentality" is a fertile breeding ground for erroneous conceptions of marriage according to which marriage is a purely personal relationship that is dissoluble at the will of the parties when it no longer meets their needs and expectations. In this climate, people easily come to believe that civil divorce dissolves all obligations of the spouses to one another and leaves them free to enter new marriages. One cannot, however, leap from a person's favorable attitude toward divorce to the conclusion that his or her marriage was invalid because of determining error. One must always assess the intensity of the error and demonstrate how it determined the person's will to enter a concrete marriage.

The Church teaches that every valid marriage between the baptized is by that fact a sacrament (c. 1055, §2). This teaching is rejected by the vast majority of Protestant churches and their members. It has also been rejected by many of those who, although baptized in the Catholic Church as infants, have drifted from the practice of the faith or have even abandoned the Christian faith altogether. These people are, therefore, in error about the sacramental dignity of marriage. However, their error does not in itself invalidate marriage unless it is so deeply rooted and intense that it determines the will.

635–668; K. Lüdicke, "Der Willensbestimmende Irrtum über das Wesen der Ehe nach c. 1099 CIC als eigenständiger Ehenichtigkeitsgrund," OAKR 40 (1991) 54; D. Campbell, "Canon 1099: The Emergence of a New Juridic Figure," Quaderni Studio Rotale 5 (1990) 35–72.

Knowledge or Opinion about Nullity

Canon 1100 — The knowledge or opinion of the nullity of a marriage does not necessarily exclude matrimonial consent.

The fact that one or both parties know (or, at least, consider it probable) that the marriage they are about to enter is invalid does not, in itself, preclude their eliciting naturally sufficient consent. A person who is aware of the existence of a diriment impediment or of the fact that failure to observe the canonical form of marriage will invalidate the marriage can still offer consent that is naturally sufficient to establish marriage. If the person is mistaken about the existence of an impediment or about the obligation to observe canonical form, the marriage cannot be presumed to be invalid merely because he or she believed it was invalid.

Somewhat more problematic is the situation of people who enter marriage knowing or believing that the marriage will be invalid because of defects in their own or their spouse's consent. If the consent is, in fact, defective, the marriage is invalid, not because of the prior knowledge or suspicion about its nullity, but because of the defective consent itself. However, people's judgment about the invalidity of their own or their spouses' consent may be erroneous. For example, some may wrongly believe that their intention to practice artificial birth control constitutes an invalidating intention against the good of offspring or that their spouses had absolutely excluded this good from consent. In such cases, the erring parties cannot be presumed to have consented invalidly. On the other hand, those who enter marriage precisely because they know or believe that the marriage is invalid and that they will subsequently be able to regain their freedom have feigned or simulated marital consent. In this case, the belief, even the erroneous belief, that the marriage will be invalid has become the cause of consent.

Simulation of Consent

Canon 1101 — §1. The internal consent of the mind is presumed to conform to the words and signs used in celebrating the marriage.

§2. If, however, either or both of the parties by a positive act of the will exclude marriage itself, some essential element of marriage, or some essential property of marriage, the party contracts invalidly.

As an act of the will, matrimonial consent is internal to the mind and invisible to sensory perception. The existence of consent must, therefore, be deduced from its external manifestations in perceptible words, signs, and behavior. For evaluating the existence and adequacy of consent, the law gives priority to the words or signs used in the celebration of marriage. The law presumes that the internal consent of the will corresponds with the words or signs employed to give it external expression during the marriage ceremony. Thus, when a couple exchange consent according to the formula of the Rite of Marriage, they are presumed to have consented internally to marriage as it is understood by the Church. On the other hand, if they wrote their own wedding vows and promised to love and honor each other "as long as our love endures," they are presumed to have entered a union from which the property of indissolubility has been excluded. This presumption of law is a simple one that cedes to contrary proof.

Although canon 1101 does not use the term "simulation" to denote the exclusion of the substance of marriage by a positive act of the will,[158] the term has a long history in jurisprudence. Simulation occurs when a person desires to enter marriage or, at least, to go through a marriage ceremony to enjoy certain benefits of marriage, but intends marriage in such a truncated form that the object of consent is substantially defective. Thus, there are two conflicting acts of the will, one directed toward marriage or a semblance of marriage and the other rejecting marriage as understood by the Church. If the act of the will rejecting marriage prevails over the one seeking it, the marriage is invalid.

Invalidating simulation requires a positive act of the will which excludes either marriage itself or one of its essential elements or properties. This positive act of the will "can be absolute or hypothetical, explicit or implicit, actual or virtual; an habitual will, or mere inclination, or an interpretive opinion or will, which remain in the intellect and do not move into the will, do not invalidate marriage."[159]

On the one hand, the positive act of the will must be more than a habitual or interpretive will. A habitual will is a more or less enduring tendency toward a particular intention. Although it does not in itself invalidate marriage because it remains in the intellect, a habitual intention is always a near occasion of simulation. For example, a person who has a general disposition favorable to divorce as a solution to an unhappy marriage may be easily prompted by pre-matrimonial tensions and conflicts to intend a marriage lacking the property of perpetuity. An interpretive will is what a person would have intended had he or she been aware of a particular circumstance at the time of consent. For example, a person may accurately claim that had she known that her spouse was HIV positive, she would not have intended to have children with him. However, since this intention was never actually elicited but is an after-the-fact judgment, it does not affect the validity of consent.

On the other hand, an act of the will need not be actual, absolute, or explicit to invalidate marriage; it is sufficient that the act be virtual, hypothetical, or implicit. An act of the will is actual if it is, in fact, elicited at the time of the wedding; it is virtual if it is formulated prior to the external exchange of consent, even a long time prior to it, and never retracted. An act of the will is absolute if it excludes marriage itself or one of its essential elements or properties without qualification; it is hypothetical when it excludes marriage or one of its essential elements or properties only if certain conditions are met. Thus, a man who reserves the right to regain his freedom by seeking a divorce whenever it suits his fancy excludes indissolubility absolutely, but a woman who resolves to seek a divorce if her fiancé continues to abuse her physically after the marriage excludes indissolubility hypothetically.

[158] See, however, c. 1379 which calls for a just penalty for those who "simulate" a sacrament.

[159] Coram Bruno, February 1, 1991, SRRDec 83 (1991) 67–68.

The positive act of the will simulating marriage can also be either explicit or implicit. An explicit act of the will excludes marriage or one of its essential elements or properties directly. For example, a person who goes through a marriage ceremony with no intention of sharing a life with his spouse but solely to regularize his immigration status simulates explicitly. A positive act of the will may also be implicit or contained in another act. Often this implicit act of the will involves intending a form of marriage that is radically incompatible with the Christian understanding. For example, a person who has thoroughly appropriated the "hippy" ideology of free love and rejects the notion that permanent commitments are possible may simulate implicitly.[160]

To invalidate marriage, this positive act of the will must exclude from consent either marriage itself (total simulation) or one of its essential elements or properties (partial simulation). In total simulation, a person does not want marriage at all, but goes through a marriage either as a sham or solely as a means to achieve some end totally extrinsic to marriage. In partial simulation, a person may want a "marriage," but a marriage on one's own terms and devoid of an essential element or property of marriage. Since simulation involves a positive act of the will, simulators must be aware, at least in an inchoate way, of what they are intending, but they need not be aware of the invalidating effect of their intentions.

Total simulation can occur in various ways. A person can simulate totally:

(1) by not intending to contract marriage at all, i.e., by reducing the ceremony to an empty show;
(2) by undergoing the ceremony solely to obtain an end absolutely extrinsic to marriage itself;
(3) by excluding from the object of his/her consent the very core of marriage, i.e., the exchange of the perpetual and exclusive right over the body;
(4) by excluding sacramentality from the marriage;[161]
(5) by substituting for the Christian idea of marriage some other notion which is genuinely antithetical to marriage.[162]

The essential properties of marriage are unity and indissolubility (c. 1056). Unity requires that marriage be an exclusive relationship between one man and one woman. Thus, a person who reserves the right to have more than one spouse simulates unity. However, recent jurisprudence has expanded the notion of unity to include the right to fidelity.

> There are many ways by which the right of fidelity can be removed: a) through direct ex-

[160] See R. Jenkins, Recent Rotal Jurisprudence on Simulation contra Bonum Sacramenti by an Implicit Act of the Will, CanLawStud 551 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1999).

[161] Not all canonists, or even all Rotal judges, agree that exclusion of the sacramental dignity of marriage necessarily leads to total simulation. See A. Mendonça, "Exclusion of the Sacramentality of Marriage: Recent Trends in Rotal Jurisprudence," Stud Can 31 (1997) 5–48. See also the discussion below about exclusion of the sacramental dignity of marriage from consent.

[162] J. Johnson, "Total Simulation in Recent Rotal Jurisprudence," Stud Can 24 (1990) 423. This recapitulates the principles articulated in coram Ragni, July 19, 1983, SRRDec 75 (1983) 471.

clusion of the right itself; b) through the attachment to consent of a condition contrary to the obligation of fidelity; c) through concession of the right to the conjugal act to a third person; d) through an intention, even an implicit one, of excluding the obligation by manifesting a firm plan of having sexual relations with others, even those of his or her own sex; e) because of a stubborn conviction about the impossibility for frail human nature to observe the good of fidelity; f) through the limitation of the right or obligation to a definite or indefinite period of time; g) through an intention to commit adultery which prevails over the intention of giving and accepting the obligation of fidelity.[163]

Although the fact that fidelity is violated during the marriage does not dissolve the marriage, entering marriage while refusing one's spouse the right to a faithful relationship excludes the good of fidelity. Traditional jurisprudence has, however, distinguished the intention to exclude the right to a faithful relationship from the intention to concede one's spouse the right but to abuse it. The former invalidates consent, but the latter does not. Thus, a person can enter marriage intending to recognize his or her spouse's right to a faithful relationship, but foreseeing that he or she will be unfaithful should the opportunity present itself. In practice, distinguishing an intention to exclude the right itself from an intention to abuse or not to honor the right can be difficult. Often, the key to discerning the intention of the suspected simulator is his or her pattern of behavior. If a person was promiscuous or maintained a liaison with a third party before and during the marriage, he or she presumably excluded the right to fidelity; but, if the person was guilty only of a few discrete indiscretions, he or she presumably conceded the right to a faithful relationship but abused that right.

With the perhaps overly subtle distinction between the intention to deny the right and the intention to abuse the right, jurisprudence has left a certain amount of room for hedging on the bonum fidei. However, there is no such room for hedging on the bonum sacramenti or indissolubility. One either intends a perpetual union or one does not. The increased availability of civil divorce and the increased willingness of people, including Catholics, to avail themselves of this option have led jurisprudence to reconsider the various ways in which people can exclude indissolubility from their marital consent.

A person who knows the Church's teaching on marriage but consciously rejects it as "old fashioned" or "too demanding" and marries "with the understanding that he has the option, albeit hypothetical, of dissolving the bond and recovering his former status of full freedom" to enter another marriage explicitly excludes indissolubility from consent.[164] Moreover, people, whether aware of the Church's teaching on marriage or not, may be convinced that marriage is such a personal reality that its terms are defined by the spouses themselves. Such persons may formulate their own doctrine of marriage which, explicitly or implicitly, excludes indissolubility.[165] More common is the situation where people exclude indissolubility hypothetically, i.e., by retaining the right to seek a divorce if some circumstance is realized. For example, a person who grew up in a home where her father physically abused her mother may reserve the right to seek a divorce should her husband abuse her. To exclude the good of permanence, people need not be aware of the Church's teaching on the indissolubility of marriage or of the invalidating effect of their intention or desire or even anticipate the marriage will fail. What is essential is that they reserve the right to terminate the relationship either at will or if a particular circumstance occurs.

The revised code has introduced the expression "some essential element" of marriage as a possible object of simulation. The relative novelty of the expression has resulted in a lack of consensus about which elements of marriage are so essential that their exclusion by a positive act of the will causes marital invalidity. There is, however, agreement that among marriage's essential elements are at least its ordination to the procreation and education of offspring, its ordination to the good of the spouses, and, for some commentators at least, its sacramental dignity.

[163] Coram Bruno, June 15, 1990, SRRDec 82 (1990) 515–516.

[164] Coram Pompedda, July 1, 1969, SRRDec 61 (1969) 691.

[165] Ibid.

Whether a particular marriage gives rise to children is, in some measure, beyond the control of the spouses. The failure to have children, whether because of the sterility of the parties or because of their conscious intention, does not in itself invalidate consent, but exclusion of the right to potentially procreative conjugal acts by a positive act of the will is invalidating. Exclusion of marriage's ordination to the procreation and education of offspring occurs when a spouse reserves to himself or herself the right to determine whether, when, and under what circumstances conjugal relations will be open to the procreation of children. Thus, the good of offspring is excluded when:

1. The right to acts per se apt for the generation of children is excluded absolutely;
2. The right to such acts is limited, even for a time;
3. The exclusion of the right, even for a time, is made a condition for marriage;
4. The exclusion of the right is implicit in the exclusion of children from the marriage;
5. The right to conjugal acts is limited to contraceptive acts only, or to conjugal acts only during the "safe time."[166]

As it has done with the bonum fidei, jurisprudence has distinguished the exclusion of the right to the bonum prolis from its non-exercise or abuse. In an age in which contraceptives are readily available, it can be difficult to determine whether a couple's decision to practice birth control constitutes an exclusion of the right to potentially procreative conjugal acts which invalidates marriage or a decision not to exercise this right or even to abuse it, which may be morally illegitimate but does not affect marital validity. The persistent refusal by one of the spouses to honor the other's insistence that conjugal relations be open to procreation can often lead to the presumption that the right itself was excluded. Even in cases where openness to children was not a source of contention during the period of common life, an exclusion of the right may be implicit "in the consistent use of contraceptives so that acts per se apt for the generation of children never occur in the time of conjugal life, and there is no responsible objective cause for this."[167]

Marriage is ordered not only to the procreation of offspring but also to their education. Under the 1917 code, jurisprudence recognized that, for a person to marry validly, it was not sufficient for spouses to be open to the procreation of offspring. In addition, they could not validly enter marriage with an intention of bringing about the death of a fetus once conceived (e.g., by securing an abortion) or of exposing the child once born directly or indirectly (e.g., by neglect) to the danger of death.[168] However, the 1917 code did not include the exclusion of the education of children among the essential elements of marriage whose exclusion resulted in the invalidity of marriage.[169]

The 1983 code does not rule out the positive exclusion of the education of children as a basis for marital nullity. In fact, the revised code extends the obligation of parents beyond ensuring their children's physical survival and safety to include their "social, cultural, moral, and religious education" (c. 1136). This obligation has both moral and juridic dimensions, but the implications of the juridic dimension for marital consent have not yet been plumbed. Jurisprudence still needs to determine "'what is the essential minimum' of education, in which the right-duty to the transmission of human life is joined to the right-duty of its [166] J. Provost, "Simulated Consent: A New Way of Looking at an Old Way of Thinking—Part I," J 55 (1995) 719.

[167] Ibid.

[168] See K. Schmidt, "Educatio prolis and the Validity of Marriage," J 55 (1995) 261–263.

[169] CIC 1086, §2.

protection, reception, and growth, as a human person, in the conjugal community."[170]

The good of the spouses to which marriage is ordered by its very nature is also an essential element of marriage. Therefore, to exclude this good from one's consent by a positive act of the will invalidates marriage. The lack of consensus about the content of the good of the spouses[171] makes it difficult to offer concrete examples of the sort of intentions contra bonum coniugum that would render marriage invalid.[172] Moreover, as of this writing, there are no reported decisions of the Rota that deal directly with an alleged exclusion of the good of the spouses.[173] This somewhat confused situation suggests the need for caution in admitting cases to marriage tribunals on the ground of this type of exclusion. Nevertheless, the Rota is unlikely to decide a case on such a ground unless the case reaches it on appeal from a lower court. Thus, the need for caution when dealing with this ground is not a warrant for avoiding it altogether.

Simulation of the good of the spouses may occur if a person, perhaps for motives quite extraneous to marriage, excludes from consent "'the right to the intimate partnership of persons,' which is an essential part of the formal substantial element of marital consent."[174] Such a situation may be the hypothetical case formulated by Jemolo in which a man marries a woman solely to make her life miserable to avenge the injuries her family had inflicted on his. Such extreme cases may, however, be rather rare and may be difficult to distinguish from cases of total simulation.[175]

According to the Church's teaching, when two baptized persons marry validly, their marriage is by that fact a sacrament (c. 1055, §2). When one baptized person marries another while excluding the sacramental dignity of marriage from his consent, the marriage is invalid. This much is traditional jurisprudence. Recently, however, canonists have discussed how cases in which the exclusion of marriage's sacramental dignity is alleged should be dealt with in tribunals. The traditional position is that exclusion of sacramental dignity is a species of total simulation. The marriage contract and the marital sacrament are so intimately intertwined that to exclude one is to exclude the other.[176] More recently, canonists have argued that, at least from a psychological perspective, a person can genuinely desire a marriage, but one bereft of the quality of sacramentality. Thus, simulation of sacramental dignity is a species of partial simulation in which an essential element or property of marriage is excluded from consent.[177]

The mere fact that a baptized person adheres to a non-Catholic church whose doctrine rejects the sacramentality of marriage is not sufficient to prove that he or she excluded sacramental dignity from consent. The person's religious beliefs would be presumed to be at most a general or habitual intention and not the positive act of the will required for simulation. Nevertheless, during the course of preparation for a Catholic wedding, the Church's teaching on the sacramentality of marriage may be brought to the non-Catholic's attention so pointedly that he is prompted to translate this habitual will [170] A. Stankiewicz, "L'esclusione della procreazione ed educazione della prole," in La simulazione del consenso matrimoniale canonico, ed. P. Bonnet (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1990) 169. For suggestions as to where jurisprudence may be moving in this area, see Schmidt, 243–280.

[171] See the commentary on c. 1055.

[172] See L. DeLuca, "L'esclusione del 'bonum coniugum,'" in La simulazione del consenso matrimoniale canonico, 125–137; and Il "bonum coniugum" nel matrimonio canonico (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1996).

[173] Some first instance decisions on the ground of exclusion of the good of the spouses have been issued, however. See Il Diritto Ecclesiastico 104 (1993) 21–76.

[174] E. Pfnausch, "The Good of the Spouses in Rotal Jurisprudence: New Horizons," J 56 (1996) 555.

[175] Ibid.

[176] Gasparri, n. 827. More recently, see C. Burke, "The Sacramentality of Marriage: Canonical Reflections," ME 119 (1994) 556.

[177] Z. Grocholewski, "Crisis doctrinae et iurisprudentiae rotalis circa exclusionem dignitatis sacramentalis in contractu matrimoniali," P 67 (1978) 283–295; and D. Faltin, "The Exclusion of the Sacramentality of Marriage with Particular Reference to the Marriage of Baptized Non-Believers," in Marriage Studies IV, ed. J. Alesandro (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1990) 66–104.

into a positive act of the will excluding sacramental dignity from consent to this marriage.[178]

Conditional Consent

Since the canonical tradition has treated marriage as a contract, marriage can, like other contracts, be entered into conditionally. A condition is a circumstance attached to consent by a positive act of the will in such a way that the validity of the marriage is made dependent on the verification of the circumstance. In other words, people condition their marital consent when "a particular circumstance is so important to them that they rate it higher than marriage itself and that, if they cannot have the circumstance or quality, they do not want the marriage either."[179] Conditions can concern the future (e.g., I marry you on condition that you are drafted in the first round of the NBA draft next year), the present (e.g., I marry you on condition that you are a virgin), or the past (e.g., I marry you on condition that you have never been married before).

Since in conditional consent some circumstance is so important to the person that the marriage is subordinated to it, it is important to distinguish true conditions from other circumstances that do not enter into marital consent itself. A condition is not the same as the cause of the contract or the motive for marrying a particular person (e.g., I marry you because you are rich). Nor is a condition equivalent to a mode or "the addition of a certain obligation to a contract already completed"[180] (e.g., I marry you, but, after our marriage, you must return to active practice of the Catholic faith). A condition is also distinct from a demonstration or a quality that is more or less taken for granted in one's future spouse (e.g., I marry you who are Irish).[181] Finally, a condition is not the same as a "prerequisite" (sometimes called a "postulate" or a "presupposition") or a quality that prompts the initial decision to marry and significantly affects the decision to enter an engagement but does not, in theory, influence the subsequent decision to marry.[182]

Causes of the contract, modes, demonstrations, and prerequisites are not equivalent to conditions because they do not directly enter into the actual marital contracting itself, but are side issues. Nevertheless, these neat canonical distinctions should not obscure the fact that none of these quasi-conditions is any more than a hair's breadth from a true condition. Thus, in practice, tribunals need to be attentive not only to the way in which parties articulate their intentions with regard to marriage, but also to what they really meant. In the end, the concrete facts of the particular case are more important than canonical distinctions.

To invalidate marriage, a condition attached to consent can be either explicit or implicit. A person positing a condition need not be aware that such a condition has the potential for invalidating consent.

> People are generally unaware of such legalities and in no way realize that entering marriage conditionally results in invalidity. . . . And consequently Rotal jurisprudence, especially as it has evolved in recent years, holds that a true condition can coexist with ignorance of its invalidating effect as long as it is clear that the person would not have consented to marry unless the quality had been present.[183]

Often a person's doubt about a quality or circumstance prompts him or her to attach a condi-

[178] See A. Mendonça, "Exclusion of the Sacramentality of Marriage: Recent Trends in Rotal Jurisprudence," Stud Can 31 (1997) 5–48. Some Rotal judges have also treated exclusion of sacramental dignity as a species of determining error (c. 1099). See A. Stankiewicz, "Errore circa le proprietà e la dignità sacramentale del matrimonio," ME 109 (1984) 470–486; and M. Pompedda, "Faith and the Sacramentality of Marriage—Lack of Faith and Matrimonial Consent: Juridical Aspects," in Marriage Studies IV, 33–65.

[179] Coram Pinto, June 26, 1971, SRRDec 63 (1971) 560.

[180] R. Colantonio, "La condicio de futuro," in Il consenso matrimoniale condizionato: Dottrina e giurisprudenza recente (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1993) 40.

[181] Ibid., 37.

[182] Ibid. See also Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 158–159.

[183] Coram Pinto, June 26, 1971, SRRDec 63 (1971) 560.

tion to consent. While the existence of such a doubt can be extremely helpful in proving that a condition was appended to consent and Rotal jurisprudence has often insisted on it as a necessary element of proof, a particular quality can be so important to a person that his or her obsession with it prompts the attachment of a condition even without a doubt.[184]

For a person to make consent to marriage conditional on the verification of some circumstance, that circumstance should have some objective importance, and its presence or absence should have the potential to have a significant impact on a couple's future life. Often, the values of the culture in which a person is immersed may help to identify circumstances important enough to be the object of a condition. For example, in some cultures a woman's virginity at the time of marriage is more highly prized than in others. Nevertheless, it is ultimately the individual's subjective assessment of the importance of a particular circumstance that determines whether it became the object of a condition.

Future Conditions

Canon 1102 — §1. A marriage subject to a condition about the future cannot be contracted validly.

The 1917 code declared that future conditions that were not contrary to the substance of marriage but were necessary (e.g., if the sun rises tomorrow), impossible (e.g., if you grow wings and fly), or indecent (e.g., if you will submit to unnatural sexual acts) were presumed not to have been attached to consent. Future conditions contrary to the substance of marriage were treated as the equivalent of simulation and invalidated marriage. However, licit future conditions suspended the validity of marriage until the condition was realized or not.[185] To suspend the validity of marriage, it was sufficient that the future licit condition concern a circumstance that would occur within a few years of the wedding and be reasonably specific (e.g., I marry you on condition that you earn your law degree within three years).[186]

The 1983 code has thoroughly revised the law governing future conditions attached to consent. Since November 27, 1983, all marriages entered into with a condition concerning the future are invalid. The recognition that consent whose validity was made dependent on some future contingency is incompatible with consent as the self-giving of the spouses to establish a partnership of the whole of life prompted this change in the law. Moreover, allowing a future condition to suspend the validity of marriage is "a 'corrupting yeast,' that is, a device that undermines the principle of the indissolubility of the matrimonial bond and introduces into marriage a state of uncertainty that is absolutely alien to and therefore incompatible with it."[187]

Nevertheless, the revised law invalidating marriages entered into with future conditions is considered to be a matter of positive law.[188] Therefore, this law does not have retroactive effect and cannot be used to judge cases involving marriages entered prior to November 27, 1983. These cases must be judged in accord with the law and jurisprudence that developed under the 1917 code. If canon 1102, §1 is a matter of positive ecclesiastical law, it is also not applicable to the marriages of two non-Catholics (c. 11).

Past and Present Conditions

§2. A marriage entered into subject to a condition about the past or the present is valid or not insofar as that which is subject to the condition exists or not.

§3. The condition mentioned in §2, however, cannot be placed licitly without the written permission of the local ordinary.

[184] Coram Stankiewicz, January 30, 1992, in Il consenso matrimoniale condizionato, 150–151.

[185] CIC 1092, 1°–3°.

[186] Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 157.

[187] Colantonio, 46.

[188] Comm 3 (1971) 77. See L. Notaro, "Retroattività-irretroattività del. can. 1102, par. 1," in Il consenso matrimoniale condizionato, 61–71.

If marriage is entered into with a condition concerning the past or the present, the validity of the marriage depends on the existence of the circumstance that is the object of the condition at the time of consent. Only a true condition that was attached to consent and never revoked influences the validity of marriage. Proof of such a condition usually requires that the person had harbored doubts about the existence of the circumstance or quality or at least was subjectively obsessed with it so that the doubts or obsession prompted him or her to subordinate the marriage to the existence of the circumstance or quality. If the person who is said to have consented conditionally took steps to terminate the marriage as soon as the presence or absence of the circumstance or quality that was the object of the condition was verified, he or she presumably consented conditionally.[189]

It is not sufficient, however, that the person took the quality for granted but would have formulated a condition had there been any evident reason for doubting the quality's presence or even that most people would have formulated such a condition had they had reason to think about the circumstance. Such conditions are interpretive, not actual. Thus, when, prior to their marriage, a woman had no reason to think that her fiancé was a "cross-dresser" and she left him immediately after discovering, while on the honeymoon, that he was, the marriage would probably not be invalid because of her conditional consent. It may, however, be invalid because of the error imposed on her by his deceit (c. 1098).

To attach a past or present condition to consent lawfully, a person must have the written permission of the local ordinary. Although this stipulation was not found in the 1917 code, it was recognized as normative by most canonists.[190] If a local ordinary is aware that a couple is planning to marry conditionally, there may be compelling pastoral reasons not only to refuse the permission but to prohibit the marriage until the condition has been verified or revoked (c. 1077, §1). However, the refusal of permission or the failure to seek it affects only the lawfulness of the marriage and not its validity. The marriage will be valid or not depending on whether the condition is met.

The Eastern code differs from the Latin discipline on past and present conditions attached to consent. Consent to marriage with a condition of any kind attached is invalid.[191] Thus, an Eastern Catholic who attaches a past or present condition to consent marries invalidly even if the condition is verified. For example, an Eastern Catholic man who marries a woman on condition that he is the father of the child she is carrying does so invalidly even if he is the father of her child.

Force and Fear

Canon 1103 — A marriage is invalid if entered into because of force or grave fear from without, even if unintentionally inflicted, so that a person is compelled to choose marriage in order to be free from it.

Freedom in choosing one's state of life and, if that choice is for marriage, in choosing one's spouse is a basic human right recognized by the Church's teaching office.[192] External coercion that seriously compromises a person's marital freedom violates this right and is, therefore, unjust. Moreover, external coercion contradicts the very nature of marriage as an intimate partnership of life and love.[193] Thus, canon law invalidates marriages entered into as a result of grave fear even though consent, the efficient cause of marriage, is given, albeit under duress.[194]

> The ultimate reason why fear has an invalidating effect... is that marriage by its very [189] Coram Stankiewicz, January 20, 1992, in Il consenso matrimoniale condizionato, 152.

[190] See Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 515.

[191] CCEO 826.

[192] GS 26.

[193] GS 48.

[194] This is the reason that juridic acts in general are invalid only if the extrinsic force is irresistible (c. 125, §1) but are valid but rescindable if the force is merely grave and unjust (c. 125, §2). Thus, c. 1103 is an exception to the general norm governing the validity of juridic acts.

> divine institution is a community of life and love between the spouses. Where there is not love but aversion, a fundamental element of this communion of life and love is lacking.[195]

Force (vis) is physical or moral coercion brought to bear on another person; fear (metus) is the result of this force on the one on whom it is inflicted. If the force exerted is irresistible (as may be the case when a "shotgun wedding" includes a real, loaded shotgun), the resulting marriage is invalid. Outside such cases of irresistible force, fear must be grave, extrinsic, and causative to invalidate a marriage.

Common Fear

Fear may be absolutely or relatively grave. Fear is absolutely grave when it results from a cause that would intimidate a mature and well-balanced person sufficiently to compel that person to enter an unwanted marriage. Examples of causes of absolutely grave fear are threats of death, imprisonment, or disinheritance. Immature, vulnerable, or insecure people may be browbeaten into marriage by threats of lesser gravity. Relatively grave fear may be induced by threats of defamation, withdrawal of college tuition assistance, loss of a job, or eviction from a home. Although relatively grave fear may be somewhat subjective, it must have some objective weight, and there must be a prudent reason to believe that threats would be carried out if the person refused to marry. Otherwise, the force prodding a person toward marriage would be intrinsic or self-imposed.[196]

Invalidating force and fear must come from a source outside the affected person. The fear cannot result from scrupulosity, a sense of moral or social obligation, or some other internal psychological process. Moreover, since coercing a person to marry is unjust and only a human act can be just or unjust, the source of the fear must be a human agent and not some impersonal cause. Thus, a man who marries his pregnant girlfriend out of fear that he will be killed in an impending military operation and will be punished by God for failing "to do the right thing" or the pregnant young woman who marries out of fear that she would otherwise be unable to support herself and her child do not marry invalidly because of the influence of grave fear inflicted ab extrinseco. In such cases, however, the fear, if sufficiently grave, may temporarily impede a person's ability to exercise due discretion (c. 1095, 2°).

Grave fear from without must also cause marriage in order to invalidate it. "Marriage, in other words, must be the effect, of which the cause (the principal and determining cause) is fear, so that if the fear (the cause) were not present, marriage (the effect) would not take place."[197] Under the pressure of moral coercion, the person must have no other realistic option except marriage to escape the evil threatened. If a person has realistic courses of action available besides marriage, even if they are no more attractive than marriage, he or she presumably marries "with fear" but not "because of fear." Thus, a young Arab woman who is pregnant out of wedlock may have no option but to marry to avoid being killed to preserve her family's "honor," but a twenty-something career woman in North America also pregnant out of wedlock may have several options for dealing with her predicament.

To invalidate marriage, the force that gives rise to grave fear need not be exerted directly to bring about a marriage. It is sufficient that the force be present and that it bring about the marriage indirectly.[198] For example, when the father of a woman, who is a junior at Harvard, discovers that his daughter has been living with her boyfriend and insists that she transfer to a small liberal arts college near their home and live at home while completing her degree, the father does not [195] U. Navarrete, "Oportetne ut supprimantur verba 'ab extrinseco et iniuste incussum' in can. 1087, circa metum irritantem matrimonium?" in Ius Populi Dei (Rome: Gregorian University, 1972) 3:591.

[196] Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 163.

[197] Ibid., 164.

[198] Comm 16 (1983) 234.

directly intend to force his daughter to marry. In fact, his primary intention may be to break up her relationship with her boyfriend. However, the unintended consequence of his intervention may be to prompt her decision to marry the man, even though she knows she does not love him, because she can see no other way to maintain the benefits of a Harvard education. The one exerting the force that leads to grave fear need not be aware of the consequences of his actions. What is critical is that, even unintentionally, the person's actions result in grave fear.

The 1917 code had stipulated that grave fear invalidated marriage only if it were "unjustly inflicted."[199] In the revised code, the phrase "unjustly inflicted" no longer qualifies the fear that invalidates marriage. This deletion is a recognition that, no matter how justified one's anger or disappointment at a person may be, there is no justification for compelling him or her to choose marriage unwillingly.

The grave fear that invalidates marriage is one by which "a person is compelled to choose marriage in order to be free from it" (c. 1103). It is not necessary that the person be compelled to choose a marriage with a particular person; it is sufficient that he or she be compelled by the fear to enter an unwanted marriage, even if he or she is free in the choice of a partner. For example, a person whose parents stipulate that he must marry by the age of twenty-five or forfeit a substantial inheritance may have no choice except to marry to avoid a grave financial loss, but still be free in the choice of the person he marries.

The acid test for determining whether grave fear caused a marriage is evidence of aversion or repugnance on the part of the one who claims to have experienced such fear. A person compelled to marry by grave fear may exhibit aversion toward the unwanted partner. However, a person may genuinely like his or her partner as a friend but exhibit repugnance not toward this person, but toward marriage with him or her. "The ordinary signs or symptoms of aversion are crying and complaining before the marriage, sadness and denial of affection. The absence of such signs after the marriage proves nothing since it is then presumed that one is making the best of a bad situation."[200] While it is virtually impossible to prove a case of force and fear without some evidence of aversion, aversion itself gives rise only to a presumption of grave fear. The presence of fear itself must be proven.

Reverential Fear

A person in a relationship of dependence or subordination to another is particularly susceptible to moral coercion to enter marriage, even when the duress inflicted might not be considered objectively grave if the victim of the coercion were not dependent on or subordinate to the coercer. On the one hand, the subject person in such a relationship has an instinctive respect for and desire to please the superior; on the other hand, the subject is fearful of offending the superior and incurring his or her indignation. In a situation in which the subject can avoid offending or can assuage the indignation of the superior only by marrying, the resulting fear can compel him or her to choose an unpalatable marriage. Although such "reverential fear" can easily arise in any relationship of dependence or subordination, it most commonly occurs in the relationship of parents with their children. The kind of fear that can arise in the parent-child relationship highlights the fact that the specific object of reverential fear is not a particular evil threatened by the parent but the parental indignation itself. Thus, a young woman, pregnant out of wedlock and threatened by disinheritance by her father if she does not marry her lover may know that her father will not carry out his threat to disinherit her. However, knowing also that he will never forgive her if she does not marry, she may marry out of reverential fear because of the credible threat of ongoing parental indignation.

Nevertheless, to invalidate marriage, the fear of parental indignation must have some objective gravity. In other words, the person must have some probable basis for believing that his or her refusal to marry will result in harsh and enduring parental indignation. Indignation is not to be confused with efforts of parents to advise their children, to warn them, or even to try to persuade them to marry or to marry a particular person. While these moderate efforts at persuasion may prompt a child to marry freely but reluctantly, they are not usually sufficient to induce invalidating reverential fear. Such fear is more likely to be evoked by "severities, cruelties, absolute and imperious commands, threats, curses, a grim and gloomy mien, angry badgering, ceaseless and uncivil complaining, constant and annoying requests"[201] that leave the child with no option but marriage to escape this importuning.

[199] CIC 1087, §1.

[200] Wrenn, The Invalid Marriage, 165.

Applicability of Force and Fear to Marriages of Non-Catholics

Since canon 1103 is an exception to the general principle that merely grave fear does not invalidate a juridic act (c. 125, §2), it could be argued that the canon is a matter of merely ecclesiastical law and, therefore, no longer applicable to the marriages of non-Catholics (c. 11). However, on April 23, 1987, the then Pontifical Commission for the Interpretation of the Code of Canon Law responded affirmatively to the question "whether the defective consent of canon 1103 can be applied to the marriages of non-Catholics."[202] Since non-Catholics are no longer bound by merely ecclesiastical laws (c. 11), this authentic interpretation seems to affirm that grave force and fear invalidate marriage by the natural law.[203]

[201] Ibid., 166.

[202] CodCom, response, April 23, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1132.

[203] See L. Wrenn, "Urban Navarrete, S.J., and the Response of the Code Commission on Force and Fear," J 51 (1991) 119–137; and U. Navarrete, "Responsa Pontificiae Commissionis Codici Iuris Canonici authentice interpretando," P 73 (1988) 497–510.

Presence of the Spouses at the Exchange of Consent

Canon 1104 — §1. To contract a marriage validly the contracting parties must be present together, either in person or by proxy.

§2. Those being married are to express matrimonial consent in words or, if they cannot speak, through equivalent signs.

Before the 1917 code, it was legitimate to contract marriage by letter.[204] This practice was abrogated by canon 1088, §1 of the 1917 code, which has been repeated virtually verbatim in the present canon. Since matrimonial consent is an act of the will by which the spouses mutually give and accept one another (c. 1057, §2), the presence of the spouses for the exchange of consent either personally or through their duly appointed proxies is required for the validity of the marriage. The revised code has added the word "together" (una) to canon 1088, §1 of the 1917 code to emphasize that the spouses must be present simultaneously for the exchange of consent. Thus, a marriage would be invalid if one spouse appeared before the official witness to give his consent while the other spouse appeared to give consent at another time or before a different official minister or in a different place.

In June of 1949, the Holy Office declared that the presence of both spouses for the exchange of consent was required for validity not only for marriages involving at least one Catholic but also for those involving all baptized Christians, whether Catholic or not.[205] A month later, the Holy Office issued a private reply declaring that a marriage could be declared invalid if the parties were not present together for the exchange of consent, if at least one of them was certainly baptized.[206] These responses were little more than applications to marriage of canon 12 of the 1917 code which [204] F. Cappello, Summa Iuris Canonici (Rome: Gregorian University, 1962) 382.

[205] SCOf, decl, June 30,1949, AAS 41 (1949) 427.

[206] SCOf, response, July 15, 1949, CLD 3, 446–447.

bound all baptized persons, whether Catholic or not, to observe merely ecclesiastical laws unless they were expressly exempted and of canon 1016 of the same code which subjected the marriages of the baptized to the requirements of ecclesiastical law. However, baptized non-Catholics are no longer bound by merely ecclesiastical laws (c. 11). Thus, the apparent basis for the congregation's declaration has been undermined. The simultaneous presence of two baptized non-Catholics is now required for the validity of their consent only if it is required by the law of their church or ecclesial community or the law to which it defers.[207] The marriages of the unbaptized are governed by civil law.[208]

If the spouses can speak, they are to express their consent in words. If not, they can express their consent in equivalent signs. In either case, the expression of consent must clearly and unequivocally communicate to those present the spouses' intent to enter marriage. For the marriages of Catholics, including mixed marriages celebrated according to the canonical form, marital consent should be exchanged through one of the formulae prescribed in the approved liturgical books. While episcopal conferences can propose formulae for the exchange of consent that differ from those in the Roman Ritual,[209] spouses and official witnesses are not free to alter the approved formulae or to compose their own. Such adaptations do not necessarily invalidate consent, but they do render it illicit.[210] Adaptations of the formulae for the exchange of consent and original compositions need to be scrutinized carefully to ensure that their content is consistent with the Church's teaching on marriage. If these formulae exclude an essential element or property of marriage, the marriage must be presumed to be invalid (c. 1101, §1).

[207] See CCEO 780–781.

[208] See the commentary on c. 1057, §1.

[209] Rite of Marriage, 17.

[210] J. Huels, The Pastoral Companion (Quincy, Ill.: Franciscan Press, 1995) 248.

Proxy Marriages

Canon 1105 — §1. To enter into a marriage validly by proxy it is required that:

1° there is a special mandate to contract with a specific person;

2° the proxy is designated by the one mandating and fulfills this function personally.

§2. To be valid the mandate must be signed by the one mandating and by the pastor or ordinary of the place where the mandate is given, or by a priest delegated by either of them, or at least by two witnesses, or it must be made by means of a document which is authentic according to the norm of civil law.

§3. If the one mandating cannot write, this is to be noted in the mandate itself and another witness is to be added who also signs the document; otherwise, the mandate is invalid.

§4. If the one mandating revokes the mandate or develops amentia before the proxy contracts in his or her name, the marriage is invalid even if the proxy or the other contracting party does not know this.

Since the canonical tradition has treated marriage as a contract, it has logically made provision for marriage to be entered into by proxy like other contracts. A proxy is an agent who is authorized to perform juridic acts on behalf of a principal. The juridic acts performed by the proxy entail the same obligations for the principal as if he or she had performed them personally. Thus, a marriage entered into by a lawful proxy binds the principal to a perpetual and exclusive relationship with the other party.

Since a proxy marriage entails serious obligations for the principal, a proxy must have a special mandate that expressly authorizes him or her to contract marriage on behalf of the principal. Only the principal can grant such a mandate and the authorization cannot be delegated by the designated proxy. For its validity, the mandate must be signed by the principal and by the pastor or the local ordinary of the place where it was issued or by a priest delegated by either of them. Other legitimate options are for the mandate to be signed by the principal and two witnesses and for it to be prepared in a form recognized by civil law. If the principal cannot write, that fact is to be mentioned in the mandate, and an additional witness is to sign it. If all these requirements are not fulfilled, both the mandate and the marriage contracted pursuant to it are invalid.

Proxy marriages usually occur when the parties cannot be physically present to exchange consent but there is some compelling reason for marrying without delay. This might occur, for example, when a man is on military duty overseas and there is an urgent need to contract marriage to legitimate a child or to make his spouse eligible for dependent's benefits. Before a marriage can be entered into by proxy, all of the usual canonical and civil requirements for the valid and lawful celebration of marriage must be observed. In addition, the permission of the local ordinary is required for the lawfulness of a proxy marriage (c. 1071, §1, 7°). Although canon law permits proxy marriages, most civil jurisdictions in the United States do not.[211]

Proxies can be of the same or the opposite sex as the principal. Although proxies must intend to carry out the mandates of their principals, their own intentions with regard to marriage are irrelevant. Although the principal need not be aware when or where the proxy contracts marriage on his or her behalf, the principal must intend a perpetual and exclusive marriage ordered to the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring when he or she mandates the proxy and not retract this intention before the mandate is executed. However, if the principal revokes the mandate or becomes insane before the proxy contracts marriage on his or her behalf, the marriage is invalid even if the proxy and the other party are unaware of these developments.

The law presumes that proxy marriages will be contracted in accord with the canonical form of marriage before an authorized minister and two witnesses. The Rite of Marriage does not explicitly prohibit the use of the nuptial Mass and blessing for proxy marriages as had the preconciliar Roman Missal.[212] Nevertheless, the full liturgical celebration of marriage is quite inappropriate for proxy marriages. The Eastern code does not provide norms regulating proxy marriages. Eastern law has never been as enamored of the contractual model for marriage as has the Latin tradition. However, the Eastern code does mention the possibility for the particular law of a church sui iuris to allow such marriages.[213]

Marriage Consent through an Interpreter

Canon 1106 — A marriage can be contracted through an interpreter; the pastor is not to assist at it, however, unless he is certain of the trustworthiness of the interpreter.

Marriage consent can be expressed through an interpreter if the official witness or the other witnesses do not understand the language of the parties. The spouses express their consent in their own language, and the interpreter then translates their expressions of consent for the benefit of the others present. The pastor of the place where the marriage is to be celebrated is not to assist at such a marriage or delegate someone else to do so unless he has first satisfied himself that the interpreter is reliable.

The services of an interpreter may also be needed because the parties themselves do not share a common language. For example, military personnel on duty overseas have often married natives, even though neither spouse can speak more than a few words in the other's language. While the use of an interpreter for the celebration of marriage would be appropriate, such cases do raise difficult pastoral questions. Without a common language, the spouses' ability to communicate with one another will be severely impaired and the prospect for a happy outcome of the marriage dubious.

[211] Proxy marriages are permitted in Florida, Kansas, Oklahoma, Idaho, Iowa, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, and New Mexico. They are permitted in Texas only if the couple is separated by military service. No other jurisdictions recognize proxy marriages. See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 791.

[212] Missale Romanum, xxvi, nn. 379–381.

[213] CCEO 837, §2.

Presumed Continuance of Consent to Invalid Marriages

Canon 1107 — Even if a marriage was entered into invalidly by reason of an impediment or a defect of form, the consent given is presumed to persist until its revocation is established.

Impediments disqualify persons from marriage, but they do not deprive them of the capacity to elicit true matrimonial consent. Similarly, persons bound by canonical form can elicit naturally sufficient consent, but the consent lacks juridic efficacy if this form is not observed. Consequently, the law presumes that, when a person consents to a marriage that is invalid because of an impediment or a defect of form, the consent continues until its revocation has been proven.

This presumption is of particular relevance when there is a question of granting a radical sanation of a marriage invalid because of an impediment or defect of form (cc. 1161–1165). The continuation of naturally sufficient consent is an essential precondition for the granting of a radical sanation (c. 1162). The presumption that such consent continues allows the granting of a radical sanation without proof that consent has continued. It is rather the revocation of consent that must be proved.

CHAPTER V
THE FORM OF THE CELEBRATION OF MARRIAGE[214]
[cc. 1108–1123][215]

The form of marriage is the complex of external formalities and ceremonies required by law for its proper celebration. The canonical form consists in those solemnities required for the Church to recognize the union as a valid marriage. The liturgical form consists in those rites required to ensure that the celebration adequately expresses "the mystery of the unity and fruitful love between Christ and the Church" in which the spouses share (c. 1063, 3°). The form of marriage has evolved in different ways in the churches of the East and West. The Latin church has primarily emphasized the role of the consent of the spouses in bringing marriage into existence and so has considered them the ministers of the sacrament of matrimony. The Eastern churches, while acknowledging the necessity of the spouses' personal consent, have primarily emphasized the role of the priest's crowning and blessing of the couple in effecting the sacrament and so see him as its minister.[216]

Historical Synopsis

The early Church had no distinctively Christian ritual for the celebration of marriage. Instead, it accepted the forms of marrying customary among the various peoples who had accepted the gospel. In time, Christian elements were grafted on to these customary forms, and a role for the ecclesial community in the celebration of marriage was recognized. It became increasingly common for the local bishop or presbyter to be present at the weddings of members of his flock and to bless them. Eventually liturgical rites emerged that incorporated elements of family-centered wedding customs into the context of the celebration of the Eucharist. The faithful were encouraged to observe these liturgical rites to solemnize their marriages, but observance of these rituals was not a condition for ecclesial recognition of the validity of marriage until rather late.[217]

Although Roman law regulated the social consequences of marriage in considerable detail, it [214] See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 792–800; Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Einführung vor 1108/1–1123/1; R. Navarro Valls, in Pamplona ComEng, 701–710; and Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 622–632.

[215] See CCEO 828–842.

[216] See F. McManus, "Marriage in the Canons of the Eastern Catholic Churches," J 54 (1994) 56–80; and U. Navarrete, "De ministro sacramenti matrimonii in Ecclesia latina et in Ecclesiis Orientalibus: Tentamen explicationis concordantis," P 84 (1995) 711–733.

[217] See K. Stevenson, To Join Together: The Rite of Marriage (New York: Pueblo, 1987) 16–104.

showed little interest in the formalities by which marriage was constituted. Consent with affectio maritalis between the spouses was necessary and sufficient to constitute a marriage, but the form in which this consent was exchanged was a matter of indifference.[218] The Latin church's reception of the principle that consent alone constitutes marriage impeded the emergence of a mandatory ecclesiastical form for entering marriage. A mandatory form emerged earlier in the Eastern churches in response to the heightened significance attributed to the crowning and blessing of the spouses by the priest. For the churches of the Byzantine tradition, Emperor Leo VI (886–912) made observance of the liturgical form obligatory for all free persons. The obligation of observing this form was extended to slaves by Emperor Alexis Comnenos (1088–1118).[219]

In the West, the Roman law consensual model of marriage coexisted rather uneasily with Germanic marriage customs that highlighted the public nature of marriage by emphasizing the importance of the role of parents and of consummation in constituting a marriage. Ultimately, the consensual model triumphed through the decretals of Alexander III and his successors during the twelfth century. However, this triumph opened the door to a flood of clandestine marriages, i.e., marriages contracted without any public form and not susceptible to proof, and their socially disruptive consequences. Conciliar legislation attempted to compel compliance with the public liturgical form by threatening penal sanctions for its nonobservance.[220] However, this legislation did not declare clandestine unions invalid because it was believed that consent had been established by Christ as the essential form of the sacrament of matrimony and, therefore, it was beyond the Church's power to add to or detract from that form.

Stung by the Protestant reformers' castigation of the Catholic Church's failure to extirpate clandestine marriages, the Council of Trent in its decree Tametsi declared disqualified for marriage those who failed to solemnize their unions "in the presence of the parish priest or another priest with the permission of the parish priest or ordinary, and two or three witnesses."[221] The rationale for this decree was that, although the Church lacked authority to alter the substance of the sacrament of matrimony, it did possess the authority to establish impediments to marriage insofar as it was a contract. Thus, Trent made failure to marry before the proper pastor or his delegate and two witnesses a disqualifying impediment to marriage.

The Tridentine decree succeeded only partially in stamping out clandestine marriages. Since it was binding only in areas where it had been promulgated, it was without effect in most Protestant areas of Europe and in the colonies of Protestant powers. For example, in what is now the United States, Tametsi was never promulgated except in a few isolated pockets of originally French and Spanish colonies. In addition, the decree created new problems. Where it had been promulgated, it bound all the baptized, whether they were Catholic or not. Nor did it make clear whether the pastor of the man or the woman was competent to witness marriages or to delegate another priest to do so. Moreover, by requiring only the priest's physical presence at the marriage and not his active and voluntary participation, Tametsi recognized the validity of marriages at which the pastor's presence was coerced.

To overcome these problems, the Congregation for the Council eventually promulgated the decree Ne temere in 1909. This new decree extended the obligation of observing the canonical form of marriage to the whole Latin church, but it bound only those who had been baptized in or received into the Catholic Church and those who sought to marry them. Ne temere specifically required that the priest participate in the ceremony actively by asking for and receiving the consent of the parties and that his participation be voluntary. The decree also authorized pastors and ordinaries to witness

[218] Treggiari, Roman Marriage, 170.
[219] J. Meyendorf, Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective (Crestwood, N.Y.: St. Vladimir Seminary, 1975) 30–31.
[220] Lateran IV (1215), c. 51.
[221] Council of Trent, sess. XXIV, de ref. matrim., cap. 1.

marriages validly within their respective territories whether the spouses resided there or not.

The discipline of Ne temere was substantially incorporated into the 1917 code. However, this code exempted from the obligation of observing the canonical form those born of non-Catholic parents who were baptized into the Catholic Church as infants but who had not been raised as Catholics.[222] The difficulty of determining whether people baptized in the Catholic Church as infants had been raised as Catholics prompted Pius XII to abrogate this exemption effective January 1, 1949.[223]

The Function of the Form of Marriage

Although a mandatory form for celebrating marriage was introduced in the Latin church to attempt to address the late medieval problem of clandestine marriages, its function is not limited to ensuring the public character of marriage. Nor has modern civil legislation preventing clandestine marriages rendered the canonical form redundant. At a pastoral level, the requirement of canonical form provides a privileged opportunity for the Church's ministers to help couples to assess their suitability and readiness for marriage and to provide them with appropriate catechesis and immediate preparation for marriage and its liturgical celebration (c. 1063). At a more theological level, the mandatory form ensures that celebration of marriage will embody at least the minimal ecclesial and liturgical dimensions consistent with the celebration of a sacrament of the Church. The fact that the Eastern churches have also evolved a mandatory form for celebrating marriage, albeit by a very different path, suggests that the historical circumstances that led the Latin church to impose a mandatory form for marriage and a typically Western preoccupation with juridic formalities have obscured the necessary relationship between the manner in which marriage is celebrated in the Church and its sacramental nature.

The 1983 code devotes sixteen canons to the form of marriage. These canons deal with: the elements of canonical form (c. 1108), the requisites for valid assistance at marriage (cc. 1109–1112), the requisites for licit assistance at marriage (cc. 1113–1115), the extraordinary canonical form (c. 1116), those bound by the canonical form of marriage (c. 1117), the place where marriage is to be celebrated (c. 1118), the liturgical form of marriage (cc. 1119–1120), and the recording of marriages (cc. 1121–1123).

THE ELEMENTS OF CANONICAL FORM

Canon 1108 — §1. Only those marriages are valid which are contracted before the local ordinary, pastor, or a priest or deacon delegated by either of them, who assist, and before two witnesses according to the rules expressed in the following canons and without prejudice to the exceptions mentioned in cann. 144, 1112, §1, 1116, and 1127, §§1–2.

An Authorized Witness

When a Catholic enters marriage, the Church ordinarily recognizes the union as valid only if the canonical form of marriage is observed in its celebration. In other words, one must exchange marital consent in the presence of an authorized minister of the Church and at least two additional witnesses. Subsequent canons regulate in detail who is considered an authorized minister of marriage in the Church.

Two Additional Witnesses

The presence of at least two additional witnesses is as essential for the valid celebration of a marriage as the presence of an authorized minister. Unlike sponsors at baptism (c. 872) and confirmation (c. 892), these witnesses at marriage assume no responsibility to attest to the faith of those entering marriage or to assist them in living out its obligations. Their sole function is to witness to the fact that the marriage was legitimately celebrated. Thus, the code stipulates no detailed qualifications for those fulfilling this role. To function as witnesses to the celebration of the marriage, they should possess the use of reason and be capable of understanding the events they are witnessing. Although no minimum age is specified for these witnesses, those who have not completed their fourteenth year may not serve as witnesses in canonical processes (c. 1550, §1). Thus, preference should be given to witnesses fourteen or older. Clearly excluded from the function of witness are those who are insane, intoxicated, or severely developmentally disabled.

[222] CIC 1099, §2.

[223] Pius XII, mp Abrogatur alterum comma paragraphi secundae canonis 1099, August 1, 1948, AAS 40 (1948) 305; CLD 3, 463–464.

Commentators on the 1917 code also excluded the deaf from serving as witnesses at marriages. This position reflected a long and unfortunate history of assimilating the deaf to those habitually lacking the use of reason. Current research demonstrates that this assimilation was erroneous. While they may not be able to hear the words by which the spouses exchange consent, they may be able to witness the exchange of consent in other ways, e.g., by lip reading, signing, or other gestures.

Exceptional Cases

Canon 1108, §1 concludes by referring to four canons which contain exceptions to the required observance of the canonical form for the validity of a marriage. The Church supplies the power to assist at marriages in cases of common error (c. 144). In certain circumstances, lay people can be delegated to witness marriages in the name of the Church (c. 1112, §1). Marriage may be validly celebrated by the use of an extraordinary form in some urgent cases (c. 1116). When Catholics marry non- Catholics, they can be dispensed from the obligation of observing the canonical form (c. 1127, §2).

Eastern Discipline

Canon 828, §1 of the Eastern code also makes the validity of marriage contingent on the observance of a form. However, it prefers to speak of the observance of a "sacred rite." In all of the Eastern Catholic churches, the sacred rite for celebrating marriage includes the spouses' exchange of consent, but the central focus is on the blessing imparted by the authorized priest. As a result, only a priest (presbyter or bishop) can be the authorized minister of marriage. Thus, Eastern law makes no provision for the celebration of marriage in the presence of a deacon or lay person.

§2. The person who assists at a marriage is understood to be only that person who is present, asks for the manifestation of the consent of the contracting parties, and receives it in the name of the Church.

The Role of the Authorized Witness

The authorized witness of a marriage must be not only physically present but also an active and willing participant in the event. This active participation involves asking the spouses to manifest their consent and receiving that consent in the name of the Church. In the liturgical rite, the authorized witness, after asking three questions to ascertain the spouses' freedom and marital intent, invites them "to declare [their] consent before God and the Church." After they have exchanged consent, the authorized witness accepts this consent in the name of the Church by saying: "You have declared your consent before God and the Church. Let no man separate what God has joined."[224]

The authorized witness must ask for and receive the consent of both parties, even if one of them is not a Catholic. When other priests or deacons or, in the case of mixed marriages, non-Catholic ministers are present, the responsibility for asking for and receiving the consent of the spouses is not to be divided. Unless the authorized witness alone asks for and receives the spouses' consent, the marriage is invalid.[225] Other ministers

[224] Rite of Marriage, 25–26.

[225] CDF, private reply, November 28, 1975, CLD 8, 820–821.

present merely observe the exchange of consent, but they can be given other appropriate liturgical roles in the celebration.

REQUISITES FOR VALID ASSISTANCE AT MARRIAGE

Authorization by Office

Canon 1109 — Unless the local ordinary and pastor have been excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended from office or declared such through a sentence or decree, by virtue of their office and within the confines of their territory they assist validly at the marriages not only of their subjects but also of those who are not their subjects provided that one of them is of the Latin rite.

Offices Delimited by Territory

By virtue of their offices, local ordinaries (c. 134) and pastors are authorized to witness marriages. This authorization extends also to parochial administrators (c. 540, §1), pastors of quasi-parishes or missions (c. 516, §1), and members of the team of priests to whom the pastoral care of a parish has been entrusted in solidum (c. 543, §1), who are considered equivalent to pastors. However, the rector of a non-parochial church (c. 558) or a chaplain (c. 566, §1) is not so authorized, unless in the latter case particular or special law provides otherwise. In fact, the special law governing military ordinariates extends to the office of military chaplain the authorization to witness marriages of those persons entrusted to his care.[226]

The authorization of local ordinaries and pastors to witness marriages is territorially based. By virtue of office, they may validly assist at marriages only within the territory assigned to them.[227] Local ordinaries within the boundaries of their dioceses or vicariates and pastors within the boundaries of their parishes validly assist at marriages not only of their subjects but also of others who are physically present in their territory. However, by virtue of office local ordinaries and pastors may not assist at the marriages of their subjects when they are absent from their territory. In these cases, local ordinaries and pastors must be delegated by the local ordinary or pastor of the place where the marriage is to be celebrated.

Since the authority to assist at marriages is connected to their offices, local ordinaries and pastors enjoy this authority from the moment they legitimately assume their offices. They lose this authority when they lose office in any of the ways specified in canon 184, §1. Thus, local ordinaries and pastors who have submitted their resignations or whose terms have expired retain the power to witness marriages in their territories until they are notified in writing that they have ceased from office (cc. 189, §3 and 186).

Local ordinaries and pastors lose their power to assist at marriages without necessarily losing office when the penalty of excommunication, interdict, or suspension from office is imposed or declared by a judicial sentence or administrative decree.[228] However, they do not forfeit their authority to witness marriages as a result of incurring one of these censures latae sententiae. Only after one of these censures has been declared pursuant to a judicial or administrative process does a local ordinary or pastor lose the authority to assist at marriages.

The authority of local ordinaries and pastors to assist at marriages is limited not only territorially but personally. They can validly assist at marriages in their territory only if at least one of the parties "is of the Latin rite."[229] Thus, when both parties are Eastern Catholics and, in mixed marriage situations, when the Catholic party belongs [226] John Paul II, apconst Spirituali militum curae, vii, April 21, 1986, AAS 78 (1986) 484.

[227] By way of exception, CCEO 829, §3 recognizes the patriarch's authority to bless marriages anywhere in the world, as long as at least one of the spouses belongs to his church sui iuris.

[228] See the commentary on canons 1314 and 1331–1335.

[229] On the determination of "rite" or ascription to a ritual church sui iuris, see the commentary on cc. 111–112 and CCEO 29–38.

to an Eastern church, the Latin local ordinary or pastor must seek delegation from the competent Eastern hierarch or pastor in order to assist validly at the marriage (CCEO 830, §1).[230] Since ascription to a ritual church sui iuris is neither lost nor altered by even longtime practice of the Catholic faith in another church sui iuris (c. 112, §2), particular care should be taken to determine the ritual status of spouses during the pre-nuptial investigation, especially if their names or ethnic backgrounds suggest affiliation with an Eastern church.

Latin local ordinaries and pastors can validly assist at marriages by virtue of office when the Catholic party or parties belong to an Eastern Catholic church which does not have an organized hierarchy in their country. However, most of the larger Eastern Catholic churches do have hierarchical organs in North America.

Canon 1110 — By virtue of office, a personal ordinary and a personal pastor assist validly only at marriages where at least one of the parties is a subject within the confines of their jurisdiction.

Offices Delimited by Persons

Besides local ordinaries and pastors, whose jurisdiction is defined by territorial boundaries, there are also ordinaries and pastors whose authority is limited to a defined group or class of persons. The most familiar personal ordinaries and pastors are those who have been entrusted with the pastoral care of particular language or ethnic communities. However, the pastoral needs of other groups may suggest the advisability of establishing personal ordinaries and pastors (e.g., university communities or military personnel). When they are established at the level of the particular church, personal jurisdictions always have a secondary territorial delimitation. Thus, the authority of a personal pastor for a Polish community is limited to the territory of the diocese for which the personal parish was erected and may be further limited to a defined section of that diocese. However, personal jurisdictions established by the Apostolic See often lack a territorial delimitation. Thus, military ordinariates have responsibility for military personnel and some others when they are on active duty anywhere in the world.[231]

Personal ordinaries and pastors validly assist at marriages only if one of the spouses belongs to the special group entrusted to their care. Moreover, they can delegate other presbyters or deacons to assist only at marriages involving at least one party over whom they have personal jurisdiction.

Authorization by Delegation

Canon 1111 — §1. As long as they hold office validly, the local ordinary and the pastor can delegate to priests and deacons the faculty, even a general one, of assisting at marriages within the limits of their territory.

§2. To be valid, the delegation of the faculty to assist at marriages must be given to specific persons expressly. If it concerns special delegation, it must be given for a specific marriage; if it concerns general delegation, it must be given in writing.

Delegation of Sacred Ministers

Both local and personal ordinaries and pastors can delegate other priests or deacons to witness

[230] CCEO 829, §1 limits the authority of an Eastern local hierarch and a territorial pastor to bless marriages to situations in which at least one of the spouses is "enrolled in his Church sui iuris."

[231] Spirituali militum curae, iv, 1°, AAS 78 (1986) 483. The "others" over whom military ordinariates have jurisdiction must be derived from the statutes of the particular ordinariate. The Statutes of the Military Archdiocese U.S.A., xv lists as subjects of the ordinariate: (1) all who serve in the military service; (2) those on active duty in the Coast Guard, National Guard, Air National Guard, and Civil Air Patrol; (3) the families of these military personnel; (4) those who attend military and related academies or reside in military or Veterans Administration hospitals; (5) those who dwell on military installations or homes reserved for military personnel; and (6) those employed overseas by the United States government, including diplomatic personnel, and their families.

marriages in the territory assigned to them, i.e., they can delegate others to assist only at those marriages at which they could validly assist themselves. Delegation is general when it is granted for all marriages within the delegator's territory; it is special if it is given only for a specific marriage. The 1917 code had permitted general delegation to assist at marriages only to parochial vicars for the parish to which they were assigned.[232] This restriction has been abrogated by the revised code. Thus, both local ordinaries and pastors can now grant such general delegations more broadly.[233]

The norms governing the power to assist at marriages are more exacting than the general norms governing delegation of executive power.[234] The power to assist at marriages must be made expressly to a specific person. An express delegation can be explicit ("I delegate you") or implicit ("Here are the keys to open the church for the wedding") but never tacit or presumed. The express grant must be made to a specific individual. Thus, a local ordinary or pastor cannot validly delegate a priest or deacon to be named later by a religious superior (e.g., "I delegate whatever priest you designate to provide weekend coverage of my parish while I am on vacation").[235] Special delegation must be expressly granted to a specific priest or deacon for a specified marriage.

General delegations can be validly granted only in writing. Special delegations can be granted orally. However, since the validity of the marriage hinges on whether the priest or deacon was properly delegated, some written record of the special delegation should be retained.

Those who have been granted general delegation to witness marriages in a particular territory may subdelegate that authority but only for an individual case; however, those who have been granted special delegation cannot subdelegate the authority unless expressly authorized by the delegator (c. 137, §3). Subdelegated power cannot be further subdelegated, unless this power was expressly granted by the delegator (c. 137, §4).

[232] CIC 1096, §1.

[233] Besides limiting delegations to bless marriages to priests, CCEO 830, §2 restricts the authority to grant general delegations to bless marriages to local hierarchs. However, in virtue of CCEO 302, §2, pastors can grant a general faculty, but only to their own parochial vicars.

[234] See the commentary on cc. 137–138.

[235] CodCom, May 20, 1923, CLD 1, 540–541.

Canon 1112 — §1. Where there is a lack of priests and deacons, the diocesan bishop can delegate lay persons to assist at marriages, with the previous favorable vote of the conference of bishops and after he has obtained the permission of the Holy See.

§2. A suitable lay person is to be selected, who is capable of giving instruction to those preparing to be married and able to perform the matrimonial liturgy properly.

Delegation of Lay People

Although the authority to witness marriages in the name of the Church is normally reserved to priests and deacons, in the Latin church it is not a function that per se requires the power of orders. The current law makes provision for lay men and women to be delegated to assist at marriages when priests and deacons are lacking. The absence of priests and deacons may be physical (e.g., remote communities without a resident pastor) or moral (e.g., ordained ministers who do not speak the language or understand the marriage customs of a particular group). The current law incorporates with some modifications the discipline on delegating lay people to witness marriages of the Congregation for the Sacraments instruction Sacramentalem indolem of May 15, 1974.[236]

Before the diocesan bishop can delegate lay people to assist at marriages, a favorable vote of the episcopal conference is required. The episcopal conference can express itself in favor of allowing an individual diocesan bishop, a group of them, or even all the diocesan bishops who are members of the conference to open this role to lay people.[237] After this favorable vote, interested bishops must individually seek the permission of the Holy See. Once this permission is received, the diocesan bishop and those equivalent in law, but not vicars general and episcopal vicars, may validly delegate lay people to witness marriages in the name of the Church. This delegation can be either general or special. The current law has not retained the requirement of Sacramentalem indolem that lay witnesses of marriages be delegated by the diocesan bishop personally. Thus, the diocesan bishop could presumably delegate another official to subdelegate lay people for particular cases.

[236] CLD 8, 815–818. See also SCSacr, private reply, January 20, 1983, CLD 10, 178–181.

Care should be exercised in selecting lay people to assist at marriages. They should possess both the personal qualities that make them suitable for this task and the ability to provide appropriate pre-marital instruction to couples and to perform the liturgical rites fittingly. At the wedding itself, the lay delegate presides at a liturgy of the word during which he or she may preach and asks for and receives the spouses' consent.[238] Since authorized lay people can administer sacramentals (c. 1168), the lay delegate can bless the wedding rings. However, the lay delegate may not dispense from certain impediments in the urgent cases mentioned in canons 1079–1080, nor is he or she authorized to impart the nuptial blessing.

[237] Since the votum of the episcopal conference is not a general decree but merely an expression of a favorable opinion, it does not seem to require the review (recognitio) of the Apostolic See. Nevertheless, on September 16, 1983, the Canadian episcopal conference approved a decree allowing the use of lay people to witness marriages in all the dioceses of Canada. This decree was confirmed by the Holy See on April 4, 1984. See CLD 11, 267. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 626, says: "Strangely, however, in some countries the Conference has approved the delegation of lay people in principle but in such terms that each Bishop must apply directly to the Holy See for permission before actually delegating anyone." In fact, there is nothing "strange" about this approach; the two-step process is precisely what a fair reading of the canon requires.

[238] The 1991 edition of the Ordo Celebrandi Matrimonium contains a Rite for the Celebration of Marriage before a Lay Person.

Although delegation of a lay person to witness a marriage in the name of the Church ensures that the marriage will be recognized as canonically valid, it does not assure that the State will recognize the union as valid. Before delegating a lay person, the diocesan bishop should see that the lay person has been certified or licensed to witness marriages by the State as well.

Requirements for Licit Assistance at Marriages

Responsibility of the Delegator

Canon 1113 — Before special delegation is granted, all those things which the law has established to prove free status are to be fulfilled.

Before he grants special delegation to witness a marriage, a local ordinary or pastor must ascertain that the required pre-nuptial investigation (c. 1066) has been conducted to establish that the parties are entering marriage freely, are not bound by any impediment, and are willing and able to assume the obligations of Christian marriage. Failure to fulfill this obligation does not render the delegation invalid, but it does constitute a serious dereliction of pastoral responsibility.

Responsibilities of All Authorized Witnesses

Canon 1114 — The person assisting at marriage acts illicitly unless the person has made certain of the free status of the contracting parties according to the norm of law and, if possible, of the permission of the pastor whenever the person assists in virtue of general delegation.

Whether they are authorized to assist at marriages by virtue of office or by virtue of delegation, priests, deacons, and lay people may not witness a marriage unless they are satisfied that the pre-marital investigation has been completed. Even if the official witness has not conducted this investigation personally, he or she has a pastoral obligation to ensure that care has been taken to establish that nothing stands in the way of a valid and licit celebration before witnessing a marriage.

When an official witness is acting by virtue of general delegation, he or she still must seek the permission of the pastor of the place where the marriage is to be celebrated. Although the current law no longer reserves this function to pastors,[239] assistance at marriages remains one of the functions "especially entrusted" to them (c. 530, 4°). Since the pastor is "the proper pastor (pastor) of the parish entrusted to him" (c. 519), he should at least be made aware of significant events affecting the ecclesial status of those entrusted to his care, even if he does not have the exclusive prerogative of celebrating these events himself. The requirement that, if possible, the one acting by virtue of general delegation receive the pastor's permission before witnessing a particular marriage attempts to ensure that the latter is aware of the pending marriage and may voice any concerns or cautions. However, failure to seek this permission does not affect the validity of the marriage, and the qualification of the obligation to seek it by the phrase "if possible" suggests that, in many cases, failure to seek this permission does not render the marriage illicit. Nevertheless, willful neglect of this requirement would amount to a violation of pastoral courtesy.

The Authorized Witness and the Pastor

Canon 1115 — Marriages are to be celebrated in a parish where either of the contracting parties has a domicile, quasi-domicile, or month-long residence or, if it concerns transients, in the parish where they actually reside. With the permission of the proper ordinary or proper pastor, marriages can be celebrated elsewhere.

The normal place for the celebration of marriage is the place where at least one of the parties if both are Catholic or, in the case of mixed marriages, the Catholic party has a domicile, quasi-domicile, or month-long residence. The marriages of those who have no domicile or quasi-domicile are normally celebrated where they actually reside. The permission of the ordinary or pastor of one of the spouses is required to licitly celebrate the marriage elsewhere.[240]

The revised Latin code has dropped the preference of the 1917 code for celebrating marriage in the parish of the bride.[241] However, the Eastern code stipulates that marriages are to be celebrated before the pastor of the groom "unless either particular law determines otherwise or a just cause excuses."[242] This norm is somewhat less stringent than the previous Eastern discipline that required that mixed rite marriages be celebrated before the pastor of the groom and that dispensations be sought to permit deviations from this norm.[243] The less restrictive norms of both the Latin and the Eastern codes governing the place of inter-ritual marriages gives the spouses greater freedom to choose either of their churches sui iuris as the site

[239] CIC 462, 4°.

[240] CCEO 831, §1, 3° adds that a local hierarch or pastor lawfully blesses a marriage in "a place exclusively of another Church sui iuris, unless the hierarch who exercises power in that place expressly refuses." This canon reverses the Commission for the Codification of the Oriental Canon Law's 1952 authentic interpretation of Crebrae allatae, c. 86, §1, 2°. According to this extensive interpretation, ministers of one church sui iuris could validly exercise their jurisdiction in a place dedicated exclusively for an other church sui iuris only with the express permission of the official responsible for that place. See Pius XII, mp Crebrae allatae, February 22, 1949, c. 86, §1, 2°, AAS 41 (1949) 106; and Commission for the Codification of the Oriental Canon Law, reply, July 8, 1952, AAS 44 (1952) 552; CLD 3, 32. It is not clear whether, by analogy, a Latin local ordinary or pastor can now bless a marriage in a place exclusively of an Eastern church sui iuris unless the Eastern hierarch expressly refuses.

[241] See CIC 1097, §2.

[242] CCEO 831, §2.

[243] Pius XII, mp Crebrae allatae, c. 88, §3. See CDF, private reply, February 1, 1967, CLD 6, 411–412; and CEC, private reply, February 7, 1969, CLD 7, 8–9.

for the celebration of their marriage.[244] Nevertheless, in inter-ritual marriages where the man is an Eastern Catholic, the permission of his pastor should be obtained before celebrating the marriage in the woman's Latin church.

The Extraordinary Canonical Form

Latin Discipline

Canon 1116 — §1. If a person competent to assist according to the norm of law cannot be present or approached without grave inconvenience, those who intend to enter into a true marriage can contract it validly and licitly before witnesses only:

1° in danger of death;

2° outside the danger of death provided that it is prudently foreseen that the situation will continue for a month.

§2. In either case, if some other priest or deacon who can be present is available, he must be called and be present at the celebration of the marriage together with the witnesses, without prejudice to the validity of the marriage before witnesses only.

The Church's requirement that the canonical form be observed as a condition for the validity of marriage could unduly abridge the exercise of the natural right to marry when authorized witnesses are lacking or rarely available. The provision for the delegation of lay people to witness marriages when priests and deacons are lacking is an attempt to avoid conflicts between that natural right and the demands of ecclesiastical law. The same purpose is served by the extraordinary form of marriage (c. 1116). The availability of this extraordinary form in certain urgent circumstances attempts to honor the natural right to marry while preserving the public character of marriage.

[244] V. Pospishil, Eastern Catholic Marriage Law (Brooklyn: St. Maron Publications, 1991) 383.

Unavailability of an Authorized Minister

Resort to the extraordinary form is legitimate only when those authorized to witness marriages in the name of the Church are unavailable because access to them is impossible "without grave inconvenience." It must be gravely inconvenient both for the parties who seek marriage to go to an authorized witness and for a witness to come to them. The impossibility may result from physical circumstances (e.g., distance, inadequate means of transportation or communication) or moral factors (e.g., persecution, war, unjust civil laws). The "impossibility" that makes resort to the extraordinary form legitimate can be relative. For example, traveling twenty-five miles may be only a minor inconvenience for persons with access to good roads and an automobile but a grave inconvenience for people who must make the journey on foot.

Circumstances Warranting Use of the Extraordinary Form

Canon 1116 foresees two situations in which the inaccessibility of authorized witnesses justifies resort to the extraordinary form: danger of death and situations when it can be prudently judged that an authorized witness will be unavailable for a month. Death need not be imminent or certain. It is sufficient that the death of one of the parties from internal or external causes is at least probable.

It is sufficient that the parties prudently foresee that an authorized witness will be unavailable for at least a month. If events prove them to have been mistaken, their marriage entered into according to the extraordinary form is still valid. However, the conditions for use of the extraordinary form are not met if the long-term unavailability of an authorized witness results from a prohibition of the marriage by a local ordinary, a diocesan policy that requires couples to meet with a priest or deacon several months prior to the wedding to begin marriage preparation, or the fact that the available witness does not meet the couple's personal criteria for orthodoxy.

Celebrations Pursuant to the Extraordinary Form

If these criteria for use of the extraordinary form are met, the couple validly contracts marriage by exchanging consent before two witnesses. However, the urgent circumstances justifying the use of this form bring no automatic dispensation from any impediments. The couple must intend marriage as understood by the Church, but they need not grasp all of the implications of the extraordinary form. If a priest or deacon who has no authorization to assist at marriages is available, he should be asked to participate in the extraordinary form celebration. However, failure to call him does not affect the validity of marriage before witnesses alone. However, this priest or deacon may dispense from certain impediments in the urgent situations foreseen by canons 1079–1080.

Eastern Discipline

Although a valid celebration of marriage without the priestly blessing is hard to reconcile with the Eastern theology of marriage, canon 832 of the Eastern code provides for an extraordinary form for the celebration of marriage that is substantially the same as that prescribed in canon 1116 of the Latin code. However, if a non-Catholic priest is available, he is to be present to bless the marriage, "without prejudice to the validity of a marriage in the presence of the witnesses alone" (CCEO 832, §2). In addition, the spouses who marry according to the extraordinary form are admonished to seek the priestly blessing of their marriage as soon as possible (CCEO 832, §3).

THOSE BOUND BY THE CANONICAL FORM OF MARRIAGE

Canon 1117 — The form established above must be observed if at least one of the parties contracting marriage was baptized in the Catholic Church or received into it and has not defected from it by a formal act, without prejudice to the prescripts of can. 1127, §2.

General Principle

All who have been baptized in the Catholic Church or received into full communion with it must observe the ordinary or the extraordinary canonical form when they marry, whether they marry another Catholic or not. The failure of a Catholic to observe this form results in the nullity of his or her marriage. The fact that a person was not raised in the Catholic Church after baptism or has lapsed from the active practice of the faith does not exempt him or her from the obligation of observing the canonical form.

Those Who Have Left the Catholic Church by a Formal Act

However, the present law does exempt from the observance of this form those who have "defected from [the Catholic Church] by a formal act."[245] The concept of "defection from the Catholic Church by a formal act" is an innovation of the 1983 code, and its exact meaning has yet to be determined.[246] It is distinguished from the "notorious defection from the communion of the Church" that disqualifies a person from voting in a canonical election (c. 171, §1, 4°) by its note of formality. Throughout the 1983 code, the terms [245] Those who have defected by a formal act are also not bound by the impediment of disparity of worship (c. 1086, §1) and the prohibition on entering a mixed marriage (c. 1124), but are exempt from no other merely ecclesiastical laws.

[246] See V. De Paolis, "Alcune annotazioni circa la formula 'actu formali ab Ecclesia catholica deficere,'" P 84 (1995) 570–608; J. Doyle, "The Formal Act of Leaving the Catholic Church," CLSAP 52 (1990) 152–160; A. Stenson, "The Concept and Implications of the Formal Act of Defection of Canon 1117," Stud Can 21 (1987) 175–194.

formale (formal) and formaliter (formally) consistently denote a juridic act which is both public and intended to effect a change in the ecclesial status of some person or group.[247] Thus, the formal act of defection from the Catholic Church is a juridic act which can be proven in the external forum and whose intended effect is to separate oneself from the Church.

In addition to freedom and deliberation, the validity of a juridic act requires that the person who posits it be qualified to do so (c. 124). The Council for the Interpretation of Legal Texts has ruled that the formal act of defecting from the Catholic Church must "be a strictly personal act and thus the subject who poses it must be naturally and juridically capable."[248] Consequently, since minors lack the full exercise of their rights (c. 98, §2), they are incapable of positing a formal act of defection for themselves, and their parents are incapable of making this act for them. Children who were baptized in the Catholic Church but whose parents subsequently enrolled them in a non-Catholic church may ratify this parental decision when they come of age, but, to do so by a formal act, they would have to be aware of their Catholic baptism (c. 126).[249]

The following may be considered to have defected from the Catholic Church by a formal act: those who have made a public declaration of their abandonment of the Catholic faith, either in writing or orally before two witnesses, and those who have formally enrolled by some external sign in another Christian church or another religion.[250] Lengthy participation in the worship of another church or religion without formal enrollment and a long-standing lapse in Catholic practice lack the formality required for defection by a formal act.

Since intent is integral to the formality of the act of defection, care should be taken to examine each case before deciding that the conditions for defection by a formal act have been met. For example, in countries where the only way to escape the "church tax" is to renounce membership in the Church before a civil official, the intent of this renunciation may be to relieve oneself of a burdensome tax and not to defect from the Church.[251] Even enrollment in another church may not qualify as defection by a formal act if it were done solely to appease a fiancé or future in-laws but without the intention of abandoning the Catholic Church.[252]

Non-Catholics

Those who have never been baptized in the Catholic Church or received into it are not bound by the canonical form when they marry among themselves. However, they may be bound by some other public form for entering marriage. The unbaptized are bound by any form required by the State for the civil recognition of marriage. The law of the Eastern non-Catholic churches requires a sacred rite which includes the priestly blessing of the couple as a condition for ecclesial recognition of the marriage. Canon 781, 2° of the Eastern code recognizes this law as the standard to be used by [247] The term formale is used to qualify the decree by which a private association acquires private juridic personality (c. 322, §1), an institute of consecrated life of diocesan right is erected (c. 579), and an institute of consecrated life is erected or approved as one of pontifical right (c. 589). Canon 982 requires that, before sacramental absolution is imparted to a person who has falsely denounced a confessor for solicitation, he or she must retract the denunciation formaliter.

[248] PCILT, reply, January 4, 1994, in De processibus matrimonialibus 3 (1996) 319.

[249] Ibid.

[250] See Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 603.

[251] E. Corecco, "Dimettersi dalla Chiesa per ragioni fiscali," Apol 55 (1982) 470.

[252] At this writing, the PCILT is conducting a survey of the experience of dioceses in applying concretely the notion of defection by formal act and of the usefulness of this canonical innovation. Canon 1099, §2 of the 1917 code exempted "those born of non-Catholics" from the obligation of observing canonical form. The vagueness of this phrase and difficulties in its practical application led Pius XII to delete it from the code in 1948. Vagueness and difficulty in practical application may doom to a similar fate the exemption of those who leave the Catholic Church by a formal act.

the Catholic Church when it assesses the validity of a marriage involving an Eastern non-Catholic.[253]

Canon 781, 2° of the Eastern code also stipulates that "with regard to the form of the celebration, the Church recognizes any form prescribed or admitted by the law to which the parties were subject at the time of the celebration of the marriage." Churches and ecclesial communities stemming from the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century generally do not have their own law governing marriage (the Anglican communion is a notable exception). They have instead deferred to civil authority to regulate marriage. Thus, the Eastern code seems to say that the validity of marriages of baptized Protestants depends on their observance of the formalities required by civil law (see also CCEO 780, §2). The Latin code, on the other hand, is silent about the possible competence of civil authority to prescribe a form for marriages between baptized non-Catholics, which are, by definition, sacramental (c. 1055, §2). The Council for the Interpretation of Legal Texts could assist practitioners by clarifying whether on this issue the Eastern code is to be considered supplementary law for the Latin church.

THE PLACE WHERE MARRIAGE IS TO BE CELEBRATED

Canon 1118 — §1. A marriage between Catholics or between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic baptized party is to be celebrated in a parish church. It can be celebrated in another church or oratory with the permission of the local ordinary or pastor.

§2. The local ordinary can permit a marriage to be celebrated in another suitable place.

§3. A marriage between a Catholic party and a non-baptized party can be celebrated in a church or in another suitable place.

Parish Church

A parish church is the ordinary place for the celebration of a marriage involving two Catholics or a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic. Since the marriages of two baptized persons are sacraments, they are not merely private or familial celebrations but ecclesial events. The spouses declare their consent "before God and the Church" and live out that commitment in and with the support of the local ecclesial community. It is, therefore, fitting that this celebration should take place in the parish church. It is here that the local community is "gathered together by the preaching of the Gospel of Christ, and the mystery of the Lord's supper is celebrated, 'so that the whole fellowship is joined together by the flesh and blood of the Lord's body.'"[254]

Another Church or Oratory

The local ordinary or pastor can permit a marriage between Catholics or between a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic to be celebrated in another church or oratory. In this canon, the term "church" denotes a building dedicated to Catholic worship to which the faithful have the right of free access (c. 1214). An oratory is a place designated for Catholic worship for the benefit of some community to which the access of the faithful is regulated by the competent authority of that community (c. 1223). Unlike the 1917 code,[255] the current law does not prohibit the celebration of marriages in the oratories (often popularly, but imprecisely, called "chapels") of seminaries and religious houses. However, the consent of the rector of the church or the superior responsible for the oratory is required in addition to the permission of the local ordinary or pastor.

[253] CCEO 833 authorizes local hierarchs to grant to priests of any Catholic church the faculty to bless the marriages of Eastern non-Catholics when these members of the faithful cannot approach a priest of their own church and spontaneously seek the blessing. A priest so delegated should, if possible, inform the competent authority of the non-Catholic church before he blesses the marriages.

[254] LG 26.

[255] CIC 1109, §2.

Another Suitable Place

A local ordinary, but not a pastor, can permit a marriage between two Catholics or between a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic to be celebrated in some suitable place other than a Catholic church or oratory. Suitable places might include the non-Catholic church or place of worship of one of the parties to a mixed marriage, a nondenominational chapel attached to a college, university, or other institution, or even a private home.[256] When judging the suitability of a place for the celebration of a marriage, care should be taken to ensure that the nature of the place is consistent with a religious celebration. Particular law or policy might establish criteria for determining the suitability of places for the celebration of marriage or determine which places in the diocese are suitable and under which conditions.

When a Catholic marries an unbaptized person, a (Catholic) church, whether parochial or not, remains the preferred place for the celebration. However, these marriages can also be celebrated in some other suitable place. The canon does not require the permission of the local ordinary for the selection of another suitable place, nor does it specify the one competent to select the place.[257] Therefore, the selection is presumably left to the discretion of the assisting minister. Although marriages between Catholics and unbaptized persons are not considered sacraments, they are significant religious events. A suitable place for the celebration should enhance rather than distract from the religious dimension of the marriage. Therefore, the assisting minister should consult local guidelines on suitable places for marriages and use common sense.

Canon 1118 presumes that, no matter where a marriage is celebrated, the canonical form will normally be observed. When marriages are celebrated outside a parish church, those who assist at those marriages in the name of the Church need to be particularly attentive to the requirements of this form. Delegation must be received from the pastor or local ordinary of the place where the marriage is to be celebrated if that place is outside the territorial boundaries of one who assists by virtue of office even if the parties are his subjects. The marriage is to be recorded in the parish where it was actually celebrated rather than in the parish where the spouses have a domicile (c. 1121, §1).

The Liturgical Form of Marriage

Canon 1119 — Outside the case of necessity, the rites prescribed in the liturgical books approved by the Church or received by legitimate customs are to be observed in the celebration of a marriage.

Although the essential form of marriage is the exchange of consent by the spouses, the Church has long surrounded this element with liturgical rites that elucidate the place of marriage in the mystery of salvation. This liturgical form is to be observed in the celebration of all marriages, except in cases of grave necessity. The liturgical norms and rubrics to be used in the celebration of marriage are found in the official liturgical book, The Rite of Marriage. The current ritual offers a rich variety of options for readings, prayers, and blessings to allow the liturgical celebration to be adapted to the circumstances of individual couples.

Marriages between two Catholics are normally celebrated in the context of a nuptial Mass. However, for a just cause, these marriages may be celebrated according to the "Rite for Celebrating Marriage outside Mass" which includes a liturgy of the word and the nuptial blessing as well as the required exchange of consent.

The 1917 code prohibited the celebration of marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics in a Catholic church. The local ordinary could dispense from this prohibition to avoid serious difficulties, but a sacred rite was rarely permitted for the celebration of these marriages.[258] Paul VI abrogated this prohibition in 1970.[259] The current ritual reflects this postconciliar change in discipline.[260] Marriages between Catholics and baptized non-Catholics are normally celebrated according to the "Rite for Celebrating Marriage outside Mass." However, the local ordinary can permit these marriages to be celebrated within the context of the Eucharist.[261] Marriages between Catholics and unbaptized persons are always to be celebrated outside the Mass and according to the special rite provided for these situations, which allows the option of using only one scriptural reading from the Old Testament.[262]

[256] The 1983 code abrogates the former prohibition on marriages in private buildings except in extraordinary circumstances of CIC 1109, §2.

[257] CCEO 838, §1 reserves to the local hierarch alone the authority to permit a marriage involving a Catholic anywhere other than in a Catholic sacred place.

When marriage takes place during the celebration of the Eucharist, the readings and prayers for the wedding Mass are normally employed. However, if the marriage takes place on a Sunday or solemnity, the readings and prayers of the day are to be used, except on Sundays during the Christmas season and ordinary time when the wedding Mass may be used at celebrations that are not regular parish Masses. When the Mass texts of the day must be used, one of the readings from the wedding Mass can be substituted, except during the Triduum and on Christmas, Epiphany, Ascension, Pentecost, Corpus Christi, and other holy days of obligation.[263]

All of the rites for the celebration of marriage contain a nuptial blessing. The current discipline has eliminated previous restrictions on when and to whom this blessing may be imparted. Thus, the nuptial blessing can be granted to those entering second marriages or entering mixed marriages, when marriage is celebrated outside a Mass, and during any liturgical season.

[258] CIC 1109, §3 and 1102, §2.
[259] Paul VI, mp Matrimonia mixta, March 31, 1970, 11, CLD 7, 716–717.
[260] See Ecum Dir 159–160.
[261] Rite of Marriage, 8.
[262] Ibid., 56.
[263] Ibid., 11.

Canon 1120 — The conference of bishops can produce its own rite of marriage, to be reviewed by the Holy See, in keeping with the usages of places and peoples which are adapted to the Christian spirit; nevertheless, the law remains in effect that the person who assists at the marriage is present, asks for the manifestation of consent of the contracting parties, and receives it.

The liturgical role of episcopal conferences is not limited to preparing and publishing vernacular versions of the typical editions of the marriage ritual (c. 838, §3). They may also prepare their own marriage rituals, which incorporate and adapt the customs and usages of their cultures in a Christian spirit. Perhaps no human institution is more intimately intertwined with culture than marriage. This authorization for inculturation of the rite of marriage is derived from Sacrosanctum Concilium 77. It embodies the Church's desire to preserve and foster those elements of a people's cultural heritage that are "not indissolubly bound up with superstition and error."[264]

While episcopal conferences may adapt the words by which the spouses exchange consent, their inculturated rituals must retain the exchange of consent in the presence of the assisting minister. Like all liturgical books, these particular rituals for marriage may not be used until they have received the recognitio of the Holy See (c. 838, §3).

THE RECORDING OF MARRIAGES

Registration of Marriages

Canon 1121 — §1. After a marriage has been celebrated, the pastor of the place of the celebration or the person who takes his place, even if neither assisted at the marriage, is to note as soon as possible in the marriage register the names of the spouses, the person who assisted, and the witnesses, and the place and date of the celebration of the marriage according to the method prescribed by the conference of bishops or the diocesan bishop.

[264] SC 37.

§2. Whenever a marriage is contracted according to the norm of can. 1116, a priest or deacon, if he was present at the celebration, or otherwise the witnesses in solidum with the contracting parties are bound to inform as soon as possible the pastor or local ordinary about the marriage entered into.

§3. For a marriage contracted with a dispensation from canonical form, the local ordinary who granted the dispensation is to take care that the dispensation and celebration are inscribed in the marriage registers of both the curia and the proper parish of the Catholic party whose pastor conducted the investigation about the free status. The Catholic spouse is bound to notify as soon as possible the same ordinary and pastor about the marriage celebrated and also to indicate the place of the celebration and the public form observed.

Since marriage is a public event that affects the spouses' status in the Church and in society, it is important that there be a public record by which the fact of the celebration can be proved. Each parish is to have a marriage register (c. 535, §1). The responsibility for ensuring that every marriage celebrated within the boundaries of the parish is registered rests ultimately with the pastor (or the one who takes his place), even if he did not assist at the marriage.

The entry in the marriage register is to include the names of the spouses, the names of the person who assisted at the marriage and of the two other witnesses, and the place and date of the celebration. The conference of bishops or the diocesan bishop can provide additional directives on what is to be entered in the register and the manner in which it is to be done. Since the marriage register records public events that affect the status of persons, the spouses and other interested parties have a right to an authentic copy of the data pertaining to them that is recorded in the marriage register (c. 487, §2). An authentic copy of the entry in the marriage register is a public ecclesiastical document that is fully probative of the fact that the marriage was properly celebrated (cc. 1540, §1; 1541).

When the extraordinary form of marriage has been legitimately employed (c. 1116), the obligation to report the marriage to the local ordinary or pastor of the place where the celebration took place rests with the priest or deacon who was in fact present but not authorized to assist. If no such priest or deacon was present, the spouses together with the witnesses are to report the matter to the pastor or local ordinary. In either case, the event is to be reported as soon as possible.

If a marriage is celebrated after a dispensation from canonical form has been granted,[265] the local ordinary who granted the dispensation is responsible to see that both the dispensation and the subsequent marriage are properly recorded. In these cases, the relevant information is to be entered into marriage registers in the diocesan curia from which the dispensation was granted and in the parish of the Catholic party whose pastor conducted the pre-nuptial investigation.

When a Catholic seeks to marry a non-Catholic, whether baptized or not, the one competent to dispense from the canonical form is the local ordinary of the place where the Catholic has a domicile or quasi-domicile.[266] The proper pastor of a Catholic is normally the pastor of the place of his or her domicile or quasi-domicile (c. 107). However, in many cases, the proper pastor is not the one who conducts the pre-nuptial investigation and submits the petition for a dispensation from canonical form. The NCCB norms attempt to avoid this ambiguity in the law by stipulating that the marriage is to be registered in "the marriage

[265] See the commentary on c. 1127, §2.

[266] Although c. 1121, §3 seems to envision only dispensations from canonical form for mixed marriages, the same norms for recording the dispensation and the marriage entered pursuant to it seem to apply to cases when the form was dispensed in danger-of-death situations (c. 1079) and the unusual cases when the Holy See has dispensed from the form for the marriage of two Catholics.

records of the parish from which the application for the dispensation was made."[267]

The Catholic on whose behalf a dispensation from canonical form was granted has an obligation to report to the local ordinary who granted it and his or her proper pastor when, where, and by what public form the marriage was contracted. This information is usually contained in the petition for a dispensation from the obligation of canonical form. However, the Catholic spouse has an obligation to confirm the fact that the marriage was in fact celebrated in the manner previously specified.

Canon 1122 — §1. The contracted marriage is to be noted also in the baptismal registers in which the baptism of the spouses has been recorded.

§2. If a spouse did not contract marriage in the parish in which the person was baptized, the pastor of the place of the celebration is to send notice of the marriage which has been entered into as soon as possible to the pastor of the place of the conferral of baptism.

The fact that a marriage has been celebrated is also to be recorded in the baptismal register of the place where the Catholic party or parties were baptized. If the marriage is celebrated in the same place where the baptism occurred, the pastor of the place of marriage is responsible for seeing that the required information is entered into both parish registers. The pastor of the place where the marriage took place also has the responsibility to notify the pastor of the place of baptism and to assure that the marriage is properly recorded there if one or both spouses was baptized elsewhere.

Canon 1123 — Whenever a marriage is either convalidated in the external forum, declared null, or legitimately dissolved other than by death, the pastor of the place of the celebration of the marriage must be informed so that a notation is properly made in the marriage and baptismal registers.

Parish marriage and baptismal registers should also contain notations of external forum convalidations of marriages,[268] dissolutions of marriage for causes other than death,[269] and declarations of nullity. When a marriage null because of the failure to observe the canonical form is convalidated, it is to be recorded in the place where the convalidation occurred. The convalidation of a marriage invalid for other causes is recorded both in the parish where the original ceremony took place and the parish where the convalidation occurred. Convalidations in the internal non-sacramental forum are recorded only in the secret archive of the diocesan chancery. Tribunals and chanceries that prepare marriage cases leading to the declaration of nullity or dissolution usually notify the parishes of baptism and marriage directly when the decision can be executed (cc. 1685 and 1706). The notation should indicate that the marriage was decreed null or dissolved, the date, and the protocol number of the document.

CHAPTER VI[270]
MIXED MARRIAGES
[cc. 1124–1129][271]

In the strict canonical sense, a "mixed marriage" is one entered into by a Catholic with a person who is a baptized member of a Christian church or ecclesial community that lacks full communion with the Catholic Church. In a broad sense, a mixed marriage is any union between a Catholic and a non-Catholic, whether baptized or not. While this [267] NCCB, particular norms, November 16, 1970, §12, CLD 7, 738.

[268] See the commentary on cc. 1161–1165.

[269] See the commentary on cc. 1142–1150.

[270] See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 800–806; Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Einführung vor 1124/1–1129/1; Navarro Valls, in Pamplona ComEng, 710–715; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 633–638.

[271] See CCEO 813–816, 834–835, 839.

broad sense is frequently used in popular discourse, the strict sense will be used here because the canonical issues and implications of marriages between Catholics and other baptized Christians are quite different from those raised by marriages between Catholics and the unbaptized.

Historical Synopsis

Since the patristic era, the Church has exhibited pastoral concern about the marriages of Catholics with those who do not share the faith of the Church. The basis for this concern is the fear, grounded in experience, that mixed marriages provide the occasion for Catholics to lapse from the practice of the faith or even to fall into heresy or schism (c. 751) and for the loss to the Church of the children born of the marriage. More recently, the Church has highlighted the potential for the religious differences endemic to mixed marriages to undermine the community of married life. As Paul VI observed, "There are very many difficulties inherent to a mixed marriage as such since a kind of division is introduced into a living cell of the Church as the Christian family is deservedly called."[272]

Early councils prohibited marriages between Christians and heretics and schismatics, at least when they involved clerics or their children.[273] The most draconian legislation on mixed marriages was that of the Council of Trullo in 691 which decreed:

> It is not allowed that an Orthodox man be joined with an heretical woman, nor, indeed that an Orthodox woman be united with an heretical man. But if anything of this kind appears to have been done by any at all, the marriage is considered invalid and the nefarious union dissolved.[274]

Although the canons of Trullo were not received by the churches of the West, its diriment impediment of mixed religion remained the law of the Eastern churches for many centuries.[275] In the West, although local councils and popes continued to prohibit the marriages of the faithful with heretics and schismatics, marriages in contravention of this prohibition were generally not considered invalid. Prior to Trent, there is scant evidence of dispensations from what had become the impedient impediment of mixed religion, which prohibited but did not invalidate mixed marriages.

With the Protestant Reformation, European Catholics often found themselves living in close proximity with large numbers of people whom the Church considered to be heretics. Catholics in the new missionary territories were even more isolated from other Catholics. As a result, intermarriage with non-Catholics became an increasingly acute pastoral problem. The Council of Trent did not address this situation directly. However, its decree Tametsi, where it was promulgated, had the effect of enforcing the traditional prohibition on marriage with heretics since the proper (Catholic) pastor would refuse to be present at these weddings. Normally, mixed marriages were permitted only after the non-Catholic party abjured heresy.

The refusal of Catholic pastors to assist at mixed marriages as well as the scarcity of Catholic pastors in many areas where the Tridentine decree had been promulgated caused a proliferation of marriages invalid for failure to observe the canoni-

[272] Paul VI, mp Matrimonia mixta, March 31, 1970, CLD 7, 712.

[273] Elvira (306), c. 16; Laodicaea (between 343 and 381), cc. 10 and 31; Hippo (393), c. 12; Chalcedon (451), c. 14.

[274] Council of Trullo, c. 72.

[275] As late as 1969, the Rota declared invalid the marriage of an Orthodox communicant with a Protestant on the basis of the Trullan impediment. The changed ecumenical climate of the postconciliar era prompted a rethinking of the continuing force of the Trullan impediment. It was eventually held that this impediment had been abrogated either by immemorial custom or by legislation of the various Orthodox churches. See the Rotal decision coram Canals, October 21, 1970, CLD 7, 10–14; and ApSig, decision, July 1, 1972, CLD 8, 3–29. See also J. Myers, The Trullan Controversy, CanLawStud 491 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1977).

cal form. To address this pastoral problem, Benedict XIV exempted non-Catholics in the Netherlands from the observance of the Tridentine form when they married among themselves or with Catholics.[276] This Benedictine privilege was eventually extended to other regions. In addition, some, including Alphonsus Liguori, held that, in German-speaking areas, the prohibition of mixed marriages had been displaced by contrary custom.[277]

For the sake of the public good, the pope occasionally granted dispensations to allow Catholic monarchs and members of the nobility to marry non-Catholics. Dispensations were granted only after the successful negotiation of treaty-like compacts in which the freedom of the Catholic to worship and raise any children in the Catholic faith was guaranteed. The form of these compacts, which gradually became the style of the Roman Curia, provided the model for the cautiones or "promises" that became the essential condition for the granting of dispensations for mixed marriages, when the Church began granting these dispensations for ordinary people in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century. Although the authority to dispense for mixed marriages belonged to the pope, the faculty was increasingly delegated to diocesan bishops and their equivalents from the early nineteenth century on.[278] In the 1917 code, the impedient impediment of mixed religion prohibited but did not invalidate marriages between Catholics and baptized non-Catholics. A dispensation from this impediment could be granted only if the non-Catholic promised to remove all dangers of the Catholic spouse's lapsing from the Catholic Church and both parties promised unconditionally to have all children baptized and educated as Catholics.[279]

The new ecumenical climate ushered in by Vatican II prompted a reconsideration of the Church's discipline on mixed marriages. The recognition of the existence of elements of the Church of Christ outside the Catholic Church and of various degrees of communion between the Catholic Church and other Christian churches and ecclesial communities[280] made it impossible to continue to treat baptized non-Catholics simply as heretics and schismatics. Moreover, the conciliar teaching on religious freedom seemed incompatible with the practice of requiring non-Catholic parties to mixed marriages to make promises that might violate their consciences.[281]

In 1966, the CDF issued new norms governing mixed marriages, which called for the non-Catholic party to be invited to promise not to interfere with the Catholic spouse's fulfillment of the obligation to practice the Catholic faith and to ensure the Catholic baptism and upbringing of children. If the non-Catholic declined to make this promise, the case was to be referred to the congregation.[282] In 1970, after the issue of mixed marriages had been studied and discussed by the 1967 Synod of Bishops, Paul VI promulgated the motu proprio Matrimonia mixta which completely revised the discipline governing mixed marriages.

This revised discipline has been incorporated into the revised code.[283] The six canons devoted to mixed marriages treat: the prohibition of mixed marriages (c. 1124), the conditions for granting permissions for mixed marriages (c. 1125), the role of episcopal conferences in regulating mixed marriages (c. 1126), the form for celebrating mixed marriages (c. 1127), the pastoral care of spouses in mixed marriages (c. 1128), and the extension of the discipline governing mixed marriages to marriages involving the impediment of disparity of cult (c. 1129).

[276] Benedict XIV, bull Matrimonia, November 4, 1741, in Bull. Ben. XIV, 1:178.

[277] Cappello, De Matrimonio, n. 659.

[278] For a more detailed treatment of these post-Tridentine developments, see F. Schenk, The Matrimonial Impediments of Mixed Religion and Disparity of Cult, CanLawStud 51 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1929) 45–69.

[279] CIC 1061, §1, 2°.

[280] LG 15; UR 3.

[281] See DH, especially 2–5.

[282] CDF, instr Matrimonii sacramentum, March 18, 1966, I, 3, CLD 6, 594–595.

[283] See Ecum Dir 143–160.

Prohibition of Mixed Marriages

Canon 1124 — Without express permission of the competent authority, a marriage is prohibited between two baptized persons of whom one is baptized in the Catholic Church or received into it after baptism and has not defected from it by a formal act and the other of whom is enrolled in a Church or ecclesial community not in full communion with the Catholic Church.

The revised code repeats the traditional prohibition of marriages between Catholics and baptized members of non-Catholic Christian churches and ecclesial communities. In fact, the language of the code ("is prohibited") seems somewhat stronger than that used by Paul VI in Matrimonia mixta ("may not be contracted").[284] Nevertheless, the revised code situates the discipline on mixed marriages in a wholly new context that profoundly but subtly changes its meaning.

From Dispensation to Permission

The 1917 code, which was still in effect when Matrimonia mixta was promulgated, based its prohibition of mixed marriages on the impedient impediment of mixed religion (see CIC 1060–1064). To enter a mixed marriage lawfully, a Catholic had first to be dispensed from this impediment. The law views dispensations negatively. Since church law aims to protect important communal values, dispensations should be granted rarely and in circumstances where the values the law upholds are not threatened and there are objectively grave reasons for departing from the usual discipline in an individual case. In brief, the legislator wants the faithful to avoid certain activities, but is willing, sometimes reluctantly, to make exceptions. However, during the twentieth century dispensations from the impediment of mixed religion were increasingly granted as a matter of course.

The revised code no longer categorizes mixed religion as an impediment and requires not a dispensation but a permission (licentia) before a mixed marriage is contracted. Unlike dispensations, permissions are not viewed negatively by the law. Elsewhere in the code, permissions are required for activities that the legislator views favorably but that entail certain inherent risks. The requirement of prior permission is an attempt to ensure that these risks are removed or at least minimized before the faithful engage in the activity in question.[285] By abrogating mixed religion as an impediment and requiring only permission for Catholics to enter into mixed marriages, the revised code has taken a decidedly more positive view of mixed marriages than did the previous code and the tradition underlying it.

Concerns Surrounding Mixed Marriages

This more positive assessment of mixed marriages has not blinded the Church to the particular problems to which these marriages can give rise. As Paul VI pointed out, mixed marriages pose "an obstacle to the full spiritual communion of the parties."[286] Despite their sharing a common faith in Christ, the scriptures, and other elements of the Christian heritage, spouses in mixed marriages bring with them the tragically divided state of the Church of Christ. The different ways in which their respective churches understand and live out the common Christian heritage can be a source of tensions and misunderstandings within their marriage. Nor can the danger of the Catholic party's lapse from the Catholic Church be discounted. Mixed marriage is the single most significant factor in the decision of a Catholic to join another

[284] Matrimonia mixta, CLD 7, 712, 715.

[285] See, for example, c. 933, which requires the permission of the local ordinary to celebrate Mass in a sacred edifice of a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community, and c. 934, §1, 2°, which requires permission of the local ordinary to reserve the Eucharist in non-parochial churches and oratories and chapels not connected to a religious house.

[286] Matrimonia mixta, CLD 7, 715.

Christian church and an important factor in lapse from religious practice altogether.[287]

As a result of these pastoral concerns, Catholics must seek the permission of the competent authority before entering into a mixed marriage. Those who have left the Catholic Church by a formal act[288] are not bound by this obligation, unless they wish to marry a Catholic (see c. 1071, §2). The authority competent to grant this permission is the local ordinary of the place where the Catholic party has a domicile or quasi-domicile or of the place where he or she is actually staying (c. 136). Failure to seek this permission does not of itself invalidate a mixed marriage, but it does render it illicit.

Conditions for Granting Permission for a Mixed Marriage

Canon 1125 — The local ordinary can grant a permission of this kind if there is a just and reasonable cause. He is not to grant it unless the following conditions have been fulfilled:

1° the Catholic party is to declare that he or she is prepared to remove dangers of defecting from the faith and is to make a sincere promise to do all in his or her power so that all offspring are baptized and brought up in the Catholic Church;

2° the other party is to be informed at an appropriate time about the promises which the Catholic party is to make, in such a way that it is certain that he or she is truly aware of the promise and obligation of the Catholic party;

3° both parties are to be instructed about the purposes and essential properties of marriage which neither of the contracting parties is to exclude.

A "just and reasonable cause" must exist for a local ordinary to grant permission for a mixed marriage. By saying that the local ordinary can grant such a permission (concedere potest), the canon leaves some room for discretion in assessing the sufficiency of the reasons for permitting a mixed marriage. However, since the Church ordinarily grants this permission "provided that a just reason is had"[289] and the spiritual good of the faithful is a legitimate cause,[290] it would be an abuse of pastoral discretion to refuse the permission if it would truly serve the spiritual good of the parties and they are otherwise prepared for marriage. Thus, assessing the sufficiency of the cause for this permission can be reduced in practice to determining whether there are adequate safeguards for the faith of the Catholic party and the children. Without these safeguards, the permission would hardly serve the spiritual good of the faithful.

The local ordinary is not to permit a mixed marriage unless three conditions are met: the declaration and promise of the Catholic party, the notification of the non-Catholic party, and catechesis for both parties.

1. Declaration and Promise of the Catholic Party

Following the path blazed by Paul VI, the revised code requires no promises by the non-Catholic party but places on the Catholic party the burden for ensuring continuance of his or her own Catholic practice and seeing to the Catholic formation of children. The Catholic must first declare his or her readiness to remove dangers of lapsing from the Catholic faith. He or she should be willing to recognize the potential problems arising from differences of religion that have already surfaced during the courtship or are reasonably foreseeable. An anti-Catholic attitude on the part of the non-Catholic or his or her family, lack of respect for the Catholic's religious convictions or practice, and differences of attitude about the frequency of religious practice or church support are issues that should be discussed and resolved [287] A. Greeley, The Catholic Myth (New York: Scribners, 1990) 111.

[288] See the commentary on c. 1117.

[289] Matrimonia mixta, 3, CLD 7, 715.

[290] EM, viii, CLD 6, 397.

prior to the marriage in a manner consonant with the parties' consciences. If the non-Catholic is absolutely indifferent to matters religious, the Catholic should be aware of how difficult it will be to maintain religious observance and see to the religious formation of children without the support of his or her spouse.

The Catholic party must also promise "to do all in his or her power so that all offspring are baptized and brought up in the Catholic Church." Marriage is ordered to the procreation and education of children (c. 1055, §1). "Since they have given life to their children, parents have a most grave obligation and possess the right to educate them" (c. 226, §2). This right and obligation of parents extends to the physical, social, cultural, moral, and religious upbringing of their children (c. 1136). Catholic parents have a particular duty to see that their children are baptized soon after birth (c. 867, §1), that they are prepared for the sacraments of confirmation and Holy Eucharist and approach these sacraments at the appropriate time (cc. 890 and 914), and that they receive appropriate catechesis at home (c. 774, §2) and have access to the available opportunities for further Catholic formation outside the home (c. 793, §1). As a condition for permission for a mixed marriage, the Catholic must promise to make a sincere effort to fulfill these obligations.

The promise extends to all children who will be born of the marriage. Thus, it is not permissible to agree in advance to raise any male children in one church and the female children in the other or to baptize or raise the children in both churches (or neither) and allow them to choose for themselves when they are of age.[291] In its strict sense, the promise refers only to children to be born after the proposed marriage. It does not extend to children already born out of wedlock or in an invalid union that is to be convalidated or in a previous marriage of either of the parties.[292] However, Catholics should be reminded of their moral obligation to see to the religious formation of these children.

The revised code has omitted the 1917 code's requirement that, before permission for a mixed marriage was granted, the competent authority have moral certainty that the promises would be fulfilled.[293] Instead, the Catholic must promise to "do all in his or her power" to see to the Catholic baptism and rearing of the children, not to guarantee that these efforts will be successful. In fact, he or she may foresee that his or her efforts will probably be ineffective because of the strongly held convictions of his or her non-Catholic fiancé. The canonical and pastoral problems are whether a Catholic can, in good faith, promise to do all that he or she can to see to the Catholic baptism and formation of children while realizing the likely futility of these efforts and whether his or her promise in these circumstances is sufficient basis for granting permission for the mixed marriage.

The phrase "to do all in his or her power" is derived from Matrimonia mixta. Various episcopal conference norms[294] implementing this motu proprio have specified the manner in which the Catholic's promise is to be made, but they have shed little light on the meaning of the phrase. More helpful are CDF responses in cases referred to it pursuant to the instruction Matrimonii sacramentum when one or both parties refused to make the required promises.[295] These replies indicate that the phrase "to do all in his or her power" is to be understood literally. Permission for a mixed marriage can be granted even when it is foreseen

[291] Canon 1366 threatens penal sanctions for Catholic parents who allow their children to be baptized or raised in a non-Catholic religion. However, Ecum Dir 151 notes: "If, notwithstanding the Catholic's best efforts, the children are not baptized and brought up in the Catholic Church, the Catholic parent does not fall subject to the censure of Canon Law. At the same time, his/her obligation to share the Catholic faith with the children does not cease."

[292] SCOf, reply, January 16, 1942, CLD 2, 286.

[293] CIC 1061, §1, 3°.

[294] See CLD 7, 714–741.

[295] See CDF, replies of May 17, 1966; June 18, 1966; July 9, 1966; December 10, 1966; December 12, 1966; February 27, 1967; CLD 6, 597–604.

that the Catholic's efforts to pass on the Catholic faith will probably be fruitless because of the resistance of the non-Catholic spouse. In these circumstances, the Catholic party can fulfill his or her obligation, at least in part, > by playing an active part in contributing to the Christian atmosphere of the home; doing all that is possible by word and example to enable the other members of the family to appreciate the specific values of the Catholic tradition; taking whatever steps are necessary to be informed about his/her own faith so as to be able to explain and discuss it with them; praying with the family for the grace of Christian unity as the Lord wills it.[296]

Doing all that one can does not include so insisting on the Catholic formation of children that the stability of the marriage is threatened. What is necessary is a sincere promise by the Catholic to do all in his or her power to assure the Catholic formation of children. The sincerity of that promise is to be presumed, unless there is evidence to the contrary.

2. Informing the Non-Catholic

The declaration and promise by the Catholic spouse are necessary but not sufficient for the granting of permission for a mixed marriage. The non-Catholic party must also be informed of the declaration and promise the Catholic has made, in such a way that he or she understands that the Catholic has undertaken a genuine obligation.

Although the non-Catholic is not required to make a promise comparable to that of the Catholic and the dictates of the former's conscience are to be respected, the obligations of the Catholic party should be addressed early enough in the marriage preparation process to allow a thorough airing of the concerns and possible objections of both parties. The parish priest or pastoral minister responsible for marriage preparation should attempt to draw the couple into a candid discussion of the religious issues in their marriage, possible sources of tension, and strategies for dealing with conflicts. The pastoral minister should assist the couple to reach an understanding on these issues, and especially the religious nurture of children, that is consonant both with the Catholic's obligations and with their respective consciences. Sound pastoral care does not defer resolution of potentially divisive religious issues to some indefinite time after the marriage.

3. Catechesis for Marriage

Both parties to a mixed marriage are to be catechized about the nature, properties, and ends of marriage. This catechesis should be positive in tone and should highlight those areas where the couples' respective traditions share a common vision of marriage and married life. However, it should not overlook areas where their religious traditions espouse divergent positions. This catechesis should establish a context for ascertaining that neither party excludes an essential end or property of marriage from his or her consent.[297]

Competence of the Episcopal Conference

Canon 1126 — It is for the conference of bishops to establish the method in which these declarations and promises, which are always required, must be made and to define the manner in which they are to be established in the external forum and the non-Catholic party informed about them.

Like Matrimonia mixta, the revised code leaves to episcopal conferences the task of issuing specific norms adapted to the conditions of their territory about how the Catholic's declaration and promise is to be made, how this declaration and promise are to be proven in the external forum, and how the non-Catholic is to be informed. Like all conference decrees, these mixed marriage norms have force only after they have received the recognitio of the Holy See and been properly promulgated.

[296] Ecum Dir 151.

[297] Ecum Dir 148–149.

Since permission for a mixed marriage always requires the declaration and promise by the Catholic and the notification of the non-Catholic, there should always be some written documentation to prove that these requirements have been met. The Catholic should normally make the declaration and promise in writing, but he or she may make them orally. In either case, they should be made in the presence of a priest or deacon who certifies with his own signature that they were made. The notification of the non-Catholic party should also be attested to in writing by the responsible priest or deacon. While printed formulas to which the required signatures are affixed may be employed, the priest or deacon should indicate in some way that the declaration and promise were made sincerely.

Since the norms of the code governing mixed marriages are substantially the same as those of Matrimonia mixta, many episcopal conferences, including that of the United States, simply reiterated the norms they issued in response to Matrimonia mixta after the revised code was promulgated.[298]

Canonical and Liturgical Form

Canon 1127 — §1. The prescripts of can. 1108 are to be observed for the form to be used in a mixed marriage. Nevertheless, if a Catholic party contracts marriage with a non-Catholic party of an Eastern rite, the canonical form of the celebration must be observed for liceity only; for validity, however, the presence of a sacred minister is required and the other requirements of law are to be observed.

Mixed Marriage in a Catholic Church

When a Catholic receives permission to enter into a mixed marriage, he or she remains bound to observe the canonical form when celebrating the marriage. The exchange of consent is to take place in the context of the liturgical rite specified in The Rite of Marriage. Mixed marriages are normally not to be celebrated during the Eucharist,[299] especially because of the awkwardness, confusion, and misunderstandings that can arise from the Catholic Church's discipline on communicatio in sacris (c. 844, §§3–5), which would bar most non-Catholic spouses and their families from the reception of the Eucharist.[300] However, the local ordinary can permit the celebration of mixed marriages during Mass either in individual cases or in general at the discretion of the pastor.

A non-Catholic priest or minister may be present and actively participate in a Catholic liturgical celebration of marriage. He or she may be invited to give "additional prayers, blessings, or words of greeting or exhortation. If the marriage is not part of the eucharistic celebration, the minister may also be invited to read a lesson and/or to preach."[301] However, only the Catholic minister may validly ask for and receive the consent of the parties in the name of the Church.

Marriages of Catholics and Eastern Non-Catholics

The canonical form of marriage must be observed for liceity, but not for validity when a Catholic marries an Eastern non-Catholic.[302] However, to be recognized as valid, the marriage must be celebrated in the presence of a non-Catholic Eastern priest who conducts the sacred rite according to the norm of the law of his church and imparts the customary blessing to the couple. Although the Catholic Church is willing to recognize the Eastern sacred rite as a suitable substitute for [298] NCCB-CompNm, 16 and 35–49.

[299] Rite of Marriage, 8.

[300] Ecum Dir 159.

[301] NCCB-CompNm, 43. See also Ecum Dir 158.

[302] This exception was introduced for marriages between Eastern Catholics and Eastern non-Catholics by the conciliar decree OE 18. It was extended to include marriages of Latin Catholics with Eastern non-Catholics by the decree Crescens matrimoniorum of the CEC on February 22, 1967. CLD 6, 605–606.

the usual canonical form, the Church would not recognize the validity of the marriage if one of the parties were bound by a diriment impediment such as prior bond. Although non-observance of the canonical form does not affect the validity of the marriage in these cases, its lawfulness requires that a Catholic who plans to marry in an Orthodox ceremony first seek permission for a mixed marriage and a dispensation from the obligation of observing canonical form from his or her own local ordinary.

Dispensation from Canonical Form

§2. If grave difficulties hinder the observance of canonical form, the local ordinary of the Catholic party has the right of dispensing from the form in individual cases, after having consulted the ordinary of the place in which the marriage is celebrated and with some public form of celebration for validity. It is for the conference of bishops to establish norms by which the aforementioned dispensation is to be granted in a uniform manner.

Latin Discipline

Prior to 1970, the competence to dispense Catholics from the observance of canonical form was reserved to the Apostolic See, except in cases of danger of death. Matrimonia mixta authorized local ordinaries to dispense from the observance of this form for mixed marriages when grave difficulties stand in the way of its observance. This reformed discipline has been incorporated into the revised code.

Dispensations from canonical form for mixed marriages can be granted by the local ordinary of the Catholic party, i.e., the local ordinary of the place where the Catholic has a domicile or quasi-domicile.[303] If the marriage is to be celebrated in another diocese, the Catholic's local ordinary is not to grant the dispensation without first consulting the ordinary of the place of celebration. Although this consultation does not affect the validity of the dispensation and the local ordinary of the place of celebration exercises no veto power, the consultation aims to prevent confusion or wonderment when a Catholic marries in a non-Catholic ceremony with perhaps a Catholic minister present.

In its norms implementing Matrimonia mixta, the NCCB had authorized both the local ordinary of the Catholic party and the local ordinary of the place of celebration to dispense from canonical form.[304] With the promulgation of the revised code, the authorization for this dispensation to be granted by the local ordinary of the place of celebration has been abrogated.[305]

For a dispensation to be granted, grave obstacles must stand in the way of the observance of canonical form. While it is impossible to provide an exhaustive listing of all possible obstacles to the observance of form, the following have been suggested as legitimate pastoral reasons:

> to achieve family harmony or to avoid family alienation, to obtain parental agreement to the marriage, to recognize the significant claims of relationship or special friendship with a non-Catholic minister, to permit the marriage in a church that has particular importance to the non-Catholic.[306]

In many areas, the long-standing custom of celebrating marriages in the church of the bride may also be a sufficient reason.

Even though a dispensation from canonical form has been granted, the law requires the observance of some public form as a condition for the [303] Catholics serving in the armed forces are subject to the concurrent jurisdiction of the military ordinary and the local ordinary of the place where they have a domicile or quasi-domicile. Thus, either ordinary may dispense from the obligation of canonical form for mixed marriages.

[304] NCCB, "Statement of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops on the Implementation of the Apostolic Letter on Mixed Marriages," 10, CLD 7, 737.

[305] NCCB-CompNm, 17.

[306] NCCB-CompNm, 42. See Ecum Dir 154.

validity of the marriage. A public form is one that allows the fact of the marriage to be proved in the external forum. Dispensations from canonical form are usually granted to permit the celebration of the marriage in the church or place of worship of the non-Catholic party, but, especially in cases of marriages between Catholics and non-Christians, these dispensations can be granted to permit civil ceremonies. While the form required by the civil jurisdiction for the recognition of marriage would usually meet the criteria for a public form, "common law" marriages would not do so even where they are recognized by civil law.

Episcopal conferences are to issue norms to regulate the granting and registration of dispensations from canonical form. These norms can establish conditions which must be observed for the valid celebration of a mixed marriage pursuant to a dispensation. The local ordinary who grants the dispensation can also attach conditions that must be observed in the celebration of the marriage under pain of nullity. Thus, the local ordinary can require for validity that the marriage be celebrated on the date, in the place, and before the official mentioned in the petition for the dispensation.[307]

If a Catholic priest or deacon is present at a religious celebration of a mixed marriage after a dispensation from the canonical form, he may participate in the celebration at the invitation of the competent non-Catholic authority. He may offer words of greeting, prayers, or blessings or read scriptural lessons, but only at the invitation of the representative of the host church.[308]

Outside of situations of danger of death (c. 1079), the competence to dispense from the observance of canonical form for the marriage of two Catholics remains reserved to the Apostolic See.[309] There seems to be an openness on the part of the Holy See to grant these dispensations on behalf of recent converts to the Catholic Church when insistence on observance of canonical form would alienate them from their families and perhaps weaken their own commitment to the Church.[310]

Eastern Discipline

For Eastern Catholics, the blessing of the couple by the priest is an integral part of the celebration of marriage and, in ordinary circumstances, necessary for its validity. Thus, the authority to dispense Eastern Catholics from the obligation of observing canonical form or the sacred rite is "reserved to the Apostolic See or the patriarch, who will not grant it except for a most grave reason" (CCEO 835). In North America, dispensations from canonical form for the celebration of mixed marriages involving Latin Catholics have become relatively common. Especially where Eastern Catholics practice their faith in Latin churches, often due to a shortage of priests of their own church sui iuris, the expectation has arisen that dispensations from the canonical form will be granted to allow them to celebrate their marriages in the church of their non-Catholic fiancées. Out of sensitivity to the pastoral needs that arise because of this situation, the Congregation for the Eastern Churches has granted the apostolic pronuncio the faculty to dispense from canonical form for mixed marriages involving an Eastern Catholic.[311] Nevertheless, a most grave reason is still necessary for this dispensation to be granted.

Prohibition of Duplicate Ceremonies

§3. It is forbidden to have another religious celebration of the same marriage to give or renew matrimonial consent before or after the canonical celebration according to the norm of §1. Likewise, there is not to be a religious celebration in which the Catholic who is assisting and a non-Catholic minister together, using their own rites, ask for the consent of the parties.

[307] Com. Vat. II Interp., reply, April 9, 1979, CLD 9, 659.
[308] Ecum Dir 157.
[309] CodCom, reply, July 5, 1985, AAS 77 (1985) 771.
[310] SCSacr, reply, June 6, 1973, CLD 8, 818–820.
[311] Apostolic Pro-Nuncio, letter No. 5895/7, November 12, 1991 in RRAO 1992, 48–50.

When a mixed marriage is celebrated according to canonical form, another religious ceremony in which consent is exchanged or renewed is strictly forbidden either before or after the Catholic ceremony. Similarly, when a dispensation from canonical form is granted, a Catholic ceremony before or after the public celebration is prohibited. Duplicate ceremonies of this kind at least implicitly call into question the validity of the original celebration of the marriage. Also forbidden are religious services in which Catholic and non-Catholic ministers "co-officiate" and ask for and receive the consent of the spouses according to their respective liturgical books. However, the Holy See has been willing to permit two religious ceremonies for the marriage of a Catholic and an Orthodox communicant as long as consent was exchanged before a Catholic minister and the Orthodox priest confers the nuptial blessing with no new exchange of consent.[312]

This canon expressly prohibits only reduplication of religious ceremonies. Thus, it does not bar Catholics from observing the civil form prior to the religious ceremony in those places where the civil form is required for recognition of the marriage by the State.

Pastoral Care for Mixed Marriages

Canon 1128 — Local ordinaries and other pastors of souls are to take care that the Catholic spouse and the children born of a mixed marriage do not lack the spiritual help to fulfill their obligations and are to help spouses foster the unity of conjugal and family life.

Despite the Church's willingness to allow the faithful to enter into mixed marriages, it also recognizes the particular problems that couples in such marriages often encounter. Thus, the law reminds local ordinaries and pastors of their pastoral responsibility to assist these couples to transcend the tensions occasioned by their religious differences and to come to experience the mystery of unity that exists between Christ and the Church despite its divisions. Pastors should be particularly attentive to supporting and assisting the Catholic spouse to remain faithful to the commitments he or she made in the declaration and promises.

The responsibility of pastors toward couples in mixed marriages is a particular application of the general obligation of the Christian community to assist married couples to "lead holier and fuller lives in their family" (c. 1063, 4°). However, the special needs and problems of couples in mixed marriages may outstrip the resources of the Catholic community and its pastors. Thus, adequate pastoral care of mixed marriages will often require ecumenical cooperation.[313]

Application to Disparity-of-Cult Marriages

Canon 1129 — The prescripts of cann. 1127 and 1128 must be applied also to marriages which the impediment of disparity of cult mentioned in can. 1086, §1 impedes.

When a Catholic seeks to marry an unbaptized person, he or she must first secure a dispensation from the diriment impediment of disparity of cult. This dispensation can be granted only after the cautiones required by canon 1125 and further specified by episcopal conference norms have been made (c. 1086, §2). Since in marriages between Catholics and unbaptized persons the spouses do not share a common Christian faith, their religious differences and the tensions arising from them are likely to be more acute. Thus, particular attention must be given to safeguarding the [312] SCOf, reply of October 26, 1964 and SCDF reply of June 16, 1966, CLD 6, 22–23.

[313] Ecum Dir 147 suggests: "In fulfilling this responsibility, where the situation warrants it, positive steps should be taken, if possible, to establish contacts with the minister of the other Church or ecclesial Community, even if this may not always prove easy. In general, mutual consultation between Christian pastors for supporting such marriages and upholding their values can be a fruitful field of ecumenical collaboration."

faith of the Catholic and ensuring the handing on of the faith to children.

The norms governing the canonical and liturgical celebration of mixed marriages are to be applied to marriages involving the impediment of disparity of cult as well. If the canonical form is observed, the marriage can be celebrated in a Catholic church but always outside the Mass.[314] Dispensations from the obligation of observing canonical form can be granted under the same conditions as for mixed marriages.

CHAPTER VII[315]
MARRIAGE CELEBRATED SECRETLY
[cc. 1130–1133][316]

The Tridentine decree Tametsi aimed at eradicating clandestine marriages and their attendant social problems by requiring that henceforth only those marriages celebrated in the presence of the proper local ordinary or pastor and two witnesses would be considered valid. Where it was promulgated, Tametsi largely succeeded in its desired effect, but it gave rise to several new and unforeseen problems. One of these problems was the dilemma of couples who sincerely desired to marry and who often sought marriage to salve their consciences, but who feared there would be seriously negative repercussions if their marrying were to be publicly known. The oft cited example was the couple who had lived in concubinage for a long time and were universally thought to be married. On the one hand, if the couple remained as they were, they would still be "living in sin" and their children would remain canonically (and often civilly) illegitimate. On the other hand, if they married according to the canonical form, the publication of the banns and the public celebration of their marriage would highlight their irregular situation and so destroy their reputations in the community.[317]

In his encyclical Satis vobis of November 17, 1741, Benedict XIV enacted legislation for dealing with these awkward situations in a way that struck a delicate balance between the complete privacy characteristic of clandestine unions with its harm to the public good and the full publicity required by the Tridentine form with its possible harm to the private good.[318] The legislation of Benedict XIV created the new canonical institute of "marriage of conscience" (matrimonium conscientiae), which was incorporated largely unchanged into canons 1104–1107 of the 1917 code. This legislation is repeated with some minor emendations in the 1983 code under the more descriptive rubric of "Marriage Celebrated Secretly."

Justification for Secret Celebration of Marriage

Canon 1130 — For a grave and urgent cause, the local ordinary can permit a marriage to be celebrated secretly.

To understand the discipline governing the secret celebration of marriage, it is necessary to be clear about what these marriages are not. They are not clandestine marriages. Clandestine marriages are entered into with no public form and no public record of their celebration. They are, therefore, not subject to proof in the external forum. However, marriages secretly celebrated are entered into with the observance of canonical form, and a written record of them is kept. Therefore, their celebration can be proved, if this proof becomes necessary later.

Nor is a marriage celebrated secretly the sort of morganatic marriage once employed by Euro-

[314] Rite of Marriage, 8.

[315] See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 806–807; Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Einführung vor 1130/1–1133/1; Navarro Valls, in Pamplona ComEng, 715–716; and Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 638–639.

[316] See CCEO 840.

[317] For a more thorough discussion of these problems and the attempt to address them, see V. Coburn, Marriages of Conscience, CanLawStud 191 (Washington, D. C.: Catholic University of America, 1944).

[318] Benedict XIV, ency Satis vobis, November 17, 1741, CICFontes, n. 319.

pean nobility. A morganatic marriage is a marriage "of a man, of noble or illustrious birth, with a woman of inferior status, upon condition that neither the wife nor her children shall partake of the titles, arms, or dignity of the husband or succeed to his inheritance."[319] A marriage celebrated secretly entails equal obligations and rights of both spouses in all that pertains to the community of life (c. 1135).

A marriage celebrated secretly is not one celebrated in the internal forum. The Apostolic Penitentiary has occasionally granted radical sanations of marriages in the internal forum when it was impossible to prove the invalidity of the previous marriage of one of the spouses in the external forum.[320] In itself, an internal forum sanation does not allow the spouses to act in the external forum (e.g., receiving holy communion publicly), except to the extent that their situation is occult. Should their situation be made public, they are barred from acting in the external forum, if the sanation was granted in the internal sacramental forum or if there is no proof of the granting of the sanation in the internal non-sacramental forum.[321] However, the secret celebration of marriage takes place in the external forum in the presence of an authorized priest or deacon and two witnesses. If the fact of their marriage becomes public or their situation a source of scandal, the fact that it was celebrated secretly is also made public.

The local ordinary may permit the secret celebration of marriage. The 1917 code stipulated that the vicar general needed a special mandate to permit a secret celebration.[322] This stipulation has been omitted in the revised code. Nevertheless, the potential repercussions of a secret celebration of marriage, especially the possible conflicts between canon and civil law, suggest that a vicar general or episcopal vicar should not grant this permission without at least consulting with the diocesan bishop.

A grave and urgent cause is required to permit the secret celebration of marriage. The 1917 code had required a "most grave and most urgent" cause (gravissima et urgentissima causa).[323] This change in wording does not mean that permission for the secret celebration of marriage can be granted more lightly under the new legislation. The phrase "a most grave and most urgent cause," which appeared only once in the 1917 code, meant that the cause for maintaining secrecy was more than ordinarily grave and the celebration of marriage was a pressing necessity.[324]

The mere desire of the couple to keep their marriage secret is not sufficient to grant this permission. Commentators on the 1917 code suggested reasons that could justify permission for a secret celebration of marriage:

1. the couple had been living in concubinage and were generally believed to be already married;
2. the spouses were of radically unequal social status and their marriage would result in permanent alienation from family or disinheritance;
3. a widow would lose custody of her children or her inheritance or both as a result of remarriage;
4. a widow would lose the job on which she depended to support herself and her children;
5. the couple are barred from marriage by an unjust civil law (e.g., anti-miscegenation statutes).[325]

Even in these situations, the couple would have to have a compelling reason for marrying at this time rather than waiting until the situation changed.

[319] Black's Law Dictionary, s.v. "Marriage. Morganatic marriage."

[320] See ApPen, private reply, May 22, 1950, CLD 5, 712–713.

[321] See commentary on c. 1082.

[322] CIC 1104.

[323] Ibid.

[324] Coburn, 74.

[325] Ibid., 76–83; Cappello, De Matrimonio, n. 723; Wernz-Vidal, 5: n. 567.

At present, the most common reason why couples seek to celebrate marriage secretly is that, as a result of a public marriage, one of them (usually the woman) will lose government entitlements (e.g., Social Security survivors benefits, "welfare") on which she depends for sustenance.[326] The local ordinary may be sympathetic to the plight of couples who may suffer financial hardship as a result of a public marriage, but he should consider the possible consequences of permitting a secret celebration. This permission may render the local ordinary liable to a civil suit or criminal prosecution for conspiracy to defraud the government.

Laws providing for the cut-off of entitlements after marriage are not per se unjust. They are based on the presumption that the new spouse will provide for the dependent one. Nevertheless, these laws can work disproportionate hardship on couples whose income is marginal. Before permitting a secret celebration of marriage in such a case, the local ordinary should determine whether loss of entitlements would leave the couple indigent or only render their lifestyle somewhat less comfortable.

Implications of Secret Celebration

Canon 1131 — Permission to celebrate a marriage secretly entails the following:

1° the investigations which must be conducted before the marriage are done secretly;

2° the local ordinary, the one assisting, the witnesses, and the spouses observe secrecy about the marriage celebrated.

Permission for the secret celebration of a marriage does not exempt the assisting local ordinary or parish priest from the obligation of establishing the parties' freedom to marry through a pre-nuptial investigation. However, this investigation must be conducted secretly. After the marriage, the record of the pre-nuptial investigation is not to be retained in the archives of the parish where the marriage is celebrated. Instead, the pre-nuptial file should be destroyed after the marriage is properly recorded.[327]

Permission for the secret celebration of marriage also obliges the local ordinary, the assisting minister, the two other witnesses, and the spouses themselves to maintain secrecy about the event. All participating in a secret celebration must be informed of the seriousness of this obligation.

Cessation of the Obligation of Secrecy

Canon 1132 — The obligation of observing the secrecy mentioned in can. 1131, n. 2 ceases on the part of the local ordinary if grave scandal or grave harm to the holiness of marriage is imminent due to the observance of the secret; this is to be made known to the parties before the celebration of the marriage.

The obligation of maintaining secrecy binds the assisting minister (if he is distinct from the local ordinary) and the witnesses absolutely, but it binds the local ordinary only conditionally. The spouses themselves are always free by mutual agreement to make the fact of the marriage public. If maintaining secrecy about the celebration of a marriage threatens to provoke serious scandal or damage to the sanctity of marriage, the local ordinary is released from this obligation. The conditions that will release the local ordinary from his obligation of secrecy must be explained to the parties prior to the marriage.

To release the local ordinary from the obligation of secrecy, the harm to the sanctity of marriage must be grave; its existence or continuation must be facilitated by the secrecy; and it must be present or imminent.[328] Such harm to the sanctity of marriage could arise from one spouse's attempted public marriage with a third party. Scandal could also easily arise if the couple is widely known to be co-

[326] The same situation can arise when re-marriage will result in the loss of private benefits such as alimony, child support payments, or income from a deceased spouse's estate.

[327] Coburn, 127.

[328] Ibid., 114.

habiting and the Church's silence creates the impression that it approves of this activity.

Registration of Secret Celebrations

Canon 1133 — A marriage celebrated secretly is to be noted only in a special register to be kept in the secret archive of the curia.

Marriages celebrated secretly are not to be recorded in the parish where they took place. Nor are entries to be made in the baptismal registers of the places where the parties were christened. The marriage is to be recorded only in a special book maintained in the secret archives of the diocesan curia. Once this entry is made, all documentation related to the marriage should be destroyed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographical information for canons 1073–1133 can be found after the commentary on canon 1165.

Lynda A. Robitaille

CHAPTER VIII
THE EFFECTS OF MARRIAGE[1]
[cc. 1134–1140][2]

This chapter describes the effects of marriage, namely, the "bond that arises from the valid exchange of promises and the equal rights and duties that flow from the spouses' new status, especially concerning the education of children."[3] The canons describe the effects of the bond of marriage in the lives of the spouses (c. 1134), the equality of the spouses (c. 1135), and the obligations and rights of parents (c. 1136). The final canons in the chapter speak of the canonical understanding of the legitimacy of children (cc. 1137–1140).

The Marriage Bond

Canon 1134 — From a valid marriage there arises between the spouses a bond which by its nature is perpetual and exclusive. Moreover, a special sacrament strengthens and, as it were, consecrates the spouses in a Christian marriage for the duties and dignity of their state.

While the first sentence of this canon speaks of all marriages, natural and sacramental, the second sentence speaks only of sacramental marriages, i.e., those between two baptized persons. The canon speaks of the "bond" that arises from a valid marriage. By this bond, the partners become husband and wife in the relationship that is marriage. The bond is such that > in each partner a set of new obligations arises. The spouses, by committing themselves mutually to each other, give a new orientation to their own life.... A clearer and simpler way of conveying the same meaning would be to say that the spouses are bound to each other.[4]

This bond is "by its nature... perpetual and exclusive," which recalls the properties of marriage described in canon 1056. The properties in both natural and sacramental marriages are unity and indissolubility, but those properties are made firmer in a sacramental union.

The canon continues with its distinction between natural and sacramental unions: both are intrinsically good, but in a Christian marriage the spouses are strengthened to fulfill the duties of their state by the sacrament. Marriage, like the other sacraments, confers grace on those who receive the sacrament in a fruitful manner.[5]

The Mutual Obligations of the Spouses

Canon 1135 — Each spouse has an equal duty and right to those things which belong to the partnership of conjugal life.

The rights and obligations are equal for each spouse in marriage. These rights and obligations include family duties as well as the rights and obligations inherent in the interpersonal relationship of the spouses and their relations with their children. All these aspects are important, and neither party is ever a "lesser" partner in a marriage. "In spite of social and cultural inequalities which may be imposed from without, Christian marriage

[1] See T. Doyle, in CLSA Com, 807–811; R. Navarro Valls, in Pamplona ComEng, 716–718; D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 639–642.

[2] For the most part there is no equivalent to this section in the Eastern code. Only CCEO 777 in the introductory canons on marriage corresponds to c. 1135.

[3] L. Örsy, Marriage in Canon Law (Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier, 1986) 201.

[4] Ibid., 203.

[5] See commentary on c. 1065 for a discussion of the fruitful reception of the sacrament.

imposes equal obligations of the spouses toward one another."[6]

It is impossible to make a complete listing of the rights and obligations that the spouses have toward one another and to the marriage. As examples of such rights and obligations that have been determined by jurisprudence, Doyle lists "the right to heterosexual acts, . . . mutual respect and support, cohabitation, and an interpersonal relationship."[7] Canon 1095, 3° speaks of the essential rights and obligations of marriage. The basic expression of the essential rights and obligations is found in canons 1055 and 1056, which speak of the elements and properties of marriage: the good of the spouses, the procreation and education of children, and the properties of unity and indissolubility.[8] All rights and obligations can be traced back to these essentials and to the understanding that marriage is an interpersonal relationship, a partnership of the whole of life which involves the participation and contribution of both spouses.

Duties of Parents toward Children

Canon 1136 — Parents have the most grave duty and the primary right to take care as best they can for the physical, social, cultural, moral, and religious education of their offspring.

> Canon 1136 underscores the fact that the procreative purpose of marriage is not simply fulfilled in the act of procreation, but is completed in the education of offspring.[9]

Parents have the right and duty to provide for the education of their children. This education is to be physical, social, cultural, moral, and religious. The objective of such education is that the children not only become responsible Christians, but also responsible and contributing members of society. Thus, the parents are responsible for providing food, clothing, medical care, and appropriate living conditions for their children, as well as fostering their psychological and spiritual development. This care of the children begins at the moment of their conception. Children will live in society, and they should be prepared to do so. Their moral development is essential so that they can make informed moral choices as they get older. Religious education beginning with baptism (c. 867) is also in the first place the responsibility of the parents (cf. c. 226, §2). Religious education should bring the children to an adult, mature practice and understanding of their faith.[10]

Legitimacy of Children

Canon 1137 — The children conceived or born of a valid or putative marriage are legitimate.

Both civil and canon law speak of the legitimacy of children. This was especially important when being legitimate or illegitimate had consequences in the law. Although the 1983 code retains the norm on legitimacy, in fact, this norm has little or no practical consequence in the law today.

The canon speaks only of the legitimacy of children of valid or putative marriages. This means that children conceived or born of marriages that are known to be null would be considered illegitimate. This situation of illegitimacy is true if the nullity is due to the presence of a known diriment impediment, or if it is due to a lack of canonical form.[11] In the case of a declaration of nullity of marriage, the children conceived or born of that union while it was considered putative (c. 1061, §3) are considered to be legitimate. In the case of the dissolution of a marriage (cc. 1142–1150), the children conceived or born

[6] Doyle, in CLSA Com, 809.

[7] Ibid.

[8] For more on these essential rights and obligations, see commentary on cc. 1095 and 1055–1056.

[9] M. Foster, "The Promotion of the Canonical Rights of Children," CLSAP 59 (1997) 176.

[10] See also cc. 793; 796, §2; 890.

[11] A marriage is putative if it was celebrated in good faith by at least one of the parties (c. 1061, §3).

of that union prior to the dissolution also remain legitimate.

If an invalid marriage becomes valid through a sanation (sanatio in radice) (cc. 1161–1165), the sanation legitimizes the children conceived or born of that marriage (c. 1161, §2). In the case of a simple validation of a marriage (cc. 1156–1160), the children are legitimated from the time of the validation.

Presumptions Concerning Legitimacy

Canon 1138 — §1. The father is he whom a lawful marriage indicates unless clear evidence proves the contrary.

§2. Children born at least 180 days after the day when the marriage was celebrated or within 300 days from the day of the dissolution of conjugal life are presumed to be legitimate.

Normally, if a married woman gives birth to a child, her lawful husband is presumed to be the father (§1). That presumption may be proven incorrect, however, by clear arguments to the contrary, such as, for example, the fact that the couple have lived apart for more than ten months (300 days) before the baby's birth, etc.

Paragraph two speaks of approximate periods of gestation, from about six months to about ten months. With due regard for modern technology and the fact that children are being born and survive at ever earlier ages, this paragraph offers a reasonable definition of the limits of the rebuttable legal presumption for establishing the legitimacy of a child.

Legitimation of Children

Canon 1139 — Illegitimate children are legitimated by the subsequent valid or putative marriage of their parents or by a rescript of the Holy See.

There are two ways of legitimating illegitimate children (both those who are born to parents who are not married and those who are born to parents in an invalid union): through the marriage of their parents after their birth, or through a rescript of the Holy See in a case where the requirements of the previous two canons have not been fulfilled.[12] An example of the latter would be a case in which the parties could not marry because they were not free to do so (e.g., prior valid marriage of one party), yet they had children together. Then, by the time they were free to marry, one of the parties had died. In such a case, a rescript of legitimation could be requested.

Effects of Legitimation

Canon 1140 — As regards canonical effects, legitimated children are equal in all things to legitimate ones unless the law has expressly provided otherwise.

In the present code there are no effects caused by illegitimacy, unlike in the 1917 code where being illegitimate had certain negative implications, especially for those wishing to be priests, cardinals, abbots, and bishops (CIC 1363, §1; 232, §2, 1°; 320, §2; 331, §1, 1°). However, there may be some restrictions on persons who are illegitimate in particular law, proper law, or concordats. If there are no effects of illegitimacy in the code, why did the redactors choose to keep canons 1137–1140 in the code? Because, as they noted, > even though all the effects of illegitimacy have been removed from the universal law, the canons more appropriately remain since they can have application in particular law and, for another reason, they can highlight the sanctity of marriage in this way.[13]

[12] It should be noted, however, that such a rescript would not validate the invalid marriage of the parents.

[13] Comm 15 (1983) 240, as translated by J. Abbass, "Marriage in the Codes of Canon Law," Apol 68 (1995) 527.

John P. Beal

CHAPTER IX[1] THE SEPARATION OF SPOUSES [cc. 1141–1155][2]

Once legitimately exchanged, marital consent gives rise to a relationship that is, in principle, perpetual and beyond the power of the spouses themselves to revoke or alter. This relationship transcends the existential relationship of the spouses and can perdure even after the definitive breakdown of the latter. Traditional canonical terminology designates this relationship as "the bond" (vinculum). The conjugal bond entails the equal right and obligation of the spouses to "those things which belong to the partnership of conjugal life" (c. 1135). Among these things is the right to enjoy and the obligation to preserve conjugal cohabitation or the sharing of a common bed, table, and dwelling.

Despite the principle that the conjugal bond and its attendant rights and obligations are perpetual, church law recognizes that circumstances can and do arise which render the maintenance of conjugal life impossible or, at least, intolerable. In some circumstances, the bond itself can be dissolved or dispensed.[3] These circumstances are regulated by canons 1141–1150. In other circumstances, the law allows the spouses to cease their common life and relieves them of many of their spousal obligations but without the freedom to enter a new marriage. Separations of this kind are regulated by canons 1151–1155.

ARTICLE 1: DISSOLUTION OF THE BOND [cc. 1141–1150]

Historical Synopsis

Patristic Era

Fidelity to the teaching of Jesus as it is handed down in the synoptic tradition[4] prompted the early Church to reject the rather permissive attitude toward divorce enshrined in Roman law[5] and to treat remarriage after a divorce as a grave sin. With the notable exception of the anonymous author known as Ambrosiaster,[6] all patristic authors taught the immorality of remarriage after a divorce even when the divorce was occasioned by the other spouse's adultery.[7] While the teaching of the Fathers is clear and consistent, it is less clear that ecclesial practice was equally consistent.

[1] See T. Doyle, in CLSA Com, 811–822; K. Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Einführung vor 1141/1–1155/1; J. Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 719–726; and D. Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 642–653.

[2] CCEO 853–866.

[3] Although most canonists speak of the "dissolution" of the bond of marriage in certain circumstances, the law itself regularly uses the term "dispensation" rather than "dissolution" to refer to the situation in which spouses are allowed to enter a new marriage after a sacramental marriage that was not consummated. See cc. 1697; 1698; 1699, §1; 1704; and 1706. The same preference for "dispensation" over "dissolution" was found in the 1917 code's canons 1119, 1962, 1963, and 1973 and the rubric of chapter 3 of title XX of Book IV, De processibus. This usage suggests that "dispensation from the obligations of a marriage" may be a more accurate description than "dissolution of the bond" of what happens when a person is permitted to enter a new marriage after a valid but failed marriage.

[4] Mk 10:9, 11–12; Mt 5:32, 19:9; Lk 16:18; as well as 1 Cor 7:10–11. See R. Collins, Divorce in the New Testament (Collegeville: Liturgical, 1992).

[5] See S. Treggiari, Roman Marriage (Oxford: Clarendon, 1993) 435–482.

[6] Ambrosiaster, Ad Corinthios prima 7:11, Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum (CSEL) 81, 2:75.

[7] See H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce (Paris: Beauchesne, 1971); and A. Bevilacqua, "The History of the Indissolubility of Marriage," CTSAP 22 (1972) 253–308.

At least by the time of Cyprian in the mid-third century, adultery was ranked among the deadly sins to be submitted to the Church's penitential discipline. Since the gospels equate remarriage after divorce with adultery, the question of the ecclesial status of Christians who had divorced and remarried in accord with Roman law could not be avoided. The extant sources do not clearly indicate how the Church dealt with divorced Christians during the first four centuries, and it may be that practice differed from church to church. However, scattered ecclesiastical texts and new divorce legislation of the Christian emperors suggest that, in many places at least, the practice was to excommunicate or bar from the eucharistic table those who remarried after a divorce and to subject them to a period of penance which could last several years. At the end of this period, they were reconciled to the Church but not necessarily required to separate.[8]

This somewhat lenient practice of concession and toleration continued in the East. However, it was displaced in the West during the fourth and early fifth centuries by a more rigorist practice which was crystallized in the writings of Jerome and especially Augustine. Augustine's meditation on the New Testament led him to the conclusion that, if remarriage after divorce constituted adultery, then some residue of marriage (quiddam coniugale) must survive the de facto and de iure disintegration of the social fact of marriage.[9] This "marital something" was "the bond" (vinculum) whose perdurance even after divorce precluded the establishment of another marriage. In this way, Augustine quietly moved the prohibition of divorce beyond the realm of morality into the realm of ontology: remarriage after a divorce was not only forbidden but impossible as long as the original spouse was alive.[10]

Middle Ages

The Augustinian position, which triumphed in the West, enabled the Church to judge not only whether a marriage was morally legitimate but also whether it was valid. No matter what their status in secular law, only marriages in conformity with divine law could be considered valid. Although it took the Church centuries to elaborate the implications of Augustine's heritage,[11] the principle was established that the bond of marriage between Christians could be sundered only by death and was, therefore, indissoluble.

The emergence of this doctrine of indissolubility required that the Church clearly identify those unions that it would recognize as marriages. The patristic Church absorbed the Roman law principle that the consent of the parties with marital affection (affectio maritalis) established marriage. "Marital affection" was a rather slippery standard[12] that did not always make clear which unions were legitimate marriages and which mere concubinages. However, Roman law and societal conventions provided a framework for distinguishing concretely between a marriage which was binding until death and a concubinage which was, in principle, dissoluble.[13]

Determining who was truly married was complicated by the influx of Germanic peoples and the collapse of the Roman Empire in the West.

[8] G. Cereti, "The Reconciliation of Remarried Divorcees according to Canon 8 of the Council of Nicea," in Ius Sequitur Vitam, ed. J. Provost and K. Walf (Louvain: Leuven University, 1991) 193–207. For a fuller presentation of this position, see G. Cereti, Divorzio, nuove nozze et penitenza nella Chiesa primitiva (Bologna: Dehoniane, 1977). See also J. Noonan, "Novel 22," in The Bond of Marriage, ed. W. Bassett (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame, 1968) 41–96.

[9] De nupt. et conc. 1,11, CSEL 42, 223.

[10] P. L. Reynolds, Marriage in the Western Church (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994) 149–152, 280–311.

[11] See C. Lefebvre, "L'évolution de l'action de nullité," RDC 26 (1976) 25; and J. Gaudemet, "Le lien matrimoniale," RDC 21 (1971) 81–105.

[12] J. Noonan, "Marital Affection in the Canonists," Studia Gratiana 12 (1975) 479–509.

[13] See Reynolds, 159–169; and J. Brundage, Law, Sex and Christian Society in Medieval Europe (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1987) 98–103.

The laws and customs of many of these peoples attributed considerably greater significance than had Roman law to physical consummation and the role of families in the establishment of marriage. The resulting cultural clash crystallized in the dispute between the school of Bologna (Gratian) and the school of Paris (Peter Lombard).

The school of Bologna taught that marriage was initiated (coniugium initiatum) by the consent at the time of the betrothal but that it was not completed until it had been ratified by an act of sexual intercourse (coniugium consummatum or ratum).[14] As a result, a consummated marriage was indissoluble, but one initiated by consent could be dissolved prior to consummation because it still lacked firmness. The school of Paris distinguished clearly between engagement or betrothal (verba de futuro) and marriage consent itself (verba de praesenti). The latter was necessary and sufficient to establish an indissoluble marriage whether or not it was subsequently consummated by sexual intercourse.

The dispute between the schools, which reflected the deeper conflict of cultures, was resolved by Pope Alexander III (1159–1181) and his successors. In a series of decretals, these popes held that consent alone was sufficient to establish a true and valid sacramental marriage that was indissoluble in principle. However, prior to consummation, this marriage could be dissolved or dispensed by solemn religious profession on the part of one of the spouses or, for a proportionate cause, by the intervention of ecclesiastical authority. Thus, only after consummation was a marriage indissoluble in fact.

Pauline Privilege

The teaching on indissolubility was further qualified by the medieval development and juridicization of the Pauline privilege. While patristic authors conceded that Jews and pagans married legitimately, they showed little interest in the status of the unions of unbelievers who divorced and remarried. However, the prevailing view, again enunciated clearly by Augustine, was that Christian spouses of unbelievers, whether they were Christians at the time of the marriage or subsequent converts, could separate from their unbelieving spouses but could not remarry.[15] However, by the early Middle Ages most authors followed the position of Ambrosiaster who understood Paul's concession in 1 Corinthians 7:12–15 as allowing the newly converted spouse to remarry if the unbelieving spouse departed.[16] This position was enshrined in church law in the decretals of Innocent III.[17]

Three constitutions by sixteenth century popes extended the provisions of the Pauline privilege to polygamous situations encountered by missionaries in the Americas.[18] Although the limited concessions contained in the constitutions were originally given only as special faculties for missionaries in particular regions, canon 1125 of the 1917 code extended them to all countries where the same conditions existed. Following the promulgation of the 1917 code, Pius XI and his successors moved beyond the traditional framework of the Pauline privilege to dissolve in favor of the faith marriages involving at least one unbaptized person after a conversion to the Catholic Church and eventually without a conversion in favor of the faith of a new Catholic spouse.[19]

[14] C. 27, q. 2; Dictum post C. 29, q.1.

[15] Augustine, De sermone Domini in monte, Corpus Christianorum Series Latina 35: 1.16.48.

[16] Ambrosiaster, Ad Corinthios prima 7:13, PL 17:219.

[17] See c. 7, X, de divortiis, iv, 19 and c. 8, X, de divortiis, iv, 19. For a history of the development of this institute, see J. Noonan, Power to Dissolve (Cambridge: Belknap, 1972) 341–347; and D. Gregory, The Pauline Privilege, CanLawStud 68 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1931) 12–36.

[18] Paul III's constitution Altitudo of June 1, 1537, Pius V's constitution Romani Pontificis of August 2, 1571, and Gregory XIII's constitution Populis of January 25, 1585 were first published as appendices to the 1917 code.

[19] See Noonan, The Power to Dissolve, 366–392.

The Notion of Indissolubility

The gradual expansion of the classes of marriages that are susceptible to dissolution or dispensation has necessitated a somewhat nuanced approach to indissolubility. Traditional authors distinguish between intrinsic and extrinsic indissolubility. All marriages, whether they involve baptized persons or not, are intrinsically indissoluble in that they cannot be dissolved by the will of the parties. However, not all marriages are extrinsically indissoluble, since they can sometimes be dissolved either by the intervention of competent ecclesiastical authority or by the realization of conditions specified in law.[20]

A. THE PRINCIPLE

Canon 1141 — A marriage that is ratum et consummatum can be dissolved by no human power and by no cause, except death.

A ratum or ratified marriage is a valid marriage between two baptized persons, whether Catholic or not (c. 1061, §1). The Eastern code, which generally eschews the technical Latin vocabulary for types of marriages, speaks simply of the "sacramental bond of marriage" (CCEO 853). Marriages of this kind are intrinsically indissoluble. However, these marriages are also extrinsically indissoluble if they have been consummated by an act of sexual intercourse (c. 1061, §1). The extrinsic indissolubility of ratified and consummated marriages means that they "can be dissolved by no human power and by no cause, except death."

The slow evolution of the Church's practice of dissolving, or acknowledging the dissolution, of various types of marriages has left the category of ratum et consummatum marriages as the only one that is both intrinsically and extrinsically indissoluble. The power to dissolve marriages that are ratified but not consummated and non-sacramental marriages "in favor of the faith" has been explained as one by which "God dissolves [the bond] and thus allows a party to pass licitly to a new marriage" through the vicarious action of the Roman Pontiff.[21] If this explanation is correct, the power in virtue of which the Roman Pontiff dissolves marriages is not a merely human power.[22] Consequently, there have been periodic suggestions that the Roman Pontiff's vicarious power could, in certain circumstances, extend to ratified and consummated marriages, but that the Church has never found it opportune to exercise this power.[23] This opinion has never gained a wide following. However, the fact that it resurfaces periodically indicates that the theological basis for the Roman Pontiff's power to dissolve some marriages has not yet been adequately articulated.

The assertion that a ratified and consummated marriage can be dissolved "by no human power and by no cause, except death [praeterquam morte]" suggests that death does dissolve the matrimonial bond. The death of one spouse certainly frees the surviving spouse to enter a new marriage. Although many patristic authors viewed remarriage after the death of a spouse as a sign of weakness and lack of self-control, the early Church did permit widows and widowers at least one remarriage by way of concession. Nonetheless, they were often subjected to a period of penance.[24]

[20] F. Cappello, De Matrimonio (Rome: Marietti, 1961) n. 45.

[21] Pius XII, "Address to the Rota," October 3, 1941, AAS 33 (1941) 426; CLD 2, 458. See also Paul VI, EM V, CLD 6, 397: "... but not the divine laws, natural or positive, from which the Supreme Pontiff alone, using his vicarious power, can dispense...."

[22] See Cappello, n. 762.

[23] See W. O'Connor, "The Indissolubility of a Ratified, Consummated Marriage," Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 13 (1936) 692–722; and J. Gerhartz, "L'indissolubilité du mariage et sa dissolution par l'Église dans la problématique actuelle," RDC 21 (1971) 198–234.

[24] See, for example, Council of Laodicea, c. 1, Mansi 2: 563–564; Basil of Caesarea, Epistola 188, 4, PG 32: 673–674. For a survey of patristic views on the remarriage of widows and widowers see, L. Godefroy, "Mariage dans les Pères: Les secondes noces," Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique 9–2: 2096–2101.

The view that death actually dissolves the matrimonial bond finds support in Jesus' rejoinder to the Sadducees: "When people rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage but live like the angels in heaven."[25] However, the Orthodox tradition has long maintained that "marriage is not dissolved by the death of one of the partners, but creates between them—if they so wish and if 'it is given to them' (Matthew 19: 11)—an eternal bond."[26] Because remarriage falls short of the ideal, the Orthodox liturgy for the second marriages of those whose spouses have died (as well as those who have divorced) has a profoundly penitential character.[27] This perspective in which "human decision and action acquire an eternal dimension"[28] resonates better with the experience of couples who hope that "as they come together to [the Lord's] table on earth, so they may one day have the joy of sharing [his] feast in heaven"[29] than does the position that implicitly holds that death is stronger than love.

B. THE EXCEPTIONS

1) Dissolution of a Ratified but Non-consummated Marriage

Canon 1142 — For a just cause, the Roman Pontiff can dissolve a non-consummated marriage between baptized persons or between a baptized party and a non-baptized party at the request of both parties or of one of them, even if the other party is unwilling.

A valid marriage between two baptized persons or between a baptized and an unbaptized person can be dissolved if it has not been consummated by an act of sexual intercourse performed in a human manner.[30] The dissolution is effected only by the personal intervention of the Roman Pontiff. Canon 1119 of the 1917 code had retained the traditional provision that solemn religious profession dissolved a ratified but unconsummated marriage by the law itself. This provision has been deleted from the 1983 code in part because of the absence of a procedure for verifying the fact of non-consummation.

Conditions for Dissolution

A ratified but unconsummated marriage can be dissolved at the request of both spouses or at the request of one of them even if the other objects. In either case, there must be a just cause for the dissolution. The following are generally considered just causes: discord in the marriage without hope of reconciliation; civil remarriage by one of the parties after a divorce; civil divorce with danger of incontinence to the innocent party; probable impotence with danger of incontinence; an incurable disease contracted after the marriage; and partial proof of defect of consent.[31] When a just cause is absent, the dissolution is invalid.[32] The Roman Pontiff does not dissolve unconsummated sacramental marriages without a petition from at least one spouse.[33]

The Notion of Consummation

A sacramental marriage is considered to have been consummated when [25] Mt 22:30; Mk 12:25; Lk 20:34–35.

[26] J. Meyendorf, Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective (Crestwood, N.Y.: St. Vladimir Seminary, 1975) 42–43.

[27] Ibid., 33–34.

[28] Ibid., 26.

[29] Rite of Marriage, 33.

[30] In the present discipline, the marriages of the unbaptized, whether consummated or not, can be dissolved by the Roman Pontiff in favor of the faith.

[31] B. Marchetta, Scioglimento del matrimonio canonico per inconsummazione (Padua: Antonio Milani, 1981) 17–18; and W. Woestman, Special Marriage Cases (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1992) 21–22.

[32] Cappello, n. 762.

[33] The procedure to be observed in preparing a case for dissolution is discussed in cc. 1697–1706 and SCSacr, littcirc "De processu super matrimonio rato et non consummato," December 20, 1986, ME 112 (1987) 423–429. An English translation of the circular letter appears in Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 119–126.

> the spouses have performed between themselves in a human fashion a conjugal act which is suitable in itself for the procreation of offspring, to which marriage is ordered by its nature and by which the spouses become one flesh. (c. 1061, §1)

The marriage can be consummated only after it has become ratified by the legitimate manifestation of consent by the spouses. Thus, if a couple engaged in sexual relations prior to marriage, their subsequent exchange of consent does not of itself give rise to a consummated marriage. According to traditional canonical doctrine, the conjugal act that consummates a marriage requires that the man's penis penetrate the woman's vagina at least partially and deposit semen in the vagina. Often, the failure to consummate the marriage is the result of impotence on the part of one spouse. However, it can also result from the conscious intent of the parties. Thus, a marriage is not consummated by coitus interruptus, by intercourse with the use of a condom or vaginal sheath, or by artificial insemination.[34]

Consummation "in a Human Manner"

The conjugal act which consummates a marriage must be performed in a human fashion (humano modo). The precise determination of what constitutes sexual relations in a human fashion will have to developed gradually in the jurisprudence of the Congregation for the Sacraments.[35] However, it is already clear that, in order to effect the consummation of a marriage, the conjugal act must be a human and voluntary act. That is, > for a marriage to be consummated it is necessary that there be a human act on the part of both spouses; it is sufficient for it to be virtually voluntary, provided that it was not extorted through violence. No weight is given to other psychological elements which render the act easier or more loving.[36]

Thus, true consummation does not result from sexual acts performed as a result of physical or moral violence that deprives a spouse of his or her freedom. Nor is a marriage consummated by a sexual act performed on a person who is asleep or unconscious because of the influence of drugs or alcohol. However, the use of drugs, alcohol, or aphrodisiacs does not impede consummation if the person under their influence had previously consented to the sexual act.[37]

Suggestions of a Broader Notion of Consummation

The significance of the conjugal act by which a sacramental marriage is consummated was suggested in the conciliar pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes:

> Married love is uniquely expressed and perfected by the exercise of the acts proper to marriage. Hence the acts in marriage by which the intimate and chaste union of the spouses takes place are noble and honorable; the truly human performance of these acts fosters the self-giving they signify and enriches the spouses in joy and gratitude.[38]

Despite the antiquity of the tradition that a marriage is consummated and thereby rendered extrinsically indissoluble by the initial act of sexual intercourse by the spouses, some have argued that the personalist theology of marriage introduced by Vatican II requires a broadening of the definition of consummation.

They suggest that a more adequate definition of consummation would include not only the [34] Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 19.

[35] See P. Jugis, A Canonical Analysis of the Meaning of Humano Modo in Canon 1061, §1, CanLawStud 541 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1993).

[36] SCSac, circular letter, December 20, 1986. English translation in Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 119–126.

[37] SCOf, response, February 2, 1949, CLD 3, 473–474.

[38] GS 49.

spouses' physical union but also their existential and spiritual union.[39] Nevertheless, proposals of this kind had no discernible impact on the drafting of the current law. However, the possibility of a more existential understanding of consummation cannot be precluded. The International Theological Commission has conceded that it cannot "be excluded that the Church can further define the concepts of sacramentality and consummation by explaining them even better, so that she can present the whole doctrine on indissolubility in a deeper and more precise way."[40] Commenting on this thesis, Philippe Delhaye, then secretary of the commission, observed:

> As we learn more about the way in which the conjugal bond comes to be constituted, the consummation theory of medieval canonists may well turn out to be too inadequate to be tenable any longer. According to this theory, marriage is consummated by one act of sexual intercourse, no more, no less. However, no one has yet elaborated another acceptable theory.[41]

2) Dissolution by the Pauline Privilege

Canon 1143 — §1. A marriage entered into by two non-baptized persons is dissolved by means of the pauline privilege in favor of the faith of the party who has received baptism by the very fact that a new marriage is contracted by the same party, provided that the non-baptized party departs.

While addressing a series of pastoral problems raised by the Church in Corinth, Paul dealt with the situation of believers married to unbelievers. Lacking a solution from what "the Lord has said," Paul offered his own recommendation:

> If any brother has a wife who is an unbeliever and she is willing to go on living with him, he should not divorce her; and if any woman has a husband who is an unbeliever, and he is willing to go on living with her, she should not divorce her husband.... If the unbeliever separates, however, let him separate. The brother or sister is not bound in such cases. God has called you to peace.[42]

By the twelfth century, this pastoral solution emerged in a highly juridicized form as the Pauline privilege, which authorized a newly baptized Christian to enter a new marriage after a divorce from his or her unbaptized first spouse under certain conditions.

Conditions for the Application of the Pauline Privilege

The essential conditions for the application of the Pauline privilege are:

(a) a marriage entered into by two unbaptized persons;
(b) the subsequent baptism of one and only one of the spouses; and
(c) the "departure" of the still unbaptized spouse.

If all three of these conditions are met, the newly baptized spouse may enter a new marriage. The original marriage bond is dissolved not by the intervention of ecclesiastical authority as in the case of a ratified but unconsummated marriage, but by [39] J. Bernhard, "Réinterpretation existentielle et dans la foi de la legislation canonique concernant l'indissolubilité du mariage chrétien," RDC 21 (1971) 243–277; and idem, "Perspectives renouvellées de la 'consommation existentielle et dans la foi' du mariage chrétien," RDC 24 (1974) 334–349. For a sympathetic but critical treatment of this approach, see O. Fumagalli Carulli, "Innovazioni conciliari e matrimonio canonico," Il Diritto Ecclesiastico 89 (1978) 331–425.

[40] International Theological Commission, "Propositions on the Doctrine of Christian Marriage," 4.4., in Origins 8 (1978–1979) 238.

[41] P. Delhaye, "Propositions on the Doctrine of Christian Marriage: Introduction and Commentary," in Contemporary Perspectives on Christian Marriage, ed. R. Malone and J. Connery (Chicago: Loyola University, 1984) 30.

[42] 1 Cor 7:12–13, 15 (NAB).

the second marriage. The only role of ecclesiastical authority in the operation of the Pauline privilege is to verify that the conditions for its application have been met.

The sequence in which the baptism of the one spouse and the departure of the other occur is not of critical importance. Thus, whether the departure of the unbaptized party occurs before or after the baptism of the other spouse, the newly baptized party may use the privilege. Nor must the unbaptized spouse's departure be prompted by the other's actual or intended baptism. Baptism in the Catholic Church is not necessary for the Pauline privilege to be applicable; valid baptism in any Christian church or ecclesial community is sufficient.[43]

Departure of the Unbaptized Spouse

§2. The non-baptized party is considered to depart if he or she does not wish to cohabit with the baptized party or to cohabit peacefully without affront to the Creator unless the baptized party, after baptism was received, has given the other a just cause for departing.

The unbaptized spouse is considered to have departed when he or she either refuses to continue conjugal cohabitation with the baptized party or is willing to continue cohabitation but not "peacefully without affront to the Creator [sine contumelia Creatoris]." "Departure" does not necessarily mean that the unbaptized spouse takes the initiative to effect a physical separation. The unbaptized spouse is also considered to have departed if he or she made the common life so physically or morally intolerable that the baptized party initiated a separation. When the baptized spouse (or the spouse to be baptized) has initiated a separation for any of the grounds mentioned in canons 1152–1153,[44] the unbaptized spouse is deemed to have refused to cohabit peacefully (pacifice) and, therefore, to have "departed."

The expression "affront to the Creator," which has been in ecclesiastical usage at least since Ambrosiaster in the fourth century, refers to a situation in which the unbaptized spouse's manner of living threatens the neophyte spouse's ability to live out the obligations of the Christian life. When the unbaptized spouse interferes with the neophyte's practice of the Christian faith, refuses to allow the Christian education of their children, or insists on engaging in immoral sexual activity, he or she is considered to have refused to cohabit "without affront to the Creator." Thus, in such cases, the unbaptized spouse is deemed to have departed.

The nature of the unbaptized spouse's motives for departing does not affect the availability of the Pauline privilege to the other spouse, unless his or her behavior after baptism has given the unbaptized spouse just cause for departing. Thus, a spouse who after his or her baptism commits adultery or unjustly deserts the unbaptized spouse cannot use the Pauline privilege. However, if the behavior that led to the failure of the marriage occurred before the spouse was baptized, this fault does not impede his or her use of the Pauline privilege "since it has been blotted out by the bath of regeneration."[45]

The Interpellations

Canon 1144 — §1. For the baptized party to contract a new marriage validly, the non-baptized party must always be interrogated whether:
1° he or she also wishes to receive baptism;
2° he or she at least wishes to cohabit peacefully with the baptized party without affront to the Creator.

Although the fact that a marriage occurred when both parties were still unbaptized and the fact that one of them subsequently received baptism can often be established without great difficulty, it is not always clear whether the unbaptized spouse "departed" as defined in canon 1143, [43] CDF, reply, August 30, 1976, CLD 8, 837–840.

[44] See the commentary on cc. 1152–1153.
[45] Cappello, n. 770.

§2. Consequently, before the newly baptized spouse celebrates a new marriage in virtue of the Pauline privilege, the still unbaptized spouse must be interrogated to establish the fact of his or her departure. This interrogation, designated in canonical terminology as "the interpellations," attempts to determine whether the unbaptized spouse has departed or not. Toward this end, he or she is to be asked: (a) whether he or she also wishes to receive baptism and (b) whether he or she wishes at least to cohabit peacefully with the other party without affront to the Creator.

Possible Responses to the Interpellations

The unbaptized spouse's responses to these two questions determine whether ecclesiastical authority will permit the other spouse to use the Pauline privilege to enter a new marriage. The unbaptized spouse's responses to the interpellations can take several forms.[46]

(a) If the unbaptized spouse responds negatively to both questions, he or she is considered to have departed and the now baptized spouse may enter a new marriage as long as his or her own post-baptismal conduct has not given the unbaptized spouse cause to depart.

(b) If the unbaptized spouse responds affirmatively to both questions, the baptized spouse may not enter a new marriage. Even if it was the fault of the unbaptized spouse that resulted in the couple's separation, the baptized spouse should be urged to reconcile with him or her since the unbaptized spouse's baptism will remit the sin. At most, the baptized spouse can be allowed to remain separated but without the possibility of remarriage. However, if the unbaptized spouse sincerely responds affirmatively to the interpellations but it is de facto impossible to restore conjugal cohabitation because of distance, confinement, or some other circumstance, he or she is considered to have departed, and the other spouse may enter a new marriage after baptism.[47]

(c) If the unbaptized responds that he or she wishes to be baptized but not to cohabit peacefully with the baptized spouse, careful consideration must be given to his or her refusal to resume cohabitation. If the refusal is for reasons, legitimate or illegitimate, unrelated to any culpable conduct on the part of the baptized spouse, the latter may enter a new marriage. If the unbaptized spouse's refusal results from the other spouse's illegitimate post-baptismal conduct, the latter is not permitted to enter a new marriage. However, if the convert's pre-baptismal conduct prompts the unbaptized spouse's refusal to renew cohabitation, the convert may enter a new marriage if pastoral efforts to effect a reconciliation of the spouses prove fruitless. In these cases, care should be taken to ensure that the convert enters a new marriage before the other spouse is baptized.[48] Otherwise, the baptism of the other spouse will make the marriage ratified but not consummated and, therefore, one to which the Pauline privilege is not applicable.

[46] Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 43, and Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 645, hold that only if the unbaptized spouse gives negative responses to both questions can the other spouse be permitted to enter a new marriage. This position fails to take into account the complexity of the issue and the long-standing CDF practice in dealing with Pauline privilege cases.

[47] E. Woeber, The Interpellations, CanLawStud 172 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1942) 85–87.

[48] Ibid., 89. Some authors have suggested that a desire to be baptized is inconsistent with a refusal to reconcile and live at peace with an estranged spouse. They suggest that such a mixed response to the interpellations may indicate insincerity on the part of the unbaptized spouse. If a lack of sincerity can be established, the unbaptized spouse's affirmative response is to be interpreted as actually negative and the convert permitted a new marriage. See D. Gregory, The Pauline Privilege, CanLawStud 68 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1931) 75; and A. Abate, The Dissolution of the Matrimonial Bond (Rome: Desclée, 1962) 75.

d) If the unbaptized spouse does not wish to be baptized but sincerely desires to resume or continue peaceful cohabitation with the convert, the latter may not enter a new marriage. Authors as distinguished as Sanchez have argued that, since cohabitation with an unbeliever always constitutes a proximate danger of lapsing from the faith for a convert, the refusal of the unbaptized spouse to receive baptism is sufficient cause for the other spouse to separate and enter a new marriage.[49] This position has not, however, become the basis for ecclesial praxis.[50] Nevertheless, the baptized spouse who continues or renews a common life with an unbaptized spouse who has promised to cohabit peacefully does not forfeit the right to separate from the latter and enter a new marriage should the unbaptized spouse subsequently break this promise.

Timing of the Interpellations

§2. This interrogation must be done after baptism. For a grave cause, however, the local ordinary can permit the interrogation to be done before baptism or can even dispense from the interrogation either before or after baptism provided that it is evident at least by a summary and extrajudicial process that it cannot be done or would be useless.

Since the purpose of the interpellations is to establish the fact of the unbaptized spouse's departure, they are normally to take place only after the baptism of the other spouse. Only then is he or she eligible to use the Pauline privilege. Nevertheless, the local ordinary can permit the interpellations to be made before the catechumen's baptism if there is a serious reason for doing so. For example, the catechumen may have already entered a civil marriage with a Catholic and it is desirable to convalidate this union as soon as possible after his or her baptism. The unbaptized spouse is usually questioned early in the process to establish the fact of his or her non-baptism. Making the interpellations at the same time as this preliminary inquiry can prevent the unbaptized spouse from feeling badgered by the Catholic Church because of repeated interrogations and avert the danger that he or she will be unavailable or uncooperative later after the other spouse's baptism.

Dispensation from the Interpellations

The local ordinary can now dispense from the interpellations if conducting them would be impossible or useless. This dispensing power, which the 1917 code had reserved to the Apostolic See,[51] can be delegated without restriction (c. 137).[52] The dispensation can be from the obligation of asking either or both of the questions that constitute the interpellations. Before dispensing from the interpellations, the local ordinary or his delegate must conduct a brief and informal investigation to verify the impossibility or uselessness of making the interpellations. Making the interpellations is useless if it is clear from other sources that the unbaptized spouse's responses to one or both questions will be negative. The interpellations can also be dispensed when making them would harm the newly baptized spouse or the children of the marriage.[53]

Manner of Making the Interpellations

Canon 1145 — §1. The interrogation is regularly to be done on the authority of the local ordinary of the converted party. This ordinary must grant [49] T. Sanchez, De Matrimonio, lib. vii, disp. lxxiv, n. 9.

[50] Woeber, 91–93.

[51] CIC 1121, §2.
[52] In 1963, the mp Pastorale munus I, 23, granted diocesan bishops the faculty to dispense from the interpellations. However, this faculty could be delegated only to coadjutor and auxiliary bishops and vicars general. See CLD 6, 371. Diocesan bishops in the United States were subsequently authorized to delegate this faculty to their chancellors, but not to their vice chancellors. See CLD 6, 385 and 380.
[53] SCOf, reply, July 2, 1965, CLD 6, 387.

the other spouse a period of time to respond if the spouse seeks it, after having been advised, however, that his or her silence will be considered a negative response if the period passes without effect.

§2. Even an interrogation made privately by the converted party is valid and indeed licit if the form prescribed above cannot be observed.

§3. In either case, the fact that the interrogation was done and its outcome must be established legitimately in the external forum.

The interpellations are normally to be made by the authority of the local ordinary of the spouse who has been or is about to be baptized. If the unbaptized spouse requests a reasonable period of time to consider his or her answers to the interpellations, it is to be granted. However, the unbaptized spouse is to be notified that, if the period elapses without any answer to the interpellations, his or her response will be presumed to be negative.

The local ordinary can conduct this interrogation personally or through a delegate. The interpellations can even be made privately by the converted party himself or herself. Interpellations made privately are always valid; this method is also lawful if they cannot be made in the usual public way. In either case, however, there should be a written record of the fact that the interpellations took place and of their result so that there is proof for the external forum.

Right to Remarry

Canon 1146 — The baptized party has the right to contract a new marriage with a Catholic party:

1° if the other party responded negatively to the interrogation or if the interrogation had been omitted legitimately;

2° if the non-baptized party, already interrogated or not, at first persevered in peaceful cohabitation without affront to the Creator but then departed without a just cause, without prejudice to the prescripts of cann. 1144 and 1145.

Although ecclesiastical usage has long referred to a dissolution of this kind as a "privilege," the law asserts the right (ius) of the baptized party to enter a new marriage with a Catholic if the unbaptized party responds negatively to the interpellations or the interpellations are legitimately omitted. The baptized spouse does not forfeit this right to a new marriage by continuing cohabitation with the unbaptized spouse. No matter how long the cohabitation continues, the baptized spouse retains the right to a new marriage if the unbaptized spouse later departs without just cause as long as the latter has not been baptized in the meantime. Before the baptized spouse exercises this right, however, the interpellations must be conducted.

Since the new marriage of the baptized party dissolves the bond of the original marriage, this new marriage leaves the unbaptized party free to remarry. Thus, the unbaptized party may enter a new marriage or convalidate a civil union with a Catholic after a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship has been granted. A new marriage by the unbaptized spouse with a non-Catholic, whether baptized or not, is to be presumed valid if it was entered into after the baptized spouse's new marriage. However, if it was entered into prior to the baptized spouse's remarriage, it is invalid because of the impediment of prior bond.

Possibility of a Mixed Marriage

Canon 1147 — For a grave cause, however, the local ordinary can allow a baptized party who uses the pauline privilege to contract marriage with a non-Catholic party, whether baptized or not baptized; the prescripts of the canons about mixed marriages are also to be observed.

Since in the Pauline privilege the bond of the original marriage is dissolved in favor of the faith of the newly baptized person, the convert does not have a strict right to enter a new marriage with a non-Catholic. To the extent that it threatens the convert's continued practice of the Catholic faith, a marriage to a non-Catholic cannot be said to be in favor of the faith of the Catholic. However, for a serious reason and after adequate safeguards for the faith of the newly baptized, the local ordinary can permit him or her to enter a new marriage with a non-Catholic, baptized or not. Canons 1124–1129 governing mixed marriages are to be observed in these cases.

3) Dissolution in Virtue of Three Sixteenth Century Papal Constitutions

Historical Synopsis

During the age of exploration, Catholic missionaries in Asia, South and Central America, and the Caribbean frequently encountered natives who were favorably disposed toward the Christian faith but who were impeded from receiving baptism because they were living in polygamy. The Church could not tolerate polygamy among Christians, but the traditional discipline governing the Pauline privilege did not seem to apply to these cases. In addition, because of the slave trade, missionaries encountered men and women who were potential converts but who had been forcibly separated from their wives and husbands. Since the whereabouts of these first spouses were usually unknown, it was impossible to conduct the interpellations. Moreover, it was impossible to know whether these first spouses might have been baptized after the forced separation.

Three sixteenth century popes issued constitutions to address these hardship situations in missionary territories. In 1537, Paul III's constitution Altitudo allowed a convert with several wives, either simultaneously or serially, who could not remember which of them was the first, to contract marriage with any one of them without the necessity of the interpellations and to dismiss the others. However, if the convert could recall which of his wives was the first, he was bound to remain with her, unless the usual conditions for the Pauline privilege applied. Pius V's constitution Romani Pontificis of 1571 allowed a convert with several wives to remain with the one who was baptized with him and dismiss the others. In 1585, the constitution Populis of Gregory XIII authorized certain missionaries to permit new marriages of African converts who had been separated from their then unbaptized spouses because of the slave trade. These new marriages dissolved the original ones even if the interpellations were omitted as impossible and the other spouses had subsequently received baptism.

These constitutions, which were never promulgated, were originally given as special faculties to certain missionaries and as privileges for the peoples of certain regions. Knowledge of these constitutions and their provisions was not widespread. Even one as knowledgeable and well connected as Benedict XIV seems to have had only secondhand knowledge of them.[54] Perhaps as a result of the limited awareness of these constitutions, little was done to assess the significance of their innovations. Nor is there evidence of much reflection on the manner in which or the authority by which the other bonds were dissolved. However, it can be argued that the sixteenth century popes merely adapted the Pauline privilege to make it applicable to situations the Apostle could not have foreseen and, in the case of Populis, provide for an ipso iure dissolution of a ratified but non-consummated marriage.

Canon 1125 of the 1917 code extended these constitutions to the universal Church, and excerpts from them were published as appendices of that code. The gist of these constitutions has been distilled in canons 1148–1149 of the 1983 code.

Situations of Polygamy

Canon 1148 — §1. When he receives baptism in the Catholic Church, a non-baptized man who has several non-baptized wives at the same time can retain one of them after the others have been dismissed, if it is hard for him to remain with the first one. The same is valid for a non-baptized woman who has several non-baptized husbands at the same time.

[54] Benedict XIV, De synodo dioecesana l. xiii, c. 21, n. 2–7.

§2. In the cases mentioned in §1, marriage must be contracted in legitimate form after baptism has been received, and the prescripts about mixed marriages, if necessary, and other matters required by the law are to be observed.

§3. Keeping in mind the moral, social, and economic conditions of places and of persons, the local ordinary is to take care that the needs of the first wife and the others dismissed are sufficiently provided for according to the norms of justice, Christian charity, and natural equity.

Canon 1148, §1 is based on the provisions of the constitutions Altitudo and Romani Pontificis. It allows a newly baptized man who had several unbaptized wives simultaneously while he was himself unbaptized to retain one of them and dismiss all the others if it would be difficult for him to remain with the one he married first. These provisions are also applicable to women who had several unbaptized husbands simultaneously prior to their baptisms. It is no longer necessary that the convert not be able to remember which of the spouses was his or her first or that the spouse retained be the one who is willing to be baptized with him or her.

The New Marriage

After baptism, the convert wishing to use this privilege must contract marriage with his or her chosen spouse according to a legitimate form. Since this privilege extends only to those who have received baptism in the Catholic Church, the legitimate form is usually the canonical form. However, if the chosen spouse opts not to be baptized or to be baptized in a non-Catholic church, a dispensation from the canonical form could be granted to permit this marriage to be contracted according to some other legitimate form (c. 1127, §2).

Concern for Dismissed Wives

The use of this privilege by the convert can result in severe hardship for the first wife and any other wives who are dismissed. In some places dismissed wives are reduced to supporting themselves through prostitution. Thus, the local ordinary is to see that appropriate provision is made for their support, presumably by their former husband. Criteria for the adequacy of this support are to be derived from the moral, cultural, and economic conditions of the area. This support is not merely a matter of charity. It is also due as a matter of justice and natural equity.

The canon's failure to advert to the obligation of support for dismissed husbands probably results from the fact that polygyny is much more common than polyandry and that dismissed wives are exposed to much greater hardships than are dismissed husbands. Less understandable is the canon's failure to mention explicitly the convert's obligations toward the children born of these dismissed wives.

Separation Due to Captivity or Persecution

Canon 1149 — A non-baptized person who, after having received baptism in the Catholic Church, cannot restore cohabitation with a non-baptized spouse by reason of captivity or persecution can contract another marriage even if the other party has received baptism in the meantime, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1141.

This canon incorporates into the code the basic provisions of the constitution Populis. A non-baptized person who married another unbaptized person from whom he or she is now separated as a result of captivity or persecution can enter a new marriage after baptism in the Catholic Church if he or she cannot restore cohabitation with the first spouse. The interpellations may be omitted as superfluous in the circumstances envisaged by the canon. The new marriage is permitted even if the original spouse has received baptism since the separation as long as the marriage was not consummated after both spouses were baptized. The dissolution of the first marriage seems to take place by the law and without the personal intervention of the Roman Pontiff.

4) Dissolution of a Non-sacramental Marriage "In Favor of the Faith"

Historical Synopsis

Shortly after the promulgation of the 1917 code, cases began to be reported in which the Roman Pontiff had dissolved marriages involving only one unbaptized spouse in favor of the faith either of the unbaptized spouse who now wished to be baptized in the Catholic Church or of a baptized non-Catholic spouse who wished to become a Catholic. These dissolutions could not be explained by the traditional principles governing the application of the Pauline privilege or even by the extensions of this privilege by the sixteenth-century constitutions. Thus, these dissolutions were soon recognized as exercises of a heretofore unknown papal prerogative to dissolve non-sacramental marriages. The scope of this power to dissolve expanded steadily, albeit sometimes in fits and starts, until it extended to the power of the pope to dissolve a marriage of two unbaptized persons without the baptism of either of them in favor of the faith of a Catholic third party who wished to marry (or convalidate a civil marriage with) one of them.[55]

Essential Conditions

The dissolution of non-sacramental marriages in favor of the faith is now governed by the CDF instruction Ut notum est of December 6, 1973 and the procedural norms attached to it.[56] There are three essential conditions for the dissolution of a marriage in favor of the faith:

(a) at least one of the parties to the marriage must have been unbaptized at the time of the marriage and throughout the duration of the common life;

(b) if only one party was unbaptized at the time of the marriage and he or she subsequently received baptism, no sexual relations occurred after his or her baptism;[57] and

(c) if the dissolution is requested to permit the marriage of a Catholic with an unbaptized person or a baptized non-Catholic, the non-Catholic must yield to the Catholic full freedom to practice and to raise all children in the Catholic faith by means of written cautiones.[58]

Unlike dissolution by the Pauline privilege, dissolution in favor of the faith does not require that an unbaptized spouse be baptized or that a baptized non-Catholic spouse seek full communion with the Catholic Church. If the other conditions are met, the marriage can be dissolved in favor of the faith of a Catholic who wishes to marry one of the parties to the marriage to be dissolved.

Other Conditions

The dissolution is not granted if the one seeking it was responsible for the failure of the marriage or if the person he or she desires to marry was instrumental in the break-up of the marriage. This lack of culpability for the failure of the marriage is to be established by questioning the former spouse, if possible, and the future spouse. If [55] For a treatment of this twentieth century development, see Noonan, The Power to Dissolve, 366–392.

[56] CDF, instruction and procedural norms, December 6, 1973, CLD 8, 1177–1184. Although this instruction has been communicated to diocesan bishops, it has never been published in the AAS. During the process of revising the Latin code, various schemata incorporated the essence of the norms of this instruction. However, these norms were deleted prior to the promulgation of the 1983 code. In a private response of September 8, 1983, the CDF stated through the then apostolic delegate to the United States that the 1973 norms remained in effect even after the promulgation of the revised code. However, dissolution in favor of the faith is cryptically mentioned in CCEO 1384, with a reference to special norms of the Apostolic See.

[57] In the case of a marriage entered into by two unbaptized persons, there must have been no sexual relations after both of them had received baptism.

[58] CDF, Ut notum est I, CLD 8, 1177.

all the other conditions have been met, a marriage between a Catholic and an unbaptized person entered into after a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship can be dissolved in favor of the faith.[59]

Although there have been a few reports of favor-of-the-faith dissolutions without the immediate prospect of a new marriage by the petitioner, the present CDF practice is not to recommend the granting of the dissolution until the petitioner intends marriage with a person who is free to marry.[60] The dissolution can be granted to permit a new marriage between a Catholic and a baptized non-Catholic or even an unbaptized person. In the latter case, the dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship is granted by the congregation.[61] However, if the petitioner is a Catholic whose first marriage was entered after a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship, the dissolution will be granted only in view of a new marriage to a validly baptized person.[62]

Procedure

Unlike Pauline privilege cases which can be dealt with locally, petitions for dissolution in favor of the faith are instructed by the petitioner's local ordinary and forwarded to the CDF which has exclusive competence over matters touching on the privilege of the faith.[63] The congregation reviews the dossier accompanying the petition and, if all the conditions have been met, recommends a dissolution to the Roman Pontiff. The pope then dissolves the non-sacramental marriage in favor of the faith in virtue of the personal, non-delegable vicarious power which he possesses from Christ. Since the dissolution of a marriage in favor of the faith is a privilege and not a right, the congregation does not customarily recommend dissolution of marriages entered into or convalidated after the dissolution of a previous non-sacramental marriage.[64]

The Favor of the Law and the Privilege of the Faith

Canon 1150 — In a doubtful matter the privilege of faith possesses the favor of the law.

Meaning and Scope of "Privilege of the Faith"

The phrase "privilege of the faith" is a rather recent coinage, which seems to have first appeared in canon 1127 of the 1917 code as a conflation of the more traditional phrase "favor of the faith" (favor fidei) and "Pauline privilege."[65] This conflation was suggested by the juxtaposition of these two phrases in canon 1120.[66] At the time of the promulgation of the 1917 code, the "privilege of the faith" that was granted the favor of the law in cases of doubt could have meant only the Pauline privilege and its extensions by the sixteenth century constitutions, the only forms of dissolution in favor of the faith then known.

The creeping twentieth century expansion of papal power over non-sacramental marriages also enlarged the scope of the privilege of the faith. Changes in the designation of the competence of the Holy Office (later, CDF) in the area illustrate this expansion. In 1917, the Holy Office was assigned exclusive authority over matters concerning "the Pauline, as they call it, privilege."[67] When Paul VI reorganized the Roman Curia in 1967, this exclusive competence was designated as pertaining to "all that concerns the privilege of the faith,"[68] a phrase that now clearly included dissolutions of [59] CDF, Ut notum est II, §§3–4 and V, CLD 8, 1178–1179.

[60] CDF, reply formula, 1977, CLD 8, 1186.

[61] CDF, reply, September 16, 1974, CLD 8, 1185.

[62] CDF, Ut notum est V, CLD 8, 1179.

[63] PB 53.

[64] CDF, Ut notum est VI, CLD 8, 1179.

[65] U. Navarrete, "Commentarium decreti Signaturae Apostolicae de recta applicatione canonum 1150 et 1608, §4," P 85 (1996) 368–370. See also idem, "'Favor fidei' e 'salus animarum,'" Ius 27 (1980) 83.

[66] CIC 1120, §1: "A legitimate marriage between non-baptized persons, even though consummated, is dissolved in favor of the faith by the Pauline privilege."

[67] CIC 247, §3.

[68] RE 34. This same designation is retained in PB 53.

non-sacramental marriages in favor of the faith by the Roman Pontiff.

The "privilege of the faith" is not, however, simply identical with the "favor of the faith." The latter has an application beyond cases of the dissolution of non-sacramental marriages; the former does not.[69] However, the principle that the privilege of the faith enjoys the favor of the law in doubtful matters is limited to cases of the dissolution of non-sacramental marriages. This is clear from its context of this principle in the code. Canon 1150 appears immediately after the canons governing dissolution of marriages entered into by two unbaptized persons in virtue of the Pauline privilege and the sixteenth century constitutions. This context appears to limit the applicability of the principle asserted in canon 1150 to these canons.[70]

Possible Doubts

Various doubts can arise about the possibility of dissolving a marriage by the Pauline privilege and its sixteenth century extensions. There can be doubt about: whether the conversion of one of the spouses is sincere, whether the unbaptized spouse's response to the interpellations is sincere, whether the unbaptized spouse departed, whether the baptized spouse gave the other spouse just cause to separate, whether the interpellations were lawfully made, or whether there was just cause for dispensing from the interpellations. In all of these cases, the doubt is to be resolved in favor of the freedom of the newly baptized party to enter a new marriage (c. 1150).

Doubt can also arise about whether one or both spouses were baptized at the time of the marriage or whether the baptism received by one of the spouses after the marriage was valid. Since the unbaptized status of both parties at the time of the marriage is an essential condition for the valid use of the Pauline privilege and its extensions, cases where there is a doubt about the baptismal status of one or both parties must be referred to the CDF.[71] If doubts about the validity of the baptism of the converted spouse cannot be resolved, he or she can use the privilege after being baptized conditionally.[72]

Doubt about the Validity of the Marriage

There can also be a doubt about the validity of the marriage whose dissolution is sought. If all the conditions for the Pauline privilege or its extensions are met, there is little reason to invoke the principles of canon 1150. If a new marriage can dissolve an unquestionably valid marriage, it can surely dissolve one of doubtful validity. Moreover, papal dissolutions of non-sacramental marriages, which involve the privilege of the faith in its broad sense, "are more readily granted if on some other ground there is serious doubt about the validity of the marriage itself."[73]

Some authors interpreted canon 1014 of the 1917 code and canon 1608, §4 of the 1983 code as granting the favor of the law to the privilege of the faith and not to the marriage in cases where its validity is doubtful.[74] These authors have pro-

[69] Navarrete, "Commentarium," 370.

[70] This argument from context is corroborated by the history of the revision of the Latin code. All schemata placed draft norms on the papal dissolution of non-sacramental marriages after what is now canon 1150. CCEO 862, which deals with the dissolution of ratified but non-consummated marriages, is located immediately after the canon asserting the favor of the law enjoyed by the privilege of the faith, as if to preclude any possible confusion about the applicability of this favor to sacramental marriages.

[71] SCOf, decree, June 10, 1937, AAS 29 (1937) 305–306; CLD 2, 343.

[72] See c. 869.

[73] CDF, Ut notum est III, CLD 8, 1178.

[74] CIC 1014: "Marriage enjoys the favor of the law; wherefore when a doubt exists the validity of a marriage is be upheld until the contrary is proven, with due regard for the prescription of canon 1127." The "salvo praescripto can. 1127" clause has been deleted from the otherwise identical c. 1060 of the 1983 code. Nevertheless, some have found a similar provision in c. 1608, §4 which requires a judge who cannot reach moral certainty to find posed that canon 1150 can be used by tribunal judges to resolve marriage nullity cases. For example, Wrenn suggested that, when an insoluble doubt remained about the validity of a marriage, the judge was bound to render a negative decision with regard to its nullity. However, if > one of the parties is doubtfully baptized, then, since a doubtful privilege of the faith is one of those cases which "enjoys the favor of the law" (c. 1150), the judge must (or so it appears to this author) give a constat pro ipsa, i.e., the person's freedom to marry must be recognized.[75]

The Apostolic Signatura, after consultation with the CDF, has declared that this position is utterly lacking in foundation in law and that practice based upon it "must be stopped immediately."[76]

While canon 1150 is indeed a "doubt-solving canon," its function is limited to resolving doubts about the applicability of the Pauline privilege and its now traditional extensions. As a traditional principle, it may guide the CDF's dealing with cases of dissolution of non-sacramental marriages in favor of the faith, but this type of case falls outside the parameters of the law of the codes. In any case, canon 1150 is not intended as a tool for resolving doubts about the validity of marriage in ecclesiastical tribunals.

ARTICLE 2: SEPARATION WITH THE BOND REMAINING [cc. 1151–1155]

The Principle: Common Life

Canon 1151 — Spouses have the duty and right to preserve conjugal living unless a legitimate cause excuses them.

Echoing Gaudium et spes 48, canon 1055 describes marriage as "a partnership of the whole of life... which is ordered by its nature to the good of the spouses and the procreation and education of offspring." The achievement of the twofold ends of marriage normally requires that the spouses share a common life (convictus coniugalis). Long experience has shown that lengthy interruptions of a common life have a deleterious effect on the spouses themselves, their ability to sustain their marital obligations, and the well-being of children. Therefore, the spouses have a duty to one another and to their children to maintain a common life and a mutual right to expect one another to maintain this common life, unless a legitimate cause excuses. Although the code frames this duty and right in the language of positive law, it is rooted in the nature of marriage as a partnership of the whole of life.

While recognizing that marriage is the most intimate and personal of relationships, the Church refuses to treat marriage as a purely private matter between the spouses alone. It is also an institution which has a societal impact. A separation represents at least the temporary failure of a marriage and has a particularly profound effect on the well-being of any children born of the marriage.[77] Thus, spouses may not take the initiative to terminate their common life unless there is a legitimate cause. Canons 1692–1696 outline the process by which ecclesiastical authority determines the existence of a legitimate cause and, if one is proven, for the defendant "unless there is a question of a case which enjoys the favor of the law."

[75] L. Wrenn, in CLSA Com, 995. A more adventuresome approach was proposed by R. Carney, "A New Application of Canon 1127," CLSAP 39 (1977) 49–52. Carney proposed that the "favor of the faith" could be invoked to declare a party to a doubtfully valid marriage free to marry whenever a declaration of this kind would benefit the faith of either the petitioner or a third party. This position, which is wholly without any basis in canonical tradition, was severely criticized in L. Örsy, "An Evaluation of 'New Applications of Canon 1127,'" J 38 (1978) 163–170.

[76] Apostolic Signatura, "Canon 1608: An Unusual Manner of Handling Nullity Cases," RRAO 1996, 39–45. See Navarrete, "Commentarium," 360–385.

[77] See J. Wallerstein and S. Blakeslee, Second Chances (New York: Ticknor and Fields, 1989).

permits a separation of the spouses. Permission for such a separation does not, however, free the parties to enter new marriages. In practice, however, the substantive and procedural canons governing separation are largely ignored both by separating couples and by ecclesiastical authority in the English-speaking world.

Grounds for Separation

Adultery as a Ground for Separation

Canon 1152 — §1. Although it is earnestly recommended that a spouse, moved by Christian charity and concerned for the good of the family, not refuse forgiveness to an adulterous partner and not disrupt conjugal life, nevertheless, if the spouse did not condone the fault of the other expressly or tacitly, the spouse has the right to sever conjugal living unless the spouse consented to the adultery, gave cause for it, or also committed adultery.

§2. Tacit condonation exists if the innocent spouse has had marital relations voluntarily with the other spouse after having become certain of the adultery. It is presumed, moreover, if the spouse observed conjugal living for six months and did not make recourse to the ecclesiastical or civil authority.

§3. If the innocent spouse has severed conjugal living voluntarily, the spouse is to introduce a cause for separation within six months to the competent ecclesiastical authority which, after having investigated all the circumstances, is to consider carefully whether the innocent spouse can be moved to forgive the fault and not to prolong the separation permanently.

Canon law has long recognized adultery as a legitimate ground for the innocent spouse to effect a separation. Although the innocent spouse is strongly encouraged to forgive an adulterous spouse out of a Christian spirit of forgiveness and reconciliation and for the good of the family and to maintain common life, separation is asserted as a right of the innocent spouse. Only actual adultery, i.e., a completed act of sexual intercourse with a third party, gives rise to the innocent spouse's right to separate.[78] Inappropriate expressions of affection, intense but platonic relationships, and even "affairs" in cyberspace with a third party may be considered breaches of the obligation of marital fidelity. However, these indiscretions do not constitute the "adultery" that gives the wronged spouse a right to a separation.

The innocent spouse cannot claim a right to a separation from an adulterous spouse if he or she has consented to or given cause for the other's adultery or if he or she is also guilty of adultery. The innocent spouse also forfeits the right to a separation if, after becoming aware of the other spouse's adultery, he or she has "condoned" or, more accurately, pardoned it.[79] The pardon of an adulterous spouse can be express or tacit. It is tacit if the innocent spouse freely continues common life with the guilty spouse after becoming aware of the adultery. Tacit pardon is presumed if the innocent spouse continues conjugal cohabitation for six months after becoming aware of the adultery and fails to seek permission for a separation from ecclesiastical or civil authority. However, this presumption cedes to contrary proof.

If an innocent spouse unilaterally initiates a separation after learning of the other spouse's adultery, he or she is to initiate an action for a formal separation before the competent ecclesiastical authority within six months. Before granting the requested separation, the diocesan bishop or ecclesiastical judge is to attempt to persuade the innocent spouse to forgive the adulterous spouse and resume their common life.

[78] Although in its strict sense adultery was understood to involve sexual relations by a married person with a person of the opposite sex, commentators on the 1917 code equated homosexual relations and bestiality with adultery as causes for legitimate separation. See F. Wernz and P. Vidal, Ius Canonicum (Rome: Apud Aedes Universitatis Gregorianae, 1946) 5: n. 639; and A. Vermeersch and J. Creusen, Epitome Iuris Canonici (Mechelen: H. Dessain, 1927) 2:270. But for a contrary view, see Cappello, n. 826.

[79] The decision to translate condono and its derivatives as "condone" in English versions of the code is unfortunate and misleading. In contemporary English, "condone" denotes "pardon" or "overlook," but it also connotes vague approval or at least indifference. These connotations do not attach to the Latin root word.

Other Grounds for Separation

Canon 1153 — §1. If either of the spouses causes grave mental or physical danger to the other spouse or to the offspring or otherwise renders common life too difficult, that spouse gives the other a legitimate cause for leaving, either by decree of the local ordinary or even on his or her own authority if there is danger in delay.

§2. In all cases, when the cause for the separation ceases, conjugal living must be restored unless ecclesiastical authority has established otherwise.

The canonical discipline governing marital separation is based on the "fault" of one of the spouses, even though a psychological disorder may diminish or, at times, extinguish the spouse's moral culpability. This fault-based system for separation provided the model for the fault-based legislation for divorce that prevailed in most Western countries until recently.[80] Although this fault-based approach has been largely abandoned by secular divorce legislation, canon law has resisted the trend toward allowing "no fault" separation.

Canon 1131, §1 of the 1917 code listed various causes besides adultery that could justify marital separation. The revised code instead speaks generally of actions or inactions by one spouse that pose a physical or spiritual danger to the other spouse or the children or that "render common life too difficult." The language of canon 1153, §1 is flexible enough to include a large variety of behaviors on the part of one spouse as justifications for requests for separation. Nevertheless, it does not include a spouse's pervasive dissatisfaction with the quality of the marital relationship, difficulties for which neither spouse bears objective responsibility, or problems caused by the one seeking the separation. Although the causes of marital breakdown are rarely black and white, the granting of permission to separate by ecclesiastical authority presupposes that one spouse was relatively innocent and the other relatively guilty.

The innocent spouse is normally to seek from the local ordinary the prior permission to separate.[81] The intervention of church authority prior to the separation provides an opportunity for pastoral action to attempt to effect a reconciliation of the spouses (c. 1695). However, the innocent spouse may initiate a separation without prior approval if a delay would expose him or her or the children to danger.

Canon law recognizes only adultery as a legitimate ground for a permanent separation. Permission to separate for other causes normally lapses when the cause ceases to exist. However, the causes of separations are often deep-rooted problems of long standing that do not suddenly vanish. Moreover, these causes often have resulted in such a complete unraveling of the spouses' relationship that it is practically impossible for them to resume a common life. Thus, ecclesiastical authority can allow a separation to continue even after the original cause for it has ceased.

POST-SEPARATION ISSUES

Care for Children after a Separation

Canon 1154 — After the separation of the spouses has taken place, the adequate support and education of the children must always be suitably provided.

A couple's children often suffer the most serious consequences of marital separation. In most cases, they experience a notable decline in their economic standard of living after their parents' separation. In addition, they often experience [80] M. A. Glendon, The Transformation of Family Law (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989) 28.

[81] Canon 1692 stipulates that permission to separate can be granted by the decree of the diocesan bishop or the sentence of an ecclesiastical judge.

emotional problems which can be severe and sometimes persist into their adulthood. Although the details of child custody, visitation, and child support are the province of the civil courts, the Church must also be solicitous of the needs of these children.[82] A separation is an occasion for the Church to bring its pastoral resources to bear to assist the children themselves, to provide the spouses with the resources for dealing with them, and to remind the spouses of their ongoing legal and moral obligations to the children.

Reconciliation and the Right to Separate

Canon 1155 — The innocent spouse laudably can readmit the other spouse to conjugal life; in this case the innocent spouse renounces the right to separate.

Even though an innocent spouse has been granted permission to separate, he or she is encouraged to reconcile with the other spouse if that is possible. By resuming a common life, the innocent spouse forfeits the right to separate because of cause given by the other spouse in the past. However, the innocent spouse can initiate a new request for permission to separate if the other spouse once again gives just provocation.

In most cases, a marital separation, whether formalized by ecclesiastical authority or not, is a prelude to civil divorce. In some jurisdictions, a civil divorce is the only vehicle available to spouses for securing their legal and financial status and for clarifying mutual rights and obligations regarding the children. Although the Church does not consider a civil divorce to have any effect on the bond of marriage, it imposes no sanctions or disabilities on members of the faithful who receive a civil divorce. However, since the bond of marriage remains intact despite the cessation of common life, remarriage after a civil divorce puts spouses in an irregular situation that bars them from the reception of the sacraments.[83]

CHAPTER X
THE CONVALIDATION OF MARRIAGE[84]
[cc. 1156–1165][85]

The spouses' legitimately manifested matrimonial consent brings a marriage into existence. Sometimes, however, the consent elicited by the parties fails to achieve its end. Consent that is fundamentally flawed by a defect recognized in ecclesiastical jurisprudence does not give rise to a valid marriage. Moreover, consent that is in itself naturally sufficient is juridically inefficacious if one or both parties are bound by a diriment impediment or if the parties fail to observe the form required by law in manifesting their consent. In these cases, the parties' consent may result in a meaningful and enriching human relationship, but it does not result in a valid marriage.

Convalidation is the canonical procedure for making valid a marriage that was invalid from its origin because of a defect of consent, a diriment impediment, or a defect of the required form. The law contains two methods for convalidating an invalid marriage: simple convalidation and radical [82] See M. Foster, The Promotion of the Canonical Rights of Children in Situations of Divorce and Remarriage, CanLawStud 545 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1994).

[83] John Paul II, FC 84; and CDF, letter "Concerning the Reception of Holy Communion by Divorced-and-Remarried Members of the Faithful," September 14, 1994, Origins 24 (1994–1995) 337, 339–341. The latter was a response to a more open approach to the admission of the divorced and remarried to the sacraments by Bishops Karl Lehmann, Oscar Saier, and Walter Kasper. See Three German Bishops, "Pastoral Ministry: The Divorced and Remarried," Origins 23 (1993–1994) 670–676. For a review of recent literature on the ecclesial status of divorced-remarried Catholics, see J. Provost, "Intolerable Marriage Situations Revisited," J 40 (1980) 141–196; and idem, "Intolerable Marriage Situations: A Second Decade," J 50 (1990) 573–612.

[84] See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 822–829; Lüdicke, in Münster Com, Einführung vor 1156/1–1160/1; Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 727–732; Kelly, in CLSGBI Com, 653–659.

[85] CCEO 843–852.

sanation. The former requires a renewal of consent by the parties; the latter is an intervention of church authority that gives naturally sufficient and still perduring consent retroactive validity. Neither method can be applied unless any impediment has been dispensed or has ceased and any defect of consent has been overcome. The effect of simple convalidation is to render a marriage valid from the moment consent is renewed; the effect of radical sanation is to render a marriage valid from the moment the original, naturally sufficient consent was exchanged.

Both simple convalidation and radical sanation are matters of merely ecclesiastical law. Consequently, they directly bind only Catholics (c. 11); but they indirectly bind non-Catholics, whether baptized or not, when they seek to enter into a marriage or to convalidate an invalid union with a Catholic (c. 1059).[86] The code contains no explicit provision for the convalidation of invalid marriages of two non-Catholics. Marriages between two non-Catholics, whether baptized or not, are convalidated by the natural law by the continuation of the naturally sufficient consent of both parties after the obstacle to validity has been re-

[86] Since the promulgation of the 1983 code, some have suggested that canon 11 exempts non-Catholics from the ecclesiastical law governing convalidation even if they are seeking to convalidate a marriage with a Catholic or, at least, that, since the apparent conflict between canons 11 and 1059 has given rise to a doubt of law, non-Catholics are not bound by these norms as long as this doubt continues (c. 14). See Doyle, in CLSA Com, 824, 826; L. Örsy, Marriage in Canon Law (Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier, 1986) 64–65; L. Pivonka, "Ecumenical or Mixed Marriage in the New Code of Canon Law," J 43 (1983) 122; Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 90–91; and P. Cogan, "The Non-Catholic and Convalidation," CLSAP 56 (1994) 84–86.

Although the exemption of non-Catholics from the canonical norms governing convalidation of their marriages to Catholics would resolve a pressing pastoral problem (see J. Johnson, "The 'Simple' Convalidation as a Pastoral Problem," Stud Can 15 [1981] 461–479), the arguments against the existence of such an exemption in the current law seem compelling.

(1) Despite the general principle of canon 11 that merely ecclesiastical laws do not bind non-Catholics, the code does contain norms governing non-Catholics when they seek certain benefits from the Catholic Church. For example, canon 844, §§3–5 stipulates the conditions under which baptized non-Catholics may receive the sacraments of Eucharist, penance, and anointing of the sick from Catholic ministers. Non-Catholics who exercise their right to bring a case to an ecclesiastical tribunal (c. 1476) become subject to all ecclesiastical procedural laws. Similarly, canon 1059 subjects to merely ecclesiastical marriage law a non-Catholic who seeks to marry (or convalidate a marriage with) a Catholic.

(2) Almost without exception, commentators on the 1917 code held that canon 1016, which is parallel to canon 1059 of the 1983 code, bound non-baptized persons, who were otherwise exempt from merely ecclesiastical laws, to ecclesiastical law governing marriage when they sought to marry Catholics. Similarly, canon 1059 obviously intends to subject non-Catholics, whether baptized or not, to ecclesiastical discipline when they marry Catholics.

(3) If canon 1059 does not bind non-Catholics to merely ecclesiastical laws when they seek to marry Catholics, the clause "even if only one party is Catholic" is redundant and the canon tautological.

(4) Those who claim that non-Catholics are not bound by merely ecclesiastical norms when they seek the convalidation of their marriages to Catholics are rather selective in their application of canon 11. If non-Catholics are exempt from the laws governing convalidation, they should also be exempt from the merely ecclesiastical laws governing marriage preparations, impediments, canonical form, and the like when they seek marriage with a Catholic. However, no responsible canonist has proposed so broad an exemption.

(5) Since the matrimonial covenant is indivisible, the Church's claim of authority to regulate the marriages of Catholics extends to the non-Catholic party to a mixed marriage. This extension applies the traditional principle that "marriage cannot be divided" (matrimonium non potest claudicare). Similarly, a mixed marriage is invalid if the Catholic minister asks for and receives the consent of the Catholic party but a non-Catholic minister asks for and receives the consent of the non-Catholic party (Ecum Dir 156); and non-Catholic parties to mixed marriages are considered bound by impediments of merely ecclesiastical law. In short, while exempt from merely ecclesiastical law in most cases, non-Catholics are bound by ecclesiastical marriage laws, including those governing convalidation, when they marry Catholics.

moved.[87] However, the convalidations of invalid unions involving two non-baptized persons are also governed by the norms, if any, of civil law.[88]

ARTICLE 1: SIMPLE CONVALIDATION [cc. 1156–1160]

Historical Synopsis

Although the Church has long attempted to address the problem of marriages invalid because of an impediment that has subsequently ceased or been dispensed, a coherent discipline governing the validation of these marriages has emerged only relatively recently. During the first Christian millennium, local councils, beginning with one held at Agde in 506, allowed some couples who had entered into marriage within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity and affinity to continue to cohabit as husband and wife. Some see these conciliar canons as early examples of the exercise of the power to dispense from matrimonial impediments and subsequently to convalidate marriages without requiring a renewal of consent.[89] However, these sources are too scattered and obscure to permit a definitive conclusion that they represent the earliest antecedents of the institute of simple convalidation.

From the late tenth century on, it became increasingly common for dispensations from matrimonial impediments to be granted for individual cases. Some of these dispensations were granted to permit the recognition of marriages contracted invalidly because of an impediment. Although renewal of consent was not generally required for the marriage to be recognized as valid, continued cohabitation and voluntarily engaging in marital intercourse after the dispensation were considered an implicit confirmation of consent. The first known requirement of explicit renewal of consent for the validation of a marriage is found in a rescript from the Holy See in 1281. However, until the Council of Trent this requirement appears only sporadically in Holy See rescripts granting dispensations.[90]

To reduce the number of invalid marriages, the Council of Trent considerably pared back the degrees in which the impediments of spiritual relationship, public propriety, and affinity arising from fornication invalidated marriage.[91] Trent also sought to reduce the number of dispensations granted to permit or to validate marriages contracted within the forbidden degrees. Only those who entered marriage in probable ignorance of the existence of an impediment were to be granted retroactive dispensations.[92] However, Trent said nothing about a renewal of consent after the granting of a dispensation as a condition for the validity of the marriage in these cases. Despite Trent's intention to reduce the number of invalid marriages, its decree Tametsi which imposed a mandatory form of marriage[93] and the confusion resulting from the rather haphazard way of promulgating it introduced a new cause for the proliferation of invalid marriages.

In the post-Tridentine era, the council's hard line on granting dispensations from diriment impediments soon softened because of the Church's concern to prevent leakage to Protestant churches. However, the clause "after consent has been given anew" (de novo praestito consensu) was routinely appended to Holy See rescripts granting dispensations to allow the validation of marriages already contracted invalidly. The requirement of renewal of consent for the validation of marriages became such a fixed part of Roman curial practice that some authors opined that it was a matter of divine law.[94] In places where the decree Tametsi had [87] L. Bogdan, "Simple Convalidation of Marriage in the 1983 Code of Canon Law," J 46 (1986) 527–530.

[88] J. Brennan, The Simple Convalidation of Marriage, CanLawStud 102 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1937) 114–120.

[89] Ibid., 10–14.

[90] Ibid., 14–20.

[91] Council of Trent, sess. XXIV, de ref. matrimonii, cap. 2–4.

[92] Ibid., cap. 5.

[93] Ibid., cap. 1.

[94] Brennan, 37–38.

been promulgated, consent was to be renewed according to the Tridentine form, unless the marriage had originally been celebrated according to this form and an occult impediment was later detected. Although renewal of consent for convalidation was insisted on in practice throughout the post-Tridentine period, it was incorporated into church law only with the 1917 code.[95] The discipline of the 1917 code on simple convalidation is substantially incorporated into the revised code.

Marriages Invalid because of Diriment Impediments

Canon 1156 — §1. To convalidate a marriage which is invalid because of a diriment impediment, it is required that the impediment ceases or is dispensed and that at least the party conscious of the impediment renews consent.

§2. Ecclesiastical law requires this renewal for the validity of the convalidation even if each party gave consent at the beginning and did not revoke it afterwards.

The essential precondition for the simple convalidation of a marriage invalid because of a diriment impediment is that the impediment either be dispensed by competent authority or cease. After the impediment has been dispensed or has ceased, at least the party who is aware of its existence must renew consent. The restriction of the obligation to renew consent to the party aware of the impediment was introduced in the 1917 code to sidestep a prickly pastoral issue. Pre-code law required that both parties be aware of the invalidity of a marriage because of an impediment and renew consent. Thus, when only one party was aware of an occult impediment, he or she had to inform the other of the invalidity of their marriage. Since affinity arising from fornication was a diriment impediment at that time, informing one's spouse of the invalidity of the marriage so that it could be convalidated could create an embarrassing and potentially volatile situation.

[95] Ibid., 22–29.

The renewal of consent for convalidation is explicitly presented as a requirement of merely ecclesiastical law. It is necessary even if the original consent of both parties was naturally sufficient and has never been revoked. The result of the failure of the party or parties aware of the impediment to renew consent according to the norm of law is the invalidity of the convalidation and, consequently, the continued invalidity of the marriage.

While non-Catholics aware of an invalidating impediment must renew their consent when they convalidate marriages with Catholics, renewal of consent is not necessary for the convalidation of the marriages of two non-Catholics.[96] These marriages are convalidated by the continuation of naturally sufficient consent after the cessation of a divine law impediment. Thus, when the marriage of two non-Catholics is invalid because of the impediment of prior bond, the marriage is convalidated by their continued consent to the invalid marriage after the death of one party's first spouse.

Necessity of Renewal of Consent

Canon 1157 — The renewal of consent must be a new act of the will concerning a marriage which the renewing party knows or thinks was null from the beginning.

For the convalidation of a marriage invalid because of an impediment, it is not sufficient for the party aware of the impediment to confirm his or her original consent after the impediment has ceased or been dispensed. Renewal of consent requires a new act of the will, one both materially and formally distinct from the original consent. Such a new act of the will is probably psychologically impossible unless the person is aware that the marriage is or may be invalid. Thus, the law requires that to renew consent a person must know or at least think that the marriage was null from the beginning. Certitude of the invalidity of the marriage is not necessary; awareness that it may be invalid or that the Church considers it to be invalid is sufficient. If the party or parties aware of the impediment do not at least think the marriage is invalid or if they fail to elicit a new act of consent, the convalidation is itself invalid.

[96] Although those who were baptized in or received into full communion with the Catholic Church but who subsequently left it by a formal act are exempted from observing some ecclesiastical marriage laws, they remain bound by the laws governing convalidation.

Cases Where an Impediment Can Be Proven

Canon 1158 — §1. If the impediment is public, both parties must renew the consent in canonical form, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1127, §2.

It is an impediment's susceptibility to proof in the external forum (c. 1074) and not the extent to which it is actually known that renders it public. Marriages invalid because of a public impediment are convalidated by the renewal of consent of both parties according to the canonical form.

The requirements for renewal of consent can pose pastoral problems for the convalidation of mixed marriages invalid because of an impediment when the non-Catholic party is aware of the facts that give rise to an impediment but refuses to recognize their juridic effect. For example, a non-Catholic may acknowledge that he was married prior to his present marriage to a Catholic but sincerely believe that his present marriage is valid, since the civil divorce dissolved that prior bond. Unable to acknowledge the invalidity of the current marriage, he may not be able to renew consent by a new act of the will. These situations need to be approached with great pastoral sensitivity.

The original published version of canon 1158, §1 contained an erroneous cross-reference to canon 1127, §3. This erratum has since been corrected with a cross-reference to canon 1127, §2,[97] which deals with the authority of local ordinaries to grant dispensations from the obligation of observing the canonical form of marriage for mixed marriages. Although one might imagine cases of invalid mixed marriages for which the local ordinary might dispense to allow a convalidation according to "some public form" other than the canonical form,[98] cases when the civil authority or a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community recognizes the invalidity of a marriage and the need for its convalidation are relatively rare. Thus, Lüdicke suggests that the correct cross-reference should be to canon 1127, §1 according to which the convalidation of a marriage between a Catholic and an Eastern non-Catholic before the Eastern non-Catholic priest would be valid but illicit.[99]

Impediments That Cannot Be Proved

§2. If the impediment cannot be proven, it is sufficient that the party conscious of the impediment renews the consent privately and in secret, provided that the other perseveres in the consent offered; if the impediment is known to both parties, both are to renew the consent.

An impediment whose existence cannot be proven in the external forum is considered occult (c. 1074). If only one party is aware of the existence of the impediment, private and secret renewal of consent by that party alone is sufficient to convalidate the marriage, on condition that the other party has not withdrawn his or her consent. If both parties are aware of the unprovable impediment, then both must renew consent privately and secretly. No particular form needs to be observed for the private and secret renewal of consent in these cases. However, the party or parties renewing consent must be aware of the possible invalidity of the marriage and give a new act of consent. Private renewal of consent is insufficient, however, to convalidate marriages invalid because of impediments that are susceptible to proof but are not known in the region.

[97] Appendix, AAS 75 (1983) pars II, 324.

[98] Woestman, Special Marriage Cases, 85, n. 30.

[99] Lüdicke, in Münster Com 2: 1158/1–2, n. 4.

Marriages Invalid because of Defects of Consent

Canon 1159 — §1. A marriage which is invalid because of a defect of consent is convalidated if the party who did not consent now consents, provided that the consent given by the other party perseveres.

Since the consent of the parties gives rise to marriage and no human power can supply for the absence of this consent (c. 1057, §1), a marriage is invalid if the consent of one or both parties was substantially defective, even though the parties were bound by no impediment and observed the required form in the celebration of the marriage. Canons 1095–1105 catalogue the defects of consent that can invalidate marriage.[100] Simple convalidation of a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent presents a very different problem than does the convalidation of a marriage invalid because of a diriment impediment. In the latter case, presumably valid and perduring consent (c. 1107) was juridically inefficacious; in the former case, the consent itself was lacking. Thus, the critical issue is not the "renewal" of consent, but the supplying of consent that has been hitherto lacking.

Requirement of Consent

The convalidation of a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent requires that the party who had initially failed to consent altogether or whose original consent was fundamentally defective now give a true consent to the marriage. This consent must be a new act of the will that is distinct from the original and fundamentally flawed act that invalidated the marriage. This new or, more accurately, true act of consent can convalidate the marriage only if the original consent of the other spouse has continued without revocation. Since it is the mutual consent of the parties that constitutes marriage (c. 1057, §2), it is only when the true consent of the party whose original consent was defective is joined to the continuing consent of the other party that their consent is at least morally mutual.

Canon 1159, §1 does not repeat the stipulation of canon 1157 that the one proffering consent to a marriage invalid because of his or her defective consent know or at least think that the marriage is invalid. On the one hand, a person ignorant of the defect of consent and the consequent invalidity of the marriage has little motivation to give genuine consent. Although ignorance or error about the law or about a fact concerning oneself is not presumed (c. 15, §2), the jurisprudence on defects of consent is so complex that most non-specialists are ignorant of the juridic effect of their defective consent. Evidence of marital affection and satisfaction can be understood as a continuation and confirmation of consent to the invalid marriage. On the other hand, the experience of a satisfying union might prompt a person to substitute true consent for his or her originally defective consent. For example, a person who entered marriage invalidly because of a positive intention against the good of offspring may change his or her mind later and consent to a marriage ordered to their procreation and education.[101]

Manner of Giving Consent

§2. If the defect of consent cannot be proven, it is sufficient that the party who did not consent gives consent privately and in secret.

§3. If the defect of consent can be proven, the consent must be given in canonical form.

If the defect of consent cannot be proven in the external forum, the marriage is convalidated when the party responsible for the defect gives consent privately and secretly, provided the naturally sufficient consent of the other party perdures. This consent can be an internal act of the will with no additional external manifestation. However, if the defect of consent can be proven in the external forum, the marriage is convalidated by the external manifestation of the consent of the parties according to the canonical form.

[100] See the commentary on cc. 1095–1105.

[101] Cappello, n. 846.

Defects of Consent That Cannot Be Proven

The norms of the 1917 code governing the manner in which a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent was to be convalidated distinguished between cases in which the defect was merely internal and those in which it had been externally manifested, in either a public or an occult manner.[102] The revised code has abandoned this distinction between merely internal and externally manifested defects of consent in favor of a distinction between defects of consent that can be proven and those that cannot. However, changes in the canonical discipline governing the evaluation of proofs may have rendered this distinction unworkable in practice. Since the declaration or confession of a party or the testimony of one witness can provide full proof if fully corroborated by circumstantial evidence,[103] most, if not all, defects of consent are susceptible to proof, at least in principle.[104]

Despite the potential for proving most defects of consent, tribunal practitioners are aware that, in practice, proving these defects can be an arduous task. The primary purpose of requiring consent according to the canonical form when a defect of consent can be proven is to ensure public proof that a marriage known to be invalid from its origin has now been convalidated. Thus, a rule of thumb for determining whether a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent must be convalidated according to the canonical form might be whether knowledge of the defect of consent is sufficiently widespread that it would raise doubts about the validity of the marriage in the minds of members of the community if they were aware of the invalidating effects of such a defect.

In cases of marriages invalid because of an unprovable defect of consent, the law does not insist on the "renewal" of consent by the party whose original consent was naturally sufficient. Even if this party is aware of the defect of consent, all that is required for convalidation to be effective is that his or her original consent not be revoked. However, when the defect of consent can be proven, the party whose original consent was naturally sufficient must participate in the convalidation of the marriage according to the canonical form. However, canon 1159, §3 rather pointedly avoids saying that the party whose consent has perdured must "renew" that consent as canon 1158, §1 does. Therefore, this party's expression of his or her continuing consent is sufficient to convalidate the marriage.

The requirement that marriages invalid because of a defect of consent be convalidated according to the canonical form is clearly a matter of merely ecclesiastical law. Consequently, it does not bind non-Catholics when they convalidate marriages with other non-Catholics. All that is necessary is that the party whose consent was originally defective purge the defect and give true internal consent privately and secretly. This consent can be expressed explicitly in the form of a conscious intention or implicitly in a pattern of behavior expressive of marital intent.[105] Consequently, tribunal practitioners need to exercise caution when evaluating marriages of two non-Catholics which endured many years despite a somewhat rocky beginning. Especially when the proposed ground is the lack of due discretion, one or both parties may well have purged the defect and implicitly consented to marriage once the early turmoil subsided.

[102] CIC 1136, §§2–3.

[103] See the commentary on cc. 1536–1537 and 1572–1573.

[104] M. Pompedda, "La questione dell'ammissione ai sacramenti dei divorziati civilmente risposati," in Studi di diritto matrimoniale canonico (Milan: Giuffrè, 1993) 503–506.

[105] Brennan, 81.

Marriages Invalid because of Defect of Canonical Form

Canon 1160 — A marriage which is null because of defect of form must be contracted anew in canonical form in order to become valid, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1127, §2.

The phrase "defect of form" has two senses in canon law. In a narrow sense it refers to the absence of some essential element (e.g., the faculty to witness the marriage on the part of the Church's official witness) from the celebration of a marriage according to the canonical form. In a broad sense, it refers to the complete failure to observe the canonical form (e.g., when one bound by the form marries before a civil official). Traditional canonists held that a marriage invalid because of a defect of form in the narrow sense had the appearance or semblance of marriage (species seu figura formae matrimonii), but a marriage invalid because of a defect of form in the broad sense did not. When a Catholic contracted marriage before a civil official or a non-Catholic minister, the union was considered the equivalent of mere concubinage. Thus, these unions were not subject to convalidation in the proper sense; they could be rendered valid only if the parties contracted marriage anew as if for the first time.

Since the distinction between the narrow and broad senses of "defect of form" is still operative in the revised code,[106] some authors have continued to view unions contracted by Catholics without the observance of canonical form as mere concubinage.[107] However, John Paul II has insisted that civil marriages by Catholics cannot simply be identified with mere concubinage:

> Their situation cannot of course be likened to that of people simply living together without any bond at all, because in the present case there is at least a certain commitment to a properly defined and probably stable form of life.... By seeking public recognition of their bond on the part of the State, such couples show that they are ready to accept not only its advantages but also its obligations.[108]

Moreover, the Church's long-standing practice of granting radical sanations of civil marriages involving Catholics suggests that these unions are something more than mere concubinage. They have enough of an appearance of marriage to be considered invalid marriages subject to simple convalidation.

Contracting a Marriage Anew

Whether a marriage is invalid because of a defect of form in the narrow or the broad sense, the requirements for simple convalidation are the same: the parties must contract marriage anew (denuo) according to the canonical form. Commentators on canon 1137 of the 1917 code agreed that to contract marriage anew the parties had to recognize the possible invalidity of their marriage and elicit a new act of consent.[109] This position was adopted in Rotal jurisprudence.[110] Canon 1160 of the present code repeats canon 1137 of the previous code almost verbatim.[111] Hence, it should apparently be interpreted "in accord with canonical tradition" (c. 6, §2).

[106] See PCILT, reply, June 26, 1984, AAS 76 (1984) 747; CLD 11, 351.

[107] Lüdicke, in Münster Com, 1160/1, n. 2; Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 729.

[108] FC 82.

[109] See L. Bender, Forma iuridica celebrationis matrimonii (Rome: Desclée, 1960) 218.

[110] See coram Wynen, June 1, 1940, SRRDec 32 (1940) 432; and coram Rogers, January 21, 1969, SRRDec 61 (1969) 63–67.

[111] Canon 1160 speaks of "canonical form" rather than "legitimate form" as a recognition of the fact that this norm no longer binds baptized non-Catholics when they marry other non-Catholics. Its cross-reference to canon 1127, §2 is new but does not in any way alter the sense of the canon.

Since the promulgation of the revised code, some have argued that, in virtue of canon 11, non-Catholics are no longer bound to renew consent to convalidate their marriages with Catholics. This argument, which ignores the clear sense of canon 1059, is seriously flawed and is insufficient to give rise to a doubt of law.[112] Others argue that it is illegitimate to apply the requirements of 1157 for the renewal of consent in cases of the convalidation of marriages invalid due to a diriment impediment to cases of convalidation of marriages invalid due to a defect of form.[113] They are correct that the context of canon 1157 is the norms governing the convalidations of marriages invalid because of impediments and that, at least in the present law, defect of form is not classified as an impediment. Nevertheless, it is incorrect to conclude that the requirements of canon 1157 for the renewal of consent are irrelevant for the convalidation of marriages vitiated by a defect of form. These requirements are implicit in canon 1160.

Canon 1160 requires for the convalidation of a marriage invalid because of a defect of form that the marriage be contracted anew (denuo) according to the canonical form. In five of the other six uses of denuo in the revised code, the term refers to a juridic act that is both materially and formally distinct from a previous one.[114] An act of consent that is both materially and formally distinct from the original consent can only be a new act of the will. It is highly unlikely, if not psychologically impossible, that a person will elicit such a new act of the will unless he or she is aware that the marriage may be invalid. Since the promulgation of the revised code, the Rota has reaffirmed the requirement that a person convalidating a marriage invalid due to defect of form recognize the possible invalidity of the marriage and proffer a new consent.[115]

Pastoral Problems Arising from the Law

The requirements for renewal of consent in cases of marriages invalid because of a defect of form create a difficult pastoral challenge. Since neither ignorance nor error prevents invalidating laws from having their effect (c. 15, §1), many non-Catholics in invalid marriages with Catholics and non-practicing or ill-informed Catholics do not in fact, and perhaps cannot, effect the simple convalidation of their marriages. The problem Johnson described in 1982 remains a problem today:

> The pastor who softens the language of the law, who tries to suggest that the parties are simply receiving the Church's blessing on their union, is only complicating the situation. . . . The sensitive priest might shrink from confronting the couple with the harshness of the law's view of their situation. The more delicate his exposition of the matter, however, the less likely he is to bring the parties to the subjective state out of which a new act of consent can arise. Bluntness appears to be what the law demands, and the pastoral consequences of such bluntness can be unfortunate.[116]

[112] See note 86 above. The fact that several reputable canonists advance an erroneous interpretation of the law is not, in itself, sufficient to give rise to a doubt of law.

[113] J. O'Rourke, "Considerations on the Convalidation of Marriage," J 43 (1983) 390.

[114] See cc. 293 (on a person who has lost the clerical state being ascribed denuo as a cleric); 921, §2 (on a person who has already received holy communion receiving it denuo on the same day as Viaticum); 1004, §2 (on repetition of the anointing of the sick after a person who has recovered falls into a serious sickness denuo); 1505, §3 (on submitting denuo an amended petition after the original was rejected because of technical defects); 1570 (on calling witnesses who have already testified for examination denuo); and 1705, §3 (on submitting denuo a petition for a dissolution of a ratified but not consummated marriage after the original petition was rejected by the Holy See). Although denuo does not refer to a juridic act in c. 1004, §2, it does refer to a new personal health crisis distinct from the one that prompted the original anointing.

[115] Coram Funghini, June 30, 1988, SRRDec 80 (1988) 440–444.

[116] Johnson, "The 'Simple' Convalidation," 478–479.

The norms governing renewal of consent in these cases are merely ecclesiastical law—and rather recent ecclesiastical law at that. If the pastoral consequences of this law are unacceptable, perhaps the time has come to change it.

ARTICLE 2: RADICAL SANATION [cc. 1161–1165]

Historical Synopsis

The origins of the institute of radical sanation are shrouded in the mists of history.[117] It arose out of a desire to legitimate children born of marriages invalid because of impediments, who suffered serious civil and ecclesiastical disabilities because of their status. In the Middle Ages, it was generally conceded that the Church could legitimate children insofar as spiritual effects were concerned, but to legitimate them insofar as temporal effects were concerned seemed a usurpation of the power of civil authorities. What was needed was an approach to legitimation that avoided a direct confrontation between Church and State.

Joannes Andrea (d. 1348) is generally credited, if not with the invention of radical sanation, at least with its first systematic articulation.[118] At the time, all sides conceded that the Church had exclusive jurisdiction over the sacrament of marriage. Since the Church could cause marriages to be invalid by establishing diriment impediments and could dispense from these impediments, Joannes Andrea reasoned that the Church could dispense from an impediment that had already invalidated a marriage in a way that allowed the dispensation to undo the consequences the impediment had previously wrought. Thus, by healing or validating the marriage directly at its root, the Church could indirectly legitimate the offspring of the marriage. There was precedent for this approach since the Church had often retroactively abrogated or dispensed from other ecclesiastical laws.

Because of its origin and purpose, this institute was first called "the fullest legitimation" (legitimatio plenissima). Later it became known as a "dispensation in the root" (dispensatio in radice) and ultimately a "healing in the root" (sanatio in radice). At first, the institute was used to validate marriages in particular cases, usually to permit the succession to the throne of the illegitimate offspring of invalidly married monarchs. In time, however, it was used to give a general validation of numerous marriages invalidly contracted during turbulent times. Thus, in 1554, Julius III delegated the legate Reginald Pole to sanate marriages invalidly contracted during the reign of Henry VIII in England, and in 1801 and again in 1809 Pius VII granted general sanations of invalid marriages contracted during the turmoil following the French Revolution.[119]

Since the institute of radical sanation rests on the Church's power to establish, abrogate, and dispense from ecclesiastical law, it was originally used to validate marriages invalid because of an impediment of ecclesiastical law and later a defect of canonical form. However, in 1890, the Holy See began granting radical sanations of marriages invalid because of the divine law impediment of prior bond, when the impediment had ceased. The practice was curtailed in 1904 when the Holy Office declared that the Church lacks the power to grant radical sanations of marriages invalid because of a divine law impediment.[120] However, Cardinal Gasparri convinced Pius X to incorporate into the 1917 code a formulation that somewhat weakened the Holy Office's declaration. Canon 1139, §2 of the 1917 code declared not that the Church cannot sanate marriages invalid because of an impediment of divine law but that it does not do so.[121] However, practice soon outstripped theory. The Holy See's

[117] See R. Harrigan, The Radical Sanation of Invalid Marriages, CanLawStud 116 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1938) 19–42.

[118] Ioannes Andrea, glos. ord. to Clem. 3.17.cap.unic. ad v. Pro infectis.

[119] Harrigan, 28–34.

[120] CICFontes, n. 1270.

[121] Harrigan, 36–38.

practice of sanating marriages invalid because of the impediment of prior bond despite the explicit norm of canon 1139, §2 of the 1917 code was first formalized in law in Paul VI's 1966 motu proprio De episcoporum muneribus.[122]

The authority to grant a radical sanation was originally articulated as a power proper to the Roman Pontiff. In the course of time, this power was exercised on his behalf by various offices of the Roman Curia. By the nineteenth century, this power had been widely delegated for individual cases to diocesan bishops in the form of quinquennial faculties. In the 1963 motu proprio Pastorale munus, Paul VI listed the power to sanate marriages in certain cases among the faculties that belong by right to the diocesan bishop.[123] Three years later, he recognized the power to sanate marriages in individual cases as belonging by right to the office of the diocesan bishop and reserved to the Holy See the sanation of marriages only in cases where the marriage is invalid because of an impediment whose dispensation is reserved to the Holy See or is of divine law and where the conditions for the celebration of a mixed marriage have not been met.

The Nature of Radical Sanation

Canon 1161 — §1. The radical sanation of an invalid marriage is its convalidation without the renewal of consent, which is granted by competent authority and entails the dispensation from an impediment, if there is one, and from canonical form, if it was not observed, and the retroactivity of canonical effects.

§2. Convalidation occurs at the moment of the granting of the favor. Retroactivity, however, is understood to extend to the moment of the celebration of the marriage unless other provision is expressly made.

§3. A radical sanation is not to be granted unless it is probable that the parties wish to persevere in conjugal life.

A radical sanation is a fiction of law by which competent ecclesiastical authority renders retroactively valid a marriage which was invalid from its origin without the renewal of consent by either party. An essential precondition for a radical sanation is that both parties gave naturally sufficient but juridically inefficacious consent to marriage in the past and that this consent continues into the present. In addition, the obstacle to the juridic efficacy of the parties' consent must be removed either by its dispensation or by its cessation. Since by definition a radical sanation entails a dispensation from any impediment of ecclesiastical law that may have caused the invalidity of the marriage and from the parties' obligation to renew consent, the rescript granting the sanation need not explicitly mention these dispensations. However, the one granting the sanation must have the authority to dispense from the impediment at issue.

Effect of Radical Sanation

The effect of a radical sanation is to render a marriage valid not only from the moment the sanation is granted but from the moment naturally sufficient consent was initially given. Unless the law asserts an express provision to the contrary, the radical sanation makes the validity of a marriage retroactive to its beginning. Canon 1162, §2 expressly limits the retroactive effect of the sanation of a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent on the part of one or both parties to the moment when true consent was given by both parties. Commentators on the 1917 code generally held that, since the Church cannot dispense from the impediment of prior bond, it could grant a radical sanation of a marriage invalid because of this impediment only to the time when the impediment ceased.[124] The revised code makes no such express provision limiting the scope of a radical sanation of a marriage invalid because of a divine law impediment that has now ceased.

[122] EM 18.
[123] PM 21–22.
[124] Harrigan, 96–99.

Since a radical sanation can be granted validly only if the naturally sufficient consent of both parties has perdured, an effort must be made to ascertain that the original consent has not been revoked before a sanation is granted. Chronic marital instability or long-standing marital problems may be signs that the original consent has been revoked by one or both parties. Thus, canon 1161, §3 cautions that a radical sanation is not to be granted unless it seems probable that the couple intends to persevere in conjugal life. Well-meaning pastoral ministers ignore this caution when they seek a radical sanation to allow a return to the sacraments by an invalidly married Catholic whose partner has refused to convalidate the union by renewal of consent. Despite its "pastoral" intent, this approach may make the last state of the person worse than the first.

RADICAL SANATION IN VARIOUS CIRCUMSTANCES

1. Sanation and Defective Consent

Canon 1162 — §1. A marriage cannot be radically sanated if consent is lacking in either or both of the parties, whether the consent was lacking from the beginning or, though present in the beginning, was revoked afterwards.

§2. If this consent was indeed lacking from the beginning but was given afterwards, the sanation can be granted from the moment the consent was given.

Since no human power can supply consent that was withheld or fundamentally flawed, a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent cannot be the subject of a radical sanation as long as that defect continues. Nor can a radical sanation be granted if the party whose original consent was defective gives true consent only after the other party has withdrawn his or her consent. A radical sanation of a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent is possible after the party whose consent was defective gives consent as long as the consent of the other party endures. However, the sanation is retroactive only to the moment when the true consent was given.

Since a simple convalidation of a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent that cannot be proven in the external forum requires only that the party responsible for the defect of consent give true consent privately and secretly (c. 1159, §2), a radical sanation will rarely if ever be employed for the validation of these marriages. In these cases, the intervention of ecclesiastical authority would be superfluous. However, a radical sanation might be employed to validate a marriage invalid because of a defect of consent that can be proved in the external forum but now is healed, when one party refuses to consent according to the canonical form.

2. Sanation and Impediments or Defect of Form

Canon 1163 — §1. A marriage which is invalid because of an impediment or a defect of legitimate form can be sanated provided that the consent of each party perseveres.

§2. A marriage which is invalid because of an impediment of natural law or of divine positive law can be sanated only after the impediment has ceased.

One effect of a radical sanation is an implicit dispensation from ecclesiastical law impediments that prevented consent from having juridic effect. However, the dispensation from some of these impediments and, therefore, the radical sanation of marriages invalid because of them are reserved to the Apostolic See. The implied dispensation is effective from the time of the original consent.

A radical sanation does not dispense from impediments considered to be based in divine law, whether natural or positive. These impediments are: prior bond, antecedent and perpetual impotence, and consanguinity in the direct line and up to and including the second degree of the collateral line (i.e., brother-sister). For the granting of a radical sanation of a marriage invalid because of one of these impediments, the impediment must first cease. The impediment of prior bond ceases with the death of the first spouse or the dissolution of the bond by competent authority.[125] The impediment of impotence may cease in some cases after surgery or some other form of medical treatment that moral theologians would consider extraordinary means. Of its nature, the impediment of consanguinity does not cease.

A marriage that is invalid solely because of lack of form in either the narrow or the broad sense can be the subject of a radical sanation. Indeed, radical sanation may be the only practical method of validating a marriage invalid because of a defect of form when one of the parties will not or cannot contract marriage anew according to the canonical form. Nevertheless, care should be taken to ensure that the party's refusal to renew consent does not indicate the revocation of his or her original consent.

3. Sanation without the Awareness of the Parties

Canon 1164 — A sanation can be granted validly even if either or both of the parties do not know of it; nevertheless, it is not to be granted except for a grave cause.

A radical sanation is often granted at the request of one or both parties to an invalid marriage to regularize their union in the eyes of the Church and to allow them to return to the reception of the sacraments. If only one party requests the sanation, the other party does not have to be informed or even aware of the granting of the sanation. What is critical is that the naturally sufficient consent of both parties continues at the time the radical sanation is granted.

The parties do not have to be present at the granting of the sanation nor is its effect dependent on their acceptance of it. In fact, a radical sanation can be granted without the knowledge of either party. Since a radical sanation is a favor, it does not necessarily presuppose a request on the part of the parties. It can be granted ex officio by competent ecclesiastical authority. Often, a radical sanation is granted to correct invalidating defects for which the parties are not responsible and about which they are totally ignorant. For example, a parish minister may discover after the wedding that he neglected to seek a dispensation from an impediment or from the observance of canonical form, that he lacked the faculty to witness the marriage, or that only one other witness was present at the celebration. A radical sanation heals these defects without disturbing the consciences of the parties.

The longer the time between the celebration of the marriage and the discovery of an invalidating defect, the riskier the granting of radical sanations ex officio becomes. With the passage of time, the difficulties and trials of married life can prompt one or both parties whose original consent was naturally sufficient to revoke it. If consent has been withdrawn by even one party, the radical sanation is without effect.

Competence to Grant Sanations

Canon 1165 — §1. The Apostolic See can grant a radical sanation.

§2. The diocesan bishop can grant a radical sanation in individual cases even if there are several reasons for nullity in the same marriage, after the conditions mentioned in can. 1125 for the sanation of a mixed marriage have been fulfilled. He cannot grant one, however, if there is an impediment whose dispensation is reserved to the Apostolic See according to the norm of can. 1078, §2, or if it concerns an impediment of natural law or divine positive law which has now ceased.

The institute of radical sanation was given its first coherent juridic articulation during the height of medieval papal absolutism. As a result, the power to grant a radical sanation was traditionally reserved to the Roman Pontiff or to the curial offices that exercised the power in his name. However, especially during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the power was delegated to papal legates, missionaries, and diocesan bishops in the form of habitual faculties.

[125] See the commentary on cc. 1141–1150.

Sanations of Multiple Marriages

In the current law, only the Apostolic See can grant a general sanation of a number of marriages simultaneously. This power has usually been exercised only to restore ecclesial order and peace after an extended period of social and ecclesial turmoil resulting in numerous invalid marriages, e.g., during the Catholic restoration under Mary Tudor in sixteenth century England and in the aftermath of the Revolution in early nineteenth century France. The Apostolic See also retains the authority, in some cases the exclusive authority, to grant radical sanations in individual cases. However, even the Apostolic See can grant radical sanations only on condition that the naturally sufficient consent of both parties continues in existence.

Sanations by Authority of the Diocesan Bishop

The power to grant radical sanations in individual cases, but only in individual cases, is now understood to be inherent in the office of the diocesan bishop. The power is reserved to diocesan bishops and those equivalent to them in law[126] and is not granted by the law to local ordinaries such as vicars as is much of the authority to dispense in matrimonial matters (e.g., cc. 1078, §1; 1127, §2). Nevertheless, the granting of a radical sanation is an exercise of executive power which can be freely delegated by the diocesan bishop.

The granting of radical sanations is governed by the general norms governing the exercise of executive power. While it can be exercised whether the diocesan bishop or his delegate is present in the diocese or not, it can be exercised validly only on behalf of "subjects," i.e., those who have a domicile or quasi-domicile in the diocese, and travelers who are actually present in the diocese at the time the sanation is granted (c. 136). Thus, if a couple returns to a diocese in which they no longer reside to celebrate their marriage but the official witness fails to obtain the necessary faculty to witness the marriage, the bishop of the diocese where the marriage was celebrated cannot grant a radical sanation of this marriage invalid because of a defect of form, unless perchance the couple happens to be still de facto present there.

The competent diocesan bishop can grant a radical sanation of an invalid marriage between a Catholic and a non-Catholic, whether baptized or not, only if the conditions for a mixed marriage (c. 1125) have been met. If these conditions have not been met, the case must be referred to the CDF.

Sanations Reserved to the Apostolic See

The authority of a diocesan bishop to grant radical sanations in individual cases is also restricted to the limits of his dispensing power over matrimonial impediments. Marriages invalid because of impediments whose dispensation is reserved to the Apostolic See can be sanated only by the same Apostolic See. The impediments whose dispensation is reserved to the Apostolic See are those arising from sacred orders, from a public and perpetual vow of chastity in a pontifical religious institute, and from the conjugicide defined in canon 1090 (c. 1078, §2). The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments can dispense from the impediments of sacred orders and crime; the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life from the impediment of a perpetual vow.[127] Petitions for radical sanations of marriages invalid because of these impediments should be directed to these congregations or, in occult or non-public cases, to the Apostolic Penitentiary.

[126] See cc. 381, §2 and 368 and the commentary on these canons for an explanation of those considered equivalent in law to the diocesan bishop.

[127] In practice, the impediment arising from a perpetual vow of chastity in a pontifical religious institute is not dispensed directly. Rather, the petitioner is granted a dispensation from his or her vows as part of an indult of departure from the institute. With the dispensation from vows, the impediment ceases. See cc. 691–692.

Also reserved to the Apostolic See is the radical sanation of marriages invalid because of a divine law impediment which has now ceased. Marriages invalid because of the impediment of prior bond are the most common, if not the only, cases involving divine law impediments for which radical sanations are sought. If one party to the invalid marriage is a Catholic, the invalidity is usually compounded by lack of form. However, the fact that the marriage is also invalid because of lack of form does not empower the diocesan bishop to grant a radical sanation. The request for a sanation should be directed instead to the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments with proof of the cessation of the impediment (certificate of death of the first spouse, other proof of death, or an authentic document verifying an ecclesiastical dissolution of the marriage), an explanation of the serious reasons why a simple convalidation is not possible, and the votum of the diocesan bishop regarding the merits of the petition.

A declaration of nullity of a first marriage acknowledges that there never was a true impediment of prior bond. If one party to a marriage that has been declared null has subsequently entered a civil marriage and a party to this second marriage was bound to observe the canonical form, the only real cause for the invalidity of this second marriage is the lack of form. Therefore, it can be radically sanated by the diocesan bishop if one of the parties refuses to contract the marriage anew according to canonical form.[128]

[128] If a party to a marriage that has been declared null is a non-Catholic who has entered a second marriage with another non-Catholic but who now is seeking baptism in or reception into full communion with the Catholic Church, neither a simple convalidation nor a radical sanation is necessary to achieve ecclesial recognition of the second marriage, as long as the new spouse was free to marry. The declaration of nullity recognizes that the person was not bound by the impediment of prior bond when he or she entered the second marriage. All things being equal, the second marriage is presumed valid.

(The material listed below serves as a comprehensive bibliography for title VII of Book IV—canons 1055–1165.)

MARRIAGE IN GENERAL

Books

Brooke, C. The Medieval Idea of Marriage. Oxford: Clarendon, 1989.

Brundage, J. Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe. Chicago: University of Chicago, 1987.

Cappello, F. Tractatus Canonico-Moralis de Sacramentis. Vol. 5: De Matrimonio. Rome: Marietti, 1961.

Gasparri, P. Tractatus Canonicus de Matrimonio. Vatican City: Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1932.

Gramunt, I., J. Hervada, and L. Wauck. Canons and Commentaries on Marriage. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1987.

Kasper, W. Theology of Christian Marriage. New York: Seabury, 1980.

McAreavey, J. The Canon Law of Marriage and the Family. Dublin: Four Courts, 1997.

Mackin, T. Divorce and Remarriage. New York: Paulist, 1984.

———. The Marital Sacrament. New York: Paulist, 1989.

———. What Is Marriage? New York: Paulist, 1982.

Il matrimonio sacramento nell'ordinamento canonico vigente. Studi giuridici 31. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1993.

Mendonça, A. Rotal Anthology: An Annotated Index of Rotal Decisions from 1971 to 1988. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992.

La nuova legislazione matrimoniale canonica. Studi giuridici 10. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1986.

Örsy, L. Marriage in Canon Law: Texts and Comments, Reflections and Questions. Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier, 1986.

Reynolds, P. Marriage in the Western Church. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994.

Schillebeeckx, E. Marriage: Secular Reality and Saving Mystery. 2 vols. London: Sheed and Ward, 1965.

Wrenn, L. The Invalid Marriage. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1998.

———, trans. Law Sections. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1994.

Articles

Burke, C. "The Sacramentality of Marriage: Canonical Reflections." ME 119 (1994) 545–565.

Caffara, C. "Marriage as a Reality in the Order of Creation and Marriage as a Sacrament." In Contemporary Perspectives on Christian Marriage, ed. R. Malone and J. Connery, 119–132. Chicago: Loyola University, 1984.

Decanay, A. N. "Matrimonium ratum: significatio termini." P 79 (1990) 69–89.

Errazuriz, C. "La rilevanza canonica della sacramentalità del matrimonio e della sua dimensione familiare." Ius Ecclesiae 7 (1996) 561–572.

Finn, R. C. "Faith and the Sacrament of Marriage: General Conclusions from a Historical Study." In Marriage Studies III, ed. T. Doyle, 95–111. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1985.

Gherro, S. "Sulla sacramentalità del matrimonio (in fieri e in facto)." Ius Ecclesiae 7 (1995) 573–578.

Hendriks, J. "Battesimo, fede e sacramentalità del matrimonio (c. 1055 §2)." Ius Ecclesiae 8 (1996) 663–676.

Himes, M. J. "The Intrinsic Sacramentality of Marriage: The Theological Ground for the Inseparability of Validity and Sacramentality." J 50 (1990) 198–220.

International Theological Commission. "Propositions on the Doctrine of Christian Marriage. Origins 8 (1978–1979) 235–239.

Lawler, M. G. "Faith, Contract, and Sacrament in Christian Marriage: A Theological Approach." TS 52 (1991) 712–731.

McAreavey, J. "Faith and the Validity of Marriage." Irish Theological Quarterly 59 (1993) 177–187.

McManus, F. R. "The Ministers of the Sacrament of Marriage in the Western Tradition." Stud Can 20 (1986) 85–104.

O'Callaghan, D. "Faith and the Sacrament of Marriage." Irish Theological Quarterly 52 (1986) 161–179.

Pompedda, M. "Faith and the Sacrament of Marriage: Lack of Faith and Matrimonial Consent: Juridical Aspects." In Marriage Studies IV, ed. J. Alesandro, 33–65. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1990.

———. "Mancanza di fede e consenso matrimoniale." In Studi di diritto matrimoniale canonico, 399–448.

Reynolds, L. "Marriage, Sacramental and Indissoluble: Sources of the Catholic Doctrine." Downside Review 109 (1991) 105–150.

PRELIMINARY NORMS

Books

Il "bonum coniugum" nel matrimonio canonico. Studi giuridici 40. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1996.

Navarrete, U. Structura Iuridica Matrimonii Secundum Concilium Vaticanum II. Rome: Gregorian University, 1968.

Scicluna, C. The Essential Definition of Marriage according to the 1917 and 1983 Codes of Canon Law. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1995.

Articles

Burke, C. "The 'Bonum Coniugum' and the 'Bonum Prolis': Ends or Properties of Marriage?" J 49 (1989) 704–713.

Carreras, J. "Il 'bonum coniugum' oggetto del consenso matrimoniale." Ius Ecclesiae 6 (1994) 117–158.

Fagiolo, V. "Le proprietà essenziali del matrimonio." ME 119 (1993) 145–178.

Pfnausch, E. "The Good of the Spouses in Rotal Jurisprudence: New Horizons?" J 56 (1996) 527–558.

Wrenn, L. "Refining the Essence of Marriage." J 46 (1986) 532–551.

CHAPTER I: Pastoral Care and Those Things Which Must Precede the Celebration of Marriage

Articles

Lawler, M. "Doing Marriage Preparation Right." America, December 30, 1995, 12–15.

Provost, J. "Marriage Preparation in the New Code: Canon 1063 and the Novus Habitus Mentis." In Ius Sequitur Vitam, ed. J. Provost and K. Walf, 173–192. Louvain: Leuven University, 1991.

CHAPTER II: Diriment Impediments in General

Books

Gli impedimenti al matrimonio canonico. Studi giuridici 19. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1989.

Waterhouse, J. The Power of the Local Ordinary to Impose a Matrimonial Ban. CanLawStud 317. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1952.

CHAPTER III: Diriment Impediments Specifically

Books

Ameriso, F. El fundamento del impedimento de edad. Rome: Athenaeum Sanctae Crucis, 1995.

Articles

Candelier, G. "Impuissance: Empêchement et signe d'une incapacité." RDC 44 (1994) 93–145.

Johnson, J. "Ligamen and Multiple Marriages." J 42 (1982) 222–228.

CHAPTER IV: Matrimonial Consent

C. 1095

Books

Keating, J. The Bearing of Mental Impairment on the Validity of Marriage. Rome: Gregorian University, 1973.

L'immaturità psico-affettiva nella giurisprudenza della Rota Romana. Studi giuridici 23. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1990.

Pompedda, M. Studi di diritto matrimoniale canonico. Milan: Giuffré, 1993.

Sable, R. M., ed. Incapacity for Marriage: Jurisprudence and Interpretation. Acts of the III Gregorian Colloquium. Rome: Pontificia Università Gregoriana, 1987.

Articles

Aznar Gil, F. R. "Incapacidad de asumir (c. 1095.3) y jurisprudencia de la Rota Romana." REDC 53 (1996) 15–65.

Bauhoff, R., and A. Mendonça. "Psychic Impotence." Stud Can 24 (1990) 205–240, 293–333.

Burke, C. "Some Reflections on Canon 1095." ME 117 (1992) 133–150.

Burke, R. "Canon 1095: Canonical Doctrine and Jurisprudence, Part I: Canon 1095.1 and 2." CLSAP 48 (1986) 94–107.

———. "Lack of Discretion of Judgement: Canonical Doctrine and Legislation." J 45 (1985) 171–209.

Egan, E. "The Nullity of Marriage for Reason of Insanity or Lack of Due Discretion of Judgment." EIC 39 (1983) 9–53.

Errazuriz, C. J. "Riflessioni sulla capacità consensuale nel matrimonio canonico." Ius Ecclesiae 6 (1994) 449–464.

Fellhauer, D. "Canon 1095: Canonical Doctrine and Jurisprudence, Part II: Canon 1095.3." CLSAP 48 (1986) 107–117.

Ferme, B. "The Shifting Boundaries on Incapacity for Marriage." Forum 3 (1992) 25–43.

Gramunt, I., and L. Wauck. "Capacity and Incapacity to Contract Marriage." Stud Can 22 (1988) 147–168.

———. "Lack of Due Discretion—Incapacity or Error?" IC 32 (1992) 533–558.

McGrath, A. "On the Gravity of Causes of a Psychological Nature in the Proof of Incapacity to Assume the Essential Obligations of Marriage." Stud Can 22 (1988) 67–75.

Mendonça, A. "Consensual Incapacity for Marriage." J 54 (1992) 477–569.

———. "The Effect of Paranoid Personality Disorder on Matrimonial Consent." Stud Can 18 (1984) 253–289.

———. "The Effects of Multiple Sclerosis on Matrimonial Consent." Stud Can 21 (1987) 429–450.

———. "The Incapacity to Contract Marriage: Canon 1095." Stud Can 19 (1985) 259–325.

———. "Narcissistic Personality Disorder: Possible Effects on Matrimonial Consent." Stud Can 27 (1993) 97–143.

———. "Recent Jurisprudence on the Effects of Mood Disorders and Neuroses on Matrimonial Consent." In Unico Ecclesiae servitio, ed. M. Thériault and J. Thorn, 148–179. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1991.

———. "Recent Rotal Jurisprudence on the Effects of Sexual Disorders on Matrimonial Consent." Stud Can 26 (1992) 209–233.

———. "Recent Trends in Rotal Jurisprudence." Stud Can 28 (1994) 167–230.

———, and N. Sangal. "The Effects of Anorexia and Bulimia Nervosa on Marital Consent." ME 121 (1996) 539–610.

Pavanello, P. "Il requisito della perpetuità nell'incapacità di assumere le obbligazioni essenziali del matrimonio (c. 1095.3)." P 83 (1994) 119–144.

Pompedda, M. "De incapacitate assumendi obligationes matrimonii essentiales." P 75 (1986) 129–152.

———. "Lecture du canon 1095 du Code de 1983." AC 35 (1992) 259–284.

Provost, J. H. "Canon 1095: Past, Present, Future." J 54 (1994) 81–112.

Sabbattani, A. "L'évolution de la jurisprudence dans les causes de nullité de mariage pour incapacité psychique." Stud Can 1 (1967) 143–161.

Sangal, N. "The Effects of Incest on Matrimonial Consent." Stud Can 30 (1996) 5–30.

Sanson, R. "Narcissistic Personality Disorder: Possible Effects on the Validity of Marital Consent." ME 113 (1988) 541–581; 114 (1989) 405–424.

C. 1096

Parisella, I. "Ignoranza 'in re matrimoniali.'" EIC 43–44 (1987–1988) 17–32.

Sherba, J. "Canon 1096: Ignorance as a Ground for Nullity." CLSAP 59 (1997) 282–299.

C. 1097

Carmignani Caridi, S. "The Error Personae vel Qualitatis Personae in Rotal Jurisprudence." Forum 3 (1992) 67–96.

Hennessey, P. "Canon 1097: A Requiem for Error Redundans?" J 49 (1989) 146–181.

Hilbert, M. "Error in qualitate personae (c. 1097, §2)." P 87 (1998) 403–442.

Navarrete, U. "Error circa personam et error circa qualitates communes seu non identificantes personam (c. 1097)." P 82 (1993) 639–667.

———. "Error in persona (c. 1097, §1)." P 87 (1998) 351–401.

C. 1098

Bonnet, H. "Quelques pistes nouvelles pour le dol en matière de mariage." AC 35 (1992) 147–179.

Canale, G. "Primi contributi della giurisprudenza rotale alla configurazione del dolo come vizio del consenso matrimoniale." Il Diritto Ecclesiastico 104 (1993) 343–360.

Cuneo, J. J. "Deceit/Error of Person as a Caput nullitatis." CLSAP 45 (1983) 154–166.

Gressier, G. "La nullité du mariage conclu sous l'effet du dol qualifié du canon 1098 est de droit naturel." Stud Can 30 (1996) 343–370.

Gullo, C. "Riflessioni sulla retroattività del can. 1098." Ius Ecclesiae 4 (1992) 225–234.

Johnson, J. "Fraud and Deceit in the Roman Rota: The First Ten Years." J 56 (1996) 557–585.

———. "On the Retroactive Force of Canon 1098." Stud Can 23 (1989) 61–83.

Navarrete, U. "Canon 1098 de errore doloso estne iuris naturalis an iuris positivi ecclesiastici?" P 76 (1987) 161–181.

Vann, K. "Dolus: Canon 1098 of the Revised Code of Canon Law." J 47 (1987) 371–393.

C. 1099

Boccafola, K. "Error Concerning Sacramental Dignity: Limits of the Object and Proof." Forum 7 (1996) 305–325.

Campbell, D. M. "Canon 1099: The Emergence of a New Juridic Figure." Quaderni Studio Rotale 5 (1990) 35–72.

Grocholewski, Z. "De errore circa matrimonii unitatem, indissolubilitatem et sacramentalem dignitatem." P 84 (1995) 395–418.

Kowal, J. "L'erore circa la proprietà essenziale o la dignità sacramentale del matrimonio (c. 1099)." P 87 (1998) 287–327.

Navarrete, U. "De sensu clausulae 'Dummodo non determinet voluntatem' can. 1099." P 81 (1992) 469–493.

Provost, J. "Error as a Ground in Marriage Nullity Cases." CLSAP 57 (1995) 306–324.

Stankiewicz, A. "De errore voluntatem determinante (can. 1099) iuxta rotalem iurisprudentiam." P 78 (1990) 441–494.

———. "L'errore di diritto nel consenso matrimoniale e la sua autonomia giuridica." P 83 (1994) 635–668.

C. 1101

Books

La simulazione del consenso matrimoniale canonico. Studi giuridici 22. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1990.

Jenkins, R. Recent Rotal Jurisprudence on Simulation contra Bonum Sacramenti by an Implicit Act of the Will. CanLawStud 551. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1999.

Articles

Dewhirst, J. A. "Consortium vitae, bonum coniugum, and their Relation to Simulation." J 55 (1995) 794–812.

Faltin, D. "The Exclusion of the Sacramentality of Marriage with Particular Reference to the Marriage of Baptized Non-believers." In Marriage Studies IV, ed. J. Alesandro, 66–104. Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1990.

Grocholewski, Z. "L'esclusione della dignità sacramentale del matrimonio come capo autonomo di nullità matrimoniale." ME 121 (1996) 223–239.

Johnson, J. "Total Simulation in Recent Rotal Jurisprudence." Stud Can 24 (1990) 383–425.

Kitchen, P. "Matrimonial Intention and Simulation." Stud Can 28 (1994) 347–406.

Mendonça, A. "Exclusion of the Sacramentality of Marriage: Recent Trends in Rotal Jurisprudence." Stud Can 31 (1997) 5–48.

Pfnausch, E. "The Good of the Spouses in Rotal Jurisprudence: New Horizons?" J 56 (1996) 527–556.

Provost, J., and E. Pfnausch. "Simulated Consent: A New Way of Looking at an Old Way of Thinking." J 55 (1995) 698–744.

Robitaille, L. "Proofs in Defect of the Will Cases." CLSAP 57 (1995) 337–354.

———. "Simulation, Error Determining the Will, or Lack of Due Discretion? A Case Study." Stud Can 29 (1995) 397–432.

Sanson, R. "Implicit Simulation: Grounds for Annulment?" J 48 (1988) 747–770.

Schmidt, K. "Educatio prolis and the Validity of Marriage." J 55 (1995) 243–280.

———. "The 'Raising of Children' as an Essential Element of Marriage." CLSAP 59 (1997) 223–266.

Stankiewicz, A. "De iurisprudentia Rotali recentiore circa simulationem totalem et partialem." ME 122 (1997) 189–234.

———. "L'esclusione della procreazione ed educazione della prole." Apol 63 (1990) 625–654.

Villeggiante, S. "L'esclusione del 'bonum sacramenti.'" ME 115 (1990) 351–386.

C. 1102

Books

Il consenso matrimoniale condizionato. Studi giuridici 30. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1993.

Articles

Lagges, P. "Conditioned Consent to Marriage." CLSAP 58 (1996) 236–260.

Leuzzi, A. "La condizione del consenso matrimoniale canonico." Apol 66 (1993) 371–437.

McGrath, J. B. "The Effects of Pre-nuptial Agreements on the Validity of Marriage." J 53 (1993) 385–395.

Robitaille, L. "Conditioned Consent: Natural Law and Human Positive Law." Stud Can 26 (1992) 75–110.

C. 1103

Lagges, P. "Force or Fear." CLSAP 58 (1996) 261–282.

Smilanic, D. A. "Reverential Fear." CLSAP 58 (1996) 283–291.

Wrenn, L. "Urban Navarrete, S.J., and the Response of the Code Commission on Force and Fear." J 51 (1991) 119–137.

CHAPTER IX:
The Separation of Spouses

Books

Abate, A. The Dissolution of the Matrimonial Bond. Rome: Desclée, 1962.

Cereti, G. Divorzio, nuove nozze et penitenza nella Chiesa primitiva. Bologna: Dehoniane, 1977.

Gregory, D. The Pauline Privilege. CanLawStud 68. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1931.

Jugis, P. A Canonical Analysis of the Meaning of Humano Modo in Canon 1061, §1. CanLawStud 541. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1993.

Marchetta, B. Scioglimento del matrimonio canonico per inconsummazione. Padua: Antonio Milani, 1981.

Noonan, J. The Power to Dissolve. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap, 1972.

I procedimenti speciali nel diritto canonico. Studi giuridici 27. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1992.

Woeber, E. The Interpellations. CanLawStud 172. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1942.

Woestman, W. Special Marriage Cases. 3rd ed. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1994.

Articles

Cereti, V. "The Reconciliation of Remarried Divorcees according to Canon 8 of the Council of Nicea." In Ius sequitur vitam, ed. J. Provost and K. Walf, 193–207. Louvain: Leuven University, 1991.

Gerhartz, J. "L'indissolubilité du mariage et sa dissolution par l'Église dans la problématique actuelle." RDC 21 (1971) 198–234.

O'Connor, W. "The Indissolubility of a Ratified, Consummated Marriage." Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 13 (1936) 692–722.

CHAPTER X: The Convalidation of Marriage

Books

Brennan, J. The Simple Convalidation of Marriage. CanLawStud 102. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1937.

Harrigan, R. The Radical Sanation of Invalid Marriages. CanLawStud 116. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1938.

Articles

Bogdan, L. A. "Simple Convalidation of Marriage in the 1983 Code of Canon Law." J 48 (1986) 511–531.

Johnson, J. "The 'Simple' Convalidation as a Pastoral Problem." StudCan 15 (1981) 461–479.

Matthews, K. "Validations or Convalidations: That Is the Question." In Unico Ecclesiae servitio, ed. M. Thériault and J. Thorn, 133–147. Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1991.

O'Rourke, J. J. "Considerations on the Convalidation of Marriage." J 43 (1983) 387–391.

MARRIAGE IN GENERAL: EASTERN CODE

Books

Il matrimonio nel Codice dei canoni delle Chiese orientali, Studi giuridici 32. Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1994.

Pospishil, V. Eastern Catholic Marriage Law according to the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. Brooklyn: St. Maron Publications, 1990.

Prader, J. Il matrimonio in Oriente e Occidente. Kanonika 1. Rome: Pontificium Institutum Orientalium Studiorum, 1992.

Articles

Abbass, J. "Marriage in the Codes of Canon Law." Apol 68 (1995) 521–565.

Gallagher, C. "Marriage in the Revised Canon Law for the Eastern Catholic Churches." Stud Can 24 (1990) 69–90.

Gallaro, G. "The Mystery of Crowning: An Interecclesial Perspective." CLSAP 51 (1989) 185–200.

McManus, F. "Marriage in the Canons of the Eastern Catholic Churches." J 54 (1994) 56–80.

Prader, J. "Differenze fra il diritto matrimoniale del Codice latino e quello del Codice orientale che influiscono sulla validità del matrimonio." Ius Ecclesiae 5 (1993) 469–494.

Vadakumcherry, J. "Marriage Laws in the Code of Canon Law and the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches." Stud Can 26 (1992) 437–460.

Part II
OTHER ACTS OF DIVINE WORSHIP
[cc. 1166–1204]

The other acts of divine worship in part two of Book IV are those other than sacraments, treated in five titles dealing with: (1) sacramentals in general; (2) the liturgy of the hours; (3) funerals; (4) the cult of saints, sacred images, and relics; (5) vows and oaths. The principal sources for these sections are the 1917 Code of Canon Law, Sacrosanctum Concilium (Vatican II's constitution on the liturgy), and the liturgical rites that had been revised before 1983, namely, the 1970 Liturgy of the Hours[1] and the 1969 Rite of Funerals.[2] The source of some of the canons on dedications and blessings is the 1977 Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar.

Since the promulgation of the 1983 code, two revised titles of the Roman Ritual and a revised liturgical book which are pertinent to matters treated in this section have been published. The first of these is De benedictionibus of 1984 which was significantly adapted by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL) and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) and was published under the name Book of Blessings.[3] The liturgical book is the revised Caeremoniale episcoporum of 1984; the English version, the Ceremonial of Bishops, appeared in 1989. The other section of the Ritual revised after the code is De exorcismis et supplicationibus quibusdam of 1999, which contains the Rite of Major Exorcism. Other documents containing provisions related to this section are the 1993 Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism of the Pontifical Council for the Promotion of Christian Unity and the revised and adapted Order of Christian Funerals that went into effect in 1989 for the dioceses of the United States.[4]

The Eastern code differs significantly from the Latin code in its treatment of these matters. It has only one canon on sacramentals (CCEO 867). Funerals are treated along with cemeteries (CCEO 874–879) in a section on sacred places. Like the Latin code, the Eastern code has distinct sections on the veneration of the saints, sacred images and relics (CCEO 884–888), and vows and oaths (CCEO 889–895). The liturgy of the hours is not treated.[5]

[1] DOL 424.

[2] DOL 416.

[3] The English translation of De benedictionibus was published in 1987 by ICEL; newly composed blessings were published by the USCC in 1988. The completed Book of Blessings went into effect for the dioceses of the U.S. on December 3, 1989.

[4] The commentary that follows does not give the legal history of the canons since that is readily available in other English-speaking commentaries. See, e.g., CLSA Com for the corresponding canons.

[5] Further references to the Eastern code will be made only when there is a noteworthy difference from the Latin code.

TITLE I
SACRAMENTALS
[cc. 1166–1172]

The seven canons of this title treat the definition of sacramentals (c. 1166), authority over sacramentals (c. 1167), minister of sacramentals (c. 1168), minister of consecrations, dedications, blessings (c. 1169), recipients of blessings (c. 1170), sacred objects (c. 1171), and exorcism (c. 1172).

Definition of Sacramentals

Canon 1166 — Sacramentals are sacred signs by which effects, especially spiritual effects, are signified in some imitation of the sacraments and are obtained through the intercession of the Church.

Sacramentals are similar to sacraments but differ from them in both their origin and nature. The seven sacraments were instituted by Christ and cannot be substantially changed or abolished. The sacramentals are instituted by the Church; new ones can be created and old ones suppressed. Like sacraments, sacramentals are sacred signs[6] which signify and bring about spiritual effects. Unlike sacraments, which produce their effects ex opere operato—through the action itself—the spiritual effects of sacramentals are obtained through the intercession of the Church.

Sacramentals may be either things or actions. Sacramentals that are things are those which remain after the liturgical action has taken place, e.g., holy water, blessed palms or ashes, or blessed candles. Sacramentals usually involve a brief liturgy of the word, and they always include a prayer; often the prayer is accompanied by a distinctive gesture, such as the laying on of hands, the sign of the cross, or the sprinkling of holy water which recalls baptism.[7] Since sacramentals involve liturgical actions, the Second Vatican Council directed that sacramentals be revised according to the basic principle of the liturgical reform that the faithful might participate in them intelligently, actively, and easily.[8] The council treated the sacraments and sacramentals together in chapter 3 of Sacrosanctum Concilium. Through the sacramentals, the council taught, persons are disposed to receive the chief effect of the sacraments and various occasions in life are rendered holy.[9]

> Thus, for well-disposed members of the faithful, the liturgy of the sacraments and sacramentals sanctifies almost every event of their lives with the divine grace which flows from the paschal mystery of the passion, death and resurrection of Christ. From this source all sacraments and sacramentals draw their power. There is scarcely any proper use of material things which cannot thus be directed toward the sanctification of people and the praise of God.[10]

Some examples of sacramentals are rites of blessing, dedications of churches and altars, the consecration of virgins and chrism, exorcism, religious profession, institution of lectors and acolytes, crowning of images of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the use of blessed objects like scapulars, holy water, etc. Sacramentals bring the reality of the sacred to numerous situations in the lives of Christians, situations beyond those directly touched by the sacraments. For example, the sacrament of the anointing of the sick is intended only for persons who are seriously ill, but other sick persons, not eligible for the sacrament, can find spiritual comfort in a sacramental such as a blessing.

[6] SC 60.

[7] CCC 1668.

[8] SC 79.

[9] SC 60; see also CCEO 867, §1 and CCC 1670.

[10] SC 61.

Authority over Sacramentals

Canon 1167 — §1. The Apostolic See alone can establish new sacramentals, authentically interpret those already received, or abolish or change any of them.

§2. In confecting or administering sacramentals, the rites and formulas approved by the authority of the Church are to be observed carefully.

The Apostolic See makes the final determination on the establishment, authentic interpretation, and abolition of sacramentals and changes to them. However, this does not mean that the Apostolic See has total and exclusive authority. The authority of the conferences of bishops and the diocesan bishops over the liturgy, stated at Vatican II[11] and reiterated in canon law (cc. 838, 835), applies as much to the sacramentals as to other liturgical celebrations. The principal rites of the sacramentals, like other liturgical rites, specifically mention the adaptations that can be made by conferences of bishops.[12] Vatican II, in keeping with traditional practice, allowed for particular rituals of the sacraments and sacramentals to be revised and developed, and it expressly allowed for the possibility of new sacramentals to be added to these rituals as the need for them becomes apparent.[13] The NCCB created forty-two new blessings when it issued in 1989 the Book of Blessings. Therefore, the words of the canon which state that only the Apostolic See can establish new sacramentals must be interpreted to refer to entirely new classes of sacramentals, not to new sacramentals within the same category. The NCCB is the true legislative authority which created the new blessings, even though the blessings could not be promulgated until after their confirmation, or review (recognitio), by the Apostolic See.[14]

[11] SC 22.

[12] See, e.g., DB/BB 39.

[13] SC 63, 79. See also CDWDS, Instruction on the Roman Liturgy and Inculturation 55, 59 (Rome: 1994) 25–27.

[14] Canons 455, 838, §3.

The second paragraph of canon 1167 is a specification with reference to sacramentals of a well-known general rule stated at Vatican II[15] and repeated elsewhere in the code in reference to the sacraments (c. 846, §1). It is restated somewhat differently here although its basic meaning is the same, that the sacramentals are to be celebrated according to the rites and formulas prescribed in the liturgical books. "Rite" refers to the entirety of the rite of a sacramental, whereas "formula" means the key words of the rite, akin to the form of the sacraments. Unauthorized alterations of a sacramental would result in its invalidity if it is so altered that it could no longer be judged as substantially the rite approved by the Church. However, such invalidity is not comparable to the invalidity of the sacraments, since sacramentals achieve their effects through the prayer of the Church, not through the ritual action itself as do sacraments. A sacramental would also be juridically invalid, i.e., not recognized as the official rite of the Church, if it were celebrated by an unauthorized minister.[16]

Minister of Sacramentals

Canon 1168 — The minister of sacramentals is a cleric who has been provided with the requisite power. According to the norm of the liturgical books and to the judgment of the local ordinary lay persons who possess the appropriate qualities can also administer some sacramentals.

The canon refers to the public celebration of the sacramentals, not to their private use, since some of them can be used by anyone. Clerics (bishops, presbyters, and deacons) are the ordinary ministers of sacramentals in accord with the norm of law. As indicated in the liturgical laws, lay persons may celebrate certain sacramentals, with the authorization of the local ordinary in those cases for which express authorization is required. The most common sacramentals that may be celebrated by lay persons are certain blessings, as discussed in the commentary on the following canon. The rule of canon 230, §3 is applicable to the public celebration of sacramentals by lay persons. Theirs is an extraordinary ministry which may be exercised in the absence of a cleric, or when they are assisting a cleric in the administration of sacramentals to many persons, such as in the distribution of blessed ashes on Ash Wednesday.

[15] SC 22, §3.

[16] See, e.g., c. 1169, §1.

Ministers of Consecrations, Dedications, Blessings

Canon 1169 — §1. Those marked with the episcopal character and presbyters permitted by law or legitimate grant can perform consecrations and dedications validly.

§2. Any presbyter can impart blessings except those reserved to the Roman Pontiff or bishops.

§3. A deacon can impart only those blessings expressly permitted by law.

Consecrations and dedications are like blessings, but they are sacramentals of greater importance. The term "consecration" is used in various ways in canon law and the liturgy, but here it refers to consecrations which are sacramentals, namely, the consecration of virgins and the consecration of the sacred chrism.[17] The consecration of the chrism belongs exclusively to a bishop; the minister for the consecration of virgins is the bishop who is the local ordinary.[18] While persons and things are consecrated, places —namely churches and altars—are dedicated.[19] Sacred places that are dedicated must be solely and permanently destined for assembling the people of God and carrying out sacred functions.[20] Bishops are ordinary ministers of consecrations and dedications; presbyters may be ministers of a dedication when permitted by law or by special concession as seen, for example, in canon 1206.

Ministers of Blessings

The Cathechism of the Catholic Church, n. 1669, gives a general principle on the minister of blessings: the more a blessing concerns ecclesial and sacramental life, the more its administration is reserved to the clergy. Presbyters may celebrate all blessings except those reserved to the Roman Pontiff or to bishops. Vatican II desired that reserved blessings be very few and in favor of bishops and ordinaries.[21] Moreover, the diocesan bishop may reserve certain blessings to himself, particularly those celebrated with special solemnity or at celebrations that involve the entire diocesan community with a large attendance of the faithful. Presbyters preside especially at those blessings that involve the community they are appointed to serve. However, if a bishop is present as presider, the blessing is given by the bishop.[22]

Deacons may give blessings at rites at which they preside, including the liturgy of the hours, baptism, marriage, holy communion and Viaticum outside Mass, eucharistic benediction, and non-sacramental penitential services. Deacons may also give twenty-one of the blessings in De benedictionibus and additional ones in the Book of Blessings. Whenever a priest is present, it is more fitting that the office of presiding at a blessing be assigned to him.[23] This rule would not apply if the priest is morally absent, such as when his presence is anonymous or unforeseen.

In De benedictionibus, the ritual of blessings for the universal Latin church, there are thirteen blessings which lay persons may celebrate, including two which have multiple uses for things, [17] SCDW, Rite of Consecration to a Life of Virginity, May 31, 1970, DOL 3253; Rites 2:237. SCDW, Rite of the Blessing of Oils; Rite of Consecrating the Chrism, December 3, 1970, DOL 3861; Rites 2:327.

[18] Rite of Blessing of Oils; Rite of Consecrating the Chrism 6; Rite of Consecration to a Life of Virginity 6.

[19] See RDCA.

[20] RDCA II, 2. The ordinary may grant permission for other uses in accord with c. 1210.

[21] SC 79. The papal blessing with a plenary indulgence is an example of a blessing reserved to the diocesan bishop or his juridical equivalent. See CB 1122.

[22] DB/BB 18 a.

[23] DB/BB 18 c.

places, animals, harvests, before and after meals, favors received, and various other circumstances. The Book of Blessings for use in the United States has additional blessings which lay persons may celebrate. Whenever a priest or deacon is present, lay persons may not preside at official blessings, unless the cleric is morally unavailable as above.

According to the liturgical law,[24] formally instituted acolytes and readers are to be preferred as the ministers of blessings over other lay ministers. Other lay persons may be ministers of blessings primarily because they share in the common priesthood of the faithful in virtue of their baptism and confirmation. Their specific authorization as ministers of blessings comes from either of two sources: (1) from the law itself in virtue of their office, e.g., parents on behalf of their children; or (2) by appointment of the local ordinary for some special liturgical ministry or in fulfillment of a particular charge in the Church, e.g., lay religious or catechists. These latter who have a special charge are to be appointed ministers of blessings only after the local ordinary has determined that they have the proper pastoral formation and prudence in the apostolate.[25]

Recipients of Blessings

Canon 1170 — Blessings, which are to be imparted first of all to Catholics, can also be given to catechumens and even to non-Catholics unless there is a prohibition of the Church to the contrary.

Blessings are liturgical celebrations consisting of two parts: (1) the proclamation of the word of God and the praise of God's goodness and (2) the petition for God's help. In addition, there are usually rites for the beginning and conclusion that are proper to each celebration.[26] In the canonical tradition two kinds of blessings are distinguished.[27] Constitutive blessings are similar in their effects to consecrations and dedications because the place or thing so blessed becomes a sacred place or thing set aside for divine worship (e.g., blessing of an oratory, blessing of a chalice and paten). The blessing of an abbot or abbess is also constitutive because the official rite of blessing actually constitutes the monk or nun the abbot or abbess of the monastery. An invocative blessing has no such constitutive effect; the persons so blessed retain their status, and the places or things so blessed retain their secular character.

Blessings are given, in the first place, to Catholics; they have the right to be enriched by the spiritual goods of the Church (c. 213), among which are liturgies of blessing. Catechumens, since they are already connected to the Church in a special way and are to be introduced to the sacred rites (c. 206), may also be given all appropriate blessings—not just the blessings of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) intended specifically for them. Blessings may be given to non-Catholic Christians who request them, according to the nature and object of the blessing.[28] Indeed all persons, even non-Christian believers, may receive blessings provided they have the proper dispositions.[29]

Sacred Objects

Canon 1171 — Sacred objects, which are designated for divine worship by dedication or blessing, are to be treated reverently and are not to be employed for profane or inappropriate use even if they are owned by private persons.

The current liturgical books speak of "dedication" only in reference to places—to churches and altars. "Blessings" are given to all objects which are destined for divine worship; the only exception is the chrism which is consecrated. The liturgical books have blessings for the following objects related to divine worship: a foundation stone of a [24] DB 18 d.

[25] BB 18d; see also c. 231, §1.
[26] DB/BB 20.
[27] CIC 1148, §2.
[28] Ecum Dir 121.
[29] DB/BB 15.

new church; a chalice and paten; other articles for the liturgical celebration such as the ciborium or pyx, the monstrance, vestments, linens, hymnals, and service books; a baptistery or a new baptismal font; a repository for holy oils; an episcopal or a presidential chair, a lectern, a tabernacle, a confessional; church doors; a cross for public veneration; images for public veneration; bells; an organ; holy water; stations of the cross.[30]

The diocesan bishop has the right of visitation of places where blessed objects are kept, except the houses of pontifical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life.[31] Sacred objects may not be used for secular purposes unless they have lost their blessing.[32] A person who profanes a sacred thing is to be punished by a just penalty (c. 1376).

Exorcism

Canon 1172 — §1. No one can perform exorcisms legitimately upon the possessed unless he has obtained special and express permission from the local ordinary.

§2. The local ordinary is to give this permission only to a presbyter who has piety, knowledge, prudence, and integrity of life.

An exorcism is a sacramental by which "the Church asks publicly and authoritatively in the name of Jesus Christ that a person or object be protected against the power of the Evil One and withdrawn from his dominion."[33] The canon pertains to solemn exorcisms observing the Rite of Exorcism of the Roman Ritual,[34] not to the simple exorcisms that are part of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults or the baptism of infants.

One of the praenotanda to the 1998 Rite of Exorcism (n. 13) has completely reordered this canon. There are significant differences between the new law and the canon.

(1) An exorcist is to be a priest (sacerdos), not a presbyter (presbyterus) as in the canon, which means bishops as well as presbyters may be appointed exorcist.

(2) The priest must have specific preparation for this office.

(3) "For the most part" (plerumque), the local ordinary who appoints the exorcist should be the diocesan bishop, which implies that the vicar general and episcopal vicar should not do it without a special mandate, except in a case of need when the bishop cannot be reached.

(4) The exorcist, whether appointed to the stable office of exorcist or ad actum, is to fulfill this ministry under the direction of the diocesan bishop.

Other aspects of the canon are repeated in the liturgical law: special and express permission is needed to function as exorcist, and the priest must be endowed with piety, knowledge, prudence, and integrity of life.[35] Permission of the diocesan bishop/local ordinary is required for each case, unless a priest has been appointed to the office of exorcist in a diocese where this office has been established at the request of the conference of bishops and with the approval of the Apostolic See.[36]

Belief in the devil is consistent with the scriptures and church tradition. However, the Holy See urges prudence and caution whenever there is a claim of demonic possession.

[30] RDCA I, VII; DB, pt. 3; BB, ch. 31–42.

[31] Canons 397, 683, 738.

[32] Canon 1269. Presumably the loss of blessing occurs for sacred objects in the same way as for sacred places. See c. 1212 on sacred places and c. 19 on laws enacted for similar matters.

[33] CCC 1673.

[34] De exorcismis et supplicationibus quibusdam (Rome: Typis Vaticanis, 1999). The rite was promulgated by a decree of the CDWDS, November 22, 1998.

[35] Thus, this is a derogation by complete reordering, not an abrogation. See c. 20.

[36] MQ, DOL 2923; CLD 7, 692. On certain abuses regarding exorcisms see CDF, letter, September 29, 1985, AAS 77 (1985) 1169–1170; CLD 11, 276–277.

When a possible demonic intervention is suggested, the Church always imposes a critical assessment of the facts, as in the case of miracles. Reserve and prudence are in fact demanded. It is easy to fall victim to imagination and to allow oneself to be led astray by inaccurate accounts distorted in their transmission and incorrectly interpreted.[37]

The Rite of Exorcism, nn. 14–16, takes a most cautious approach to this phenomenon and requires the exorcist to have moral certainty of demonic possession before proceeding to celebrate the rite.

Title II
The Liturgy of the Hours
[cc. 1173–1175]

It is fitting that the code include a section, although brief, on the liturgy of the hours, also known as the divine office. This form of liturgical prayer has been consistently celebrated by the Church since ancient times, and together with the Eucharist it remains today the principal form of daily prayer throughout the Church. The various hours center on the singing or reciting of scriptural psalms and canticles which are so arranged "that the whole course of the day and night is made holy by the praises of God."[38] The Second Vatican Council desired that the liturgy of the hours be reformed so that clergy and religious could pray it with greater understanding and devotion, and so that the laity too could more readily make this prayer their own. Among the principal goals of the reform of the hours was that, whenever possible, the hours be celebrated communally, at the proper times of day and, in parishes, together with the laity.

The three canons of this title treat the following: a theological description of the liturgy of the hours (c. 1173), those who celebrate the liturgy of the hours (c. 1174), and the time of celebration (c. 1175).

Theological Description

Canon 1173 — Fulfilling the priestly function of Christ, the Church celebrates the liturgy of the hours. In the liturgy of the hours, the Church, hearing God speaking to his people and recalling the mystery of salvation, praises him without ceasing by song and prayer and intercedes for the salvation of the whole world.

This is a concise theological description of the liturgy of the hours. A fuller theological exposition of the liturgy of the hours is found in Sacrosanctum Concilium 83–86 and in the General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours 1–19.

Celebrants

Canon 1174 — §1. Clerics are obliged to carry out the liturgy of the hours according to the norm of can. 276, §2, n. 3; members of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, however, are bound according to the norm of their constitutions.

§2. Other members of the Christian faithful, according to circumstances, are also earnestly invited to participate in the liturgy of the hours as an action of the Church.

The liturgy of the hours is the prayer of the whole Church, and all the faithful are deputed to celebrate this liturgy. Priests and transitional deacons are obliged to pray the liturgy of the hours daily; permanent deacons are to recite the parts of the hours prescribed by the conference of bishops.[39]

[37] SCDF, Christian Faith and Demonology, June 26, 1975, La documentation catholique 72 (1975) 708–718; The Pope Speaks 20 (1975) 209–233.

[38] SC 84.

[39] Canon 276, §2, 3°. See NCCB, Permanent Deacons in the United States: Guidelines on Their Formation and Ministry 97, 3rd ed. (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1985).

The Church deputes the clergy to celebrate the hours to ensure that at least some of its members are regularly carrying out the duty of the whole community.[40] In fulfilling this obligation clerics are to be aware of the "hierarchy" of the hours, with morning and evening prayer of greatest importance.[41] The celebration of the hours in common is preferred.[42] Even clergy who are not obliged to communal celebration, if they live together or when they gather for a meeting, should celebrate at least morning and evening prayer in common.[43] Dispensations or commutations of the clerical obligation can be given by the cleric's ordinary, including a clerical major superior.[44]

Lay members of religious institutes are "to celebrate worthily the liturgy of the hours" in accord with the norm of their constitutions (c. 663, §3). Seminarians "are to be formed in the celebration of the liturgy of the hours."[45] Other lay members of the faithful are "earnestly invited" to participate in the liturgy of the hours, as stated in this canon. Clergy and other pastoral ministers are obliged by the liturgical law to see that the people are invited and instructed to celebrate the principal hours, especially on Sundays and holy days.[46] Whenever possible, groups of the faithful should celebrate the liturgy of the hours communally in church, especially in parish churches.[47] Those who cannot participate in the communal celebration are to be encouraged to pray morning and evening prayer in private.[48] Also recommended is the praying of the hours at special gatherings of the lay faithful and in families.[49]

[40] General Instruction on the Liturgy of the Hours 28. Hereafter cited as GILH.
[41] GILH 29, 77.
[42] GILH 33.
[43] SC 99, GILH 25.
[44] SC 97.
[45] Canon 246, §2. See NCCB, Program of Priestly Formation 153, 215, 273, 277, 313, 481, 4th ed. (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1993).
[46] SC 100, GILH 23.
[47] GILH 21.
[48] GILH 40.
[49] GILH 27.

Time of Celebration

Canon 1175 — In carrying out the liturgy of the hours, the true time for each hour is to be observed insofar as possible.

Vatican II decreed the restoration of the proper sequence of the hours so that they may genuinely correspond to the correct time of the day at which they are to be prayed.[50] Morning prayer is celebrated upon rising or at some convenient hour of the morning. Evening prayer is celebrated anytime in the evening, which may be understood as after 4:00 in the afternoon.[51] Mid-morning prayer is celebrated at 9:00, or anytime after morning prayer and before midday prayer. Midday prayer is celebrated at noon or before or after the midday meal. Mid-afternoon prayer is celebrated at 3:00 or anytime in the afternoon until late afternoon. The office of the readings is celebrated anytime during the day or even during the night hours of the previous day after evening prayer. Night prayer is the last prayer of the day, said before retiring, even if after midnight.[52]

TITLE III
ECCLESIASTICAL FUNERALS
[cc. 1176–1185]

The principal source for the canons of this title is the 1969 Ordo exsequiarum. The particular law in the United States on funerals is found chiefly in the 1989 Order of Christian Funerals which has an original general introduction and original introductions to the various sections of the order, and which contains a number of adaptations made in accord with Ordo exsequiarum 21. Also pertinent are the "Christian Burial Guidelines" which

[50] SC 88, 94.
[51] Cf. Pius XII, apconst Christus Dominus VI, January 6, 1953, AAS 45 (1953) 14–24; CLD 4, 275–276.
[52] GILH 59, 84.

serve as a basis for particular law in the dioceses of the U.S.A. and Canada.[53]

Basic Values and Rules

Canon 1176 — §1. Deceased members of the Christian faithful must be given ecclesiastical funerals according to the norm of law.

§2. Ecclesiastical funerals, by which the Church seeks spiritual support for the deceased, honors their bodies, and at the same time brings the solace of hope to the living, must be celebrated according to the norm of the liturgical laws.

§3. The Church earnestly recommends that the pious custom of burying the bodies of the deceased be observed; nevertheless, the Church does not prohibit cremation unless it was chosen for reasons contrary to Christian doctrine.

The values expressed in this canon are the importance of ecclesiastical funeral rites, their proper celebration, and the preferred custom of burying the dead. The first paragraph is preceptive: the faithful must be given funeral rites according to the norm of law. This implies an obligation on the part of pastors, that they see that church funeral rites are celebrated for their deceased parishioners (cf. c. 530, 5°), as well as an obligation on the next of kin to see that church funeral rites are accorded a deceased Catholic. Moreover, it implies a right to have one's funeral in one's parish, in accord with the norm of law.[54]

The first part of paragraph two succinctly expresses the purposes of church funeral rites. The second is really only a reminder that there are liturgical laws that must be observed in celebrating funeral rites, laws which are primarily found in the Ordo exsequiarum and the translations and adaptations of same approved by the conferences of bishops.

The first statement of paragraph three is a recommendation: the Church prefers that the bodies of deceased faithful be buried, because it manifests Christian faith in the resurrection and the dignity of the body; but burial is not required. The second statement expresses the right of the faithful to choose cremation, with one exception. Cremation is not tolerated by the Church if it is chosen for reasons which are contrary to Christian teaching (cf. c. 1184, 2°). The 1917 code had forbidden cremation (CIC 1203; 1240, §1, 5°), but this was derogated in 1963 by an instruction of the Holy Office which stated that the Church "never opposed nor now opposes cremation under certain circumstances, that is, whenever it is certain that it is done through innocent motives and for grave reasons, especially of a public order."[55] No longer is it necessary to have positive reasons for choosing cremation. Anyone may choose cremation unless it is done for reasons contrary to Christian teaching.

When cremation is chosen, it is preferable to celebrate the funeral Mass in the presence of the body before it is cremated. Nevertheless, the dioceses of the United States and Canada have an indult permitting the celebration of the funeral Mass in the presence of the cremated remains of the body.[56] However, there is good reason to conclude that an indult for this practice is not strictly necessary; it is likely that it is within the competence of the diocesan bishop to permit this practice since it is not expressly excluded by law.[57]

CHAPTER I
THE CELEBRATION OF FUNERALS
[cc. 1177–1182]

This chapter consists of six canons treating: the place of funerals (c. 1177), funerals of dioce-

[53] National Catholic Cemetery Conference, January 28, 1975, CLD 9, 688–702. Hereafter cited as NCCC Guidelines.

[54] See especially cc. 1177 and 1184.

[55] Piam et constantem, May 8, 1963, AAS 56 (1964) 822; CLD 6, 666–667; DOL 3366.

[56] Order of Christian Funerals (Ottawa: Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, 1990) appendix 4, 432; for the U.S. see CDWDS, letter, March 21, 1997, BCLN 33 (1997) 13–15.

[57] See cc. 835, §1; 838, §4; 135, §2. This issue is addressed by M. J. Henchal in "Cremation: Canonical Issues," J 55 (1995) 281–298.

san bishops (c. 1178), funerals of religious and members of societies of apostolic life (c. 1179), place of burial (c. 1180), monetary offerings for funerals (c. 1181), and parish death registers (c. 1182).

Place of Funerals

Canon 1177 — §1. A funeral for any deceased member of the faithful must generally be celebrated in his or her parish church.

§2. Any member of the faithful or those competent to take care of the funeral of a deceased member of the faithful are permitted to choose another church for the funeral rite with the consent of the person who governs it and after notification of the proper pastor of the deceased.

§3. If a death occurred outside the person's own parish, and the body was not transferred to it nor another church legitimately chosen for the funeral rite, the funeral is to be celebrated in the church of the parish where the death occurred unless particular law has designated another church.

Catholics have a right to funeral rites in their parish. The rites in question are all the funeral stages (stationes) that are observed in a region (e.g., vigil service, funeral Mass, committal).[58] The canon says that generally funerals for the faithful departed must be celebrated in their own parish, which obliges the pastor to see that they are given a funeral. Membership in a parish is determined by domicile or quasi-domicile in the parish territory, not by registration or participation in the parish (c. 102). An exception is membership in a personal parish which is based on rite, language, nationality, or some other determining factor (c. 518). Transients (vagi, c. 100) have a right to a church funeral in the parish of the territory where they were living at the time of death.

While the faithful have a right to a funeral in their own parish, they or the persons in charge also have the freedom to request that their funeral be in another church. This requires the consent of the rector of the church, namely, the priest in charge of the church. If the rector permits the funeral in his church, he or the person making the funeral arrangements must inform the proper pastor of the deceased, even if the deceased was unknown to the pastor, and the name of the deceased is to be recorded in the parish death register unless particular law provides otherwise. (Cf. cc. 535, §1; 1182.)

Since the code mentions only a "church" and not an "oratory," funerals may not be held in the oratories of religious communities or other oratories or private chapels without a dispensation from the diocesan bishop, unless legitimate custom, an acquired right, or a privilege is in force.[59] Although Catholics may not have their funerals celebrated in oratories, non-Catholic Christians may do so in certain oratories. The 1993 Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism says that Catholic hospitals, homes for the aged, and similar institutions should afford priests and ministers of other denominations every opportunity to provide spiritual and sacramental ministrations, under dignified and reverent conditions, including the use of the chapel.[60] The diocesan bishop's permission is necessary for other cases involving use of Catholic churches and oratories by non-Catholic Christians for funerals or other purposes.[61]

The third paragraph gives a rule for a special case when a person dies away from the parish and the body is not returned. In such a case the parish of the territory in which the person died is required to celebrate the funeral rites, unless particular law has designated another church.

Funerals of Diocesan Bishops

Canon 1178 — The funeral of a diocesan bishop is to be celebrated in his own cathedral church unless he has chosen another church.

[58] Ordo exsequiarum 4, OCF 50.

[59] See cc. 1214, 1223. See also c. 1179 on the funerals of religious and members of societies of apostolic life in their own oratories.

[60] Ecum Dir 142.

[61] Ecum Dir 137.

This canon is applicable to diocesan bishops who were either active or retired at the time of their death. The Ceremonial of Bishops gives regulations to be observed upon the death and for the funeral of the diocesan bishop.[62] These norms presume that the diocesan bishop's funeral rites will be in the cathedral, and they must in fact be celebrated there unless the bishop himself left other instructions.

Funerals of Religious

Canon 1179 — The funerals of religious or members of a society of apostolic life are generally to be celebrated in their own church or oratory by the superior if the institute or society is clerical; otherwise by the chaplain.

This canon gives a general rule but is open to other possibilities. The funeral arrangements of religious and members of societies of apostolic life are handled by the competent superior. The superior, keeping in mind the wishes of the deceased, determines in which church or oratory of the community the funeral will take place. If the superior wishes to have the funeral in another church, the rules of canon 1177 are to be observed.

Place of Burial

Canon 1180 — §1. If a parish has its own cemetery, the deceased members of the faithful must be buried in it unless the deceased or those competent to take care of the burial of the deceased have chosen another cemetery legitimately.

§2. Everyone, however, is permitted to choose the cemetery of burial unless prohibited by law.

If the parish has a cemetery, the faithful who are resident in the parish territory or who are members of a personal parish have a right to be buried in it. This does not mean that parishioners may have cemetery plots free of charge but that, all things being equal, they are to be given priority over non-parishioners in the parish cemetery. No one is obliged to be buried in the parish cemetery, or even in a Catholic cemetery, but may choose another cemetery, mausoleum, or a place where cremated remains are kept. In a non-Catholic cemetery the individual grave is to be blessed at the time of committal (c. 1240).

All the faithful, or those responsible for their burial, may choose any place for burial unless prohibited by law. This refers to a prohibition of particular law since the universal law has no such prohibitions. The right to choose a cemetery does not carry with it an obligation on the part of the Catholic cemetery owner to accede to the request, except in the case of a parish cemetery whereby, all things being equal, the pastor is obliged to give a parishioner preference over a non-parishioner.

Offerings for Funerals

Canon 1181 — Regarding offerings on the occasion of funeral rites, the prescripts of can. 1264 are to be observed, with the caution, however, that there is to be no favoritism toward persons in funerals and that the poor are not deprived of fitting funerals.

The mention of canon 1264 refers to number 2 of that canon which states that it is the competence of the bishops of the province to determine the amount of the offerings to be given on the occasion of the administration of the sacraments and sacramentals, unless another law prescribes something else. The caution against depriving the poor of a funeral is akin to that of canon 848 in reference to offerings for the administration of sacraments. Precaution is also to be taken against any favoritism toward persons.[63] For example, it would not be lawful to celebrate a funeral Mass only for contributing parishioners while limiting others to a liturgy of the word celebrated by a deacon or lay person. Deacons may celebrate the funeral liturgy without a Mass, or lay persons may celebrate funeral rites in accord with the law in situations of pastoral need,[64] but not in consideration of persons.

[62] CB 1157–1165.

[63] Cf. SC 32.

Death Register

Canon 1182 — When the burial has been completed, a record is to be made in the register of deaths according to the norm of particular law.

Every parish is to have a register to record the deaths of parishioners (c. 535, §1). In regard to the case of a person whose funeral is celebrated in another parish, it is advisable to record the death both in that parish and in the person's own parish, unless this matter is regulated otherwise in particular law.

CHAPTER II
THOSE TO WHOM ECCLESIASTICAL FUNERALS MUST BE GRANTED OR DENIED
[cc. 1183–1185]

The three canons of this chapter treat: non-Catholics who may be granted a church funeral (c. 1183), Catholics who must be deprived of a church funeral (c. 1184), and the denial of any kind of funeral Mass to those who must be deprived of a church funeral (c. 1185).

Non-Catholics Granted a Church Funeral

Canon 1183 — §1. When it concerns funerals, catechumens must be counted among the Christian faithful.

§2. The local ordinary can permit children whom the parents intended to baptize but who died before baptism to be given ecclesiastical funerals.

§3. In the prudent judgment of the local ordinary, ecclesiastical funerals can be granted to baptized persons who are enrolled in a non-Catholic Church or ecclesial community unless their intention is evidently to the contrary and provided that their own minister is not available.

The Church grants certain prerogatives to catechumens which are proper to Christians (c. 206). The right to a church funeral is one of these prerogatives.[65] The catechumenate begins with the rite of acceptance into the order of catechumens.[66] A catechumen is entitled to the full funeral rites of Catholics in accord with local laws and customs, such as the vigil service, funeral Mass, and committal service. The particular law in force in the United States on this matter offers pastoral guidance that could be helpful elsewhere as well.

> [For the funerals of catechumens], the funeral liturgy, including the funeral Mass, should be celebrated as usual, only omitting language referring directly to the sacrament. ...In view of the sensibilities of the immediate family of the deceased catechumen, however, the funeral Mass may be omitted at the discretion of the pastor.[67]

Children of a Catholic parent (or guardian) who die before baptism may be given church funeral rites if at least one parent or guardian had intended to have them baptized. Although they are unbaptized, the Church entrusts these children to the mercy of God who desires that all people should be saved.[68] The Eastern code permits ecclesiastical funerals not only for unbaptized children whose parents intended to have them baptized, but also for unbaptized persons "who in some way were considered to be close to the Church" (CCEO 876, §2).

The local ordinary may permit Catholic funerals for non-Catholics under the following conditions:

> (1) the deceased must have been validly baptized;

[64] Ordo exsequiarum 19, OCF 14.

[65] For a discussion of the prerogatives and obligations of catechumens, see J. Huels, The Catechumenate and the Law: A Pastoral and Canonical Commentary for the Church in the United States (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1994) 5–13.

[66] RCIA 14, U.S. version, 41; c. 788, §1; NSC 2.

[67] NSC 9.

[68] CCC 1261.

(2) the non-Catholic minister must be unavailable;

(3) there is no indication that the person would not have wanted a Catholic funeral.

In case of doubt about the validity of baptism, the funeral may be permitted. The minister may be either physically or morally unavailable. An example of physical unavailability is when there is no church of that denomination in the area. Examples of moral unavailability are: when the deceased had not practiced his or her faith whereas the next of kin is a practicing Catholic; or if the non-Catholic had been intending to become a Catholic.[69] If a funeral Mass is celebrated, the name of the deceased non-Catholic may not be mentioned in the eucharistic prayer.[70]

Catholics Deprived of a Church Funeral

Canon 1184 — §1. Unless they gave some signs of repentance before death, the following must be deprived of ecclesiastical funerals:

1° notorious apostates, heretics, and schismatics;

2° those who chose the cremation of their bodies for reasons contrary to Christian faith;

3° other manifest sinners who cannot be granted ecclesiastical funerals without public scandal of the faithful.

§2. If any doubt occurs, the local ordinary is to be consulted, and his judgment must be followed.

These three cases of deprivation of ecclesiastical funeral rites apply only to persons who were baptized Catholic or who were received into the Catholic Church. Funerals may not be denied to someone who gave a sign of repentance before death. The sign of repentance should in some way indicate that the person wanted to be reconciled to God and the Church, such as summoning a priest at the time of death, making an act of perfect contrition, or stating a desire to die in the state of grace. It is not sufficient that the person merely make an act that indicates belief in God, since even heretics, schismatics, and many apostates believe in God. If the deceased had manifested a sign of repentance, this should be made known if it would preclude scandal.[71]

Apostasy, heresy, and schism are defined in canon 751. Since number one of canon 1184 does not distinguish between notoriety in law and notoriety in fact, the word "notorious" should be understood in the ordinary sense of the word, namely, publicly known. Those who are publicly known in the parish to be apostates, heretics, or schismatics are to be denied a church funeral. If they had formally joined another Christian or non-Christian faith, it should be presumed they would want to have their funeral celebrated in that faith unless contrary indications are present. Those who ceased practicing their Catholic faith without formally abandoning it do not fall in this category and may not be denied Catholic funeral rites.

A case of a Catholic choosing cremation for reasons contrary to the faith is so rare that the provision of number two is hardly necessary. Such would occur if the person were, for example, choosing cremation as a way to manifest unbelief in the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead.

Cases in number three require the presence of two conditions: (1) that a person be a manifest sinner, i.e., be publicly known to be living in a state of grave sin; and (2) that a church funeral would cause public scandal. Cases when both of these conditions are verified are rare but they do occur, e.g., when the murder of a celebrated criminal is accompanied by great publicity. Also included would be those under an imposed or declared penalty of excommunication or interdict if they could not be granted a funeral without public scan-

[69] The permission required of the local ordinary could appropriately be delegated to pastors and parochial vicars in the diocesan list of faculties. See also Ecum Dir 120.

[70] Ecum Dir 121.

[71] Cf. SCDF, decr Patres Sacrae Congregationis, September 20, 1973, AAS 65 (1973) 500; DOL 418.

dal. Not included are persons in irregular marriages[72] or persons who committed suicide.[73] Since deprivation of a church funeral not infrequently causes as much if not more scandal than granting it, it would be prudent to refer any such case to the local ordinary, even if not doubtful.

The Eastern code differs from the Latin code in some respects.

(1) In the case of those choosing cremation, instead of focusing on motives contrary to the faith, it says that a church funeral is not to be denied "provided it does not obscure the preference of the Church for the burial of bodies and that scandal is avoided" (CCEO 876, §3).

(2) Instead of the distinctions made in canon 1184, §1, 1° and 3°, the Eastern code simply states that "sinners" who gave no sign of repentance are to be deprived of a church funeral if there would be public scandal (CCEO 877).

Denial of Any Kind of Funeral Mass

Canon 1185 — Any funeral Mass must also be denied a person who is excluded from ecclesiastical funerals.

While canon 1184 speaks of the deprivation of the official funeral rites of the Church, which includes the funeral Mass, canon 1185 adds that "any funeral Mass" is excluded. Thus, it is not lawful to have a public Mass for someone who is to be deprived of a church funeral, even if the body is not present and the special rites connected with the funeral Mass are not observed. Although a Mass celebrated later, such as on the anniversary of death, is not excluded, this should be done only without publicity so as to preclude scandal or wonderment.

[72] See SCDF, letter Complures Conferentiae Episcopales, May 29, 1973, DOL 417; CLD 8, 862–863. See also the commentary at this canon in Salamanca Com, 573–574.

[73] See NCCC Guidelines, CLD 9, 694. The ritual for the U.S.A. provides special prayers for persons who committed suicide. See OCF 398, prayers 44 and 45. The 1917 code, CIC 1240, §1, nn. 3–4, had prohibited from ecclesiastical funerals persons who committed suicide and those who were killed in a duel.

TITLE IV
THE VENERATION OF THE SAINTS, SACRED IMAGES, AND RELICS
[cc. 1186–1190]

Since the canons of this title treat the cult of the saints, they only indirectly apply to Book IV, part two which is on acts of divine cult, the worship of God. However, since the veneration of the saints is expressed most notably through the sanctoral cycle at the Eucharist and the liturgy of the hours, which are acts of divine worship, it is not inappropriate to locate this title here. The five canons of this title treat: the veneration of Mary and the other saints (c. 1186), public veneration (c. 1187), sacred images in churches (c. 1188), restoration of precious images (c. 1189), and alienation of relics and images (c. 1190). The Eastern canon law governing these matters is substantially the same as the Latin law (CCEO 884–888).

Veneration of Mary and the Saints

Canon 1186 — To foster the sanctification of the people of God, the Church commends to the special and filial reverence of the Christian faithful the Blessed Mary ever Virgin, Mother of God, whom Christ established as the mother of all people, and promotes the true and authentic veneration of the other saints whose example instructs the Christian faithful and whose intercession sustains them.

The Church venerates the Blessed Virgin Mary and the other saints first of all through the celebrations of the sanctoral cycle at the liturgy of the hours and the Eucharist. In addition to the many feasts in honor of Mary during the liturgical year, there is a special sacramentary and lectionary, the Collection of Masses of the Blessed Virgin Mary.[74] Mary and the other saints are also venerated by means of art and music, popular devotions, and sacramentals such as the 1981 Order of Crowning an Image of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Roman Pontifical.[75] Veneration of the Mother of God is especially recommended to seminarians, clergy, and religious (cc. 246, §3; 276, §2, 5°; 663, §4). Exercises of popular piety are subject to the supervision of local ordinaries in accord with canon 839, §2.

Public Veneration

Canon 1187 — It is permitted to reverence through public veneration only those servants of God whom the authority of the Church has recorded in the list of the saints or the blessed.

The public veneration (cultus) mentioned here is the official liturgical worship of the Church approved by competent ecclesiastical authority and offered in the name of the Church by lawfully deputed persons (cf. c. 834, §2). Only saints of more universal significance are included for public veneration in the general calendar of the Church, whereas particular calendars include the blessed as well as saints of significance to particular churches and religious institutes. Ecclesiastical authority has designated the saints and blessed either by recognizing an immemorial cult or by the formal process of canonization and beatification. The 1917 code contained a lengthy section of procedures for beatification and canonization (CIC 1999–2141). This matter is now regulated outside the code by special pontifical law (c. 1403, §1).[76]

Sacred Images in Churches

Canon 1188 — The practice of displaying sacred images in churches for the reverence of the faithful is to remain in effect. Nevertheless, they are to be exhibited in moderate number and in suitable order so that the Christian people are not confused nor occasion given for inappropriate devotion.

This canon, which restates Sacrosanctum Concilium 125, deals with the display of statues and paintings in churches as well as images on stained glass, mosaics, tapestries, banners, and other artistic images in churches. The liturgical law adds that there is to be only one image of any one saint and that the devotion of the entire community is the criterion for displaying images and adorning and arranging a church.[77] The canon speaks only of churches, not of sacred places in general, but the principle expressed is equally applicable to oratories and private chapels which are used for divine worship.

The liturgical law also demands that the highest artistic standards be met in selecting works of art for churches.[78] Moreover, Vatican II exhorted bishops to "carefully remove from the house of God and from other places of worship those works of artists that are repugnant to faith and morals and to Christian devotion and that offend true religious sense either by their grotesqueness or by the deficiency, mediocrity, or sham in their artistic quality."[79] However, the Holy See has also condemned as gravely harmful to ecclesiastical heritage the removal from churches of true works of art under the pretext of liturgical renewal.[80] Since not all pastors are capable of making judgments about what constitutes good art, it is necessary that [74] (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1992); Sacramentary and Lectionary published separately.

[75] Rites 2:453.

[76] John Paul II, apconst Divinus perfectionis Magister, January 25, 1983, AAS 75 (1983) 349–355; CLD 10, 266–273; Sacred Congregation for Causes of the Saints, Norms to Be Observed by Bishops When Making Investigations in Causes of Saints, February 7, 1983, AAS 75 (1983) 396–404; CLD 10, 273–282.

[77] GIRM 278. Special blessings are to be celebrated on the occasion of placing in a church an image for public veneration by the faithful. See DB ch. 29, BB ch. 36.

[78] GIRM 254.

[79] SC 124, DOL 124.

[80] SCC, littcirc, Opera artis, April 11, 1971, AAS 63 (1971) 315–317; DOL 4327.

any significant alterations in church decor "never proceed without the approval of the commissions on sacred art, on liturgy and, when applicable, on music, or without prior consultation with experts. The civil laws of the various countries protecting valuable works of art are also to be taken into account."[81]

Restoration of Precious Images

Canon 1189 — If they are in need of repair, precious images, that is, those distinguished by age, art, or veneration, which are exhibited in churches or oratories for the reverence of the faithful are never to be restored without the written permission of the ordinary; he is to consult experts before he grants permission.

A precious image is one that has a special historical, artistic, cultural, or monetary value. Before undertaking the restoration of a precious image of any kind, the written permission of the ordinary is necessary to ensure that the restoration will be done by persons who are truly expert. The ordinary is the major superior in the case of churches and oratories owned by clerical religious institutes and clerical societies of apostolic life, or the local ordinary in the case of all other churches and oratories. The experts that the ordinary is to consult include the commissions mentioned in the commentary on the previous canon. The ordinary does not personally have to consult the experts, provided he is given a report of the consultations that have been undertaken and the recommendations that have been made by the experts.[82]

Alienation of Relics and Images

Canon 1190 — §1. It is absolutely forbidden to sell sacred relics.

§2. Relics of great significance and other relics honored with great reverence by the people cannot be alienated validly in any manner or transferred permanently without the permission of the Apostolic See.

§3. The prescript of §2 is valid also for images which are honored in some church with great reverence by the people.

The canon treats two kinds of relics. Paragraph one refers to all authentic relics of the saints and the blessed. Paragraph two treats only relics which are significant (insignes) or relics which are honored with great veneration by the people. A significant relic was defined in the previous code as a part of a saint's body (arm, forearm, heart, tongue, leg) or the part of a martyr's body that had suffered the wound that caused death, provided the part was entire and not too small (CIC 1281, §2).

The prohibition against selling any sacred relic is expressed in the code's strongest language, nefas est, meaning "it is absolutely forbidden." Relics may be given away by their owners, except for the second category of relics, which may not be given away without permission of the Apostolic See.[83] A just penalty is to be inflicted on anyone who alienates such relics or who alienates any images that are displayed in churches and honored with great veneration by the faithful (c. 1377). The penal sanction applies to the relics in the second category wherever they are displayed. In reference to images, it applies only to those images found in churches as defined by canon 1214, not in oratories, private chapels, or elsewhere, since penal law must be interpreted strictly (c. 18). Rules governing alienation are found in cc. 1291–1296.

[81] Ibid., n. 4; DOL 4331. See also SC 126.

[82] For further rules governing precious goods, see cc. 1220, §2; 1270; 1283, 2°–3°; 1292, §2.

[83] In 1994 the Apostolic Sacristy published new norms regulating relics. According to the norms, very small pieces of the bones or flesh of saints and martyrs will be distributed "only for public veneration in a church, oratory or chapel. No relic from the Apostolic Sacristy will be given to individual faithful for private veneration." See Norme per la concessione delle reliquie del Sacrario Apostolico, February 15, 1994, N 30 (1994) 349–350; BCLN 32 (1996) 6.

TITLE V
A VOW AND AN OATH
[cc. 1191–1204]

Vows and oaths are not acts of worship (cultus) in the sense of liturgical celebrations, but they are acts of religion that have a sacred character and impose obligations of religion.[84] Thus they are treated in Book IV of the code which deals with the sanctifying function of the Church. Vows and oaths are, moreover, juridic acts which have juridic effects and which are governed by both general laws[85] and the specific canons that follow. Although canon law does not bind non-Catholics as a general rule (c. 11), the laws on vows and oaths apply to non-Catholics if the law in question is based on the divine law or if the merely ecclesiastical law includes non-Catholics, e.g., the taking of an oath by a non-Catholic in an ecclesiastical process. The canons on vows in the Eastern code (CCEO 889–894) are similar to those in the Latin code, but there is only one canon in the Eastern code on oaths (CCEO 895). This canon recognizes the canonical efficacy only of oaths made before the Church in cases established by canon law.

CHAPTER I A VOW
[cc. 1191–1198]

The following canons refer to private vows and, as applicable, also to public vows. Members of religious institutes profess public vows, which are also governed by the laws of Book II, part three, especially canons 607, 654–658, and 688–701, as well as the constitutions and other laws proper to each institute. The canons of this chapter treat: the definition of a vow, the capability of vowing, and the nullity of a vow (c. 1191); the different kinds of vows (c. 1192); the obligation of a vow (c. 1193); the cessation of a vow (c. 1194); the suspension of a vow (c. 1195); dispensation (c. 1196); commutation (c. 1197); and suspension of private vows by religious profession (c. 1198).

[84] Thomas Aquinas, STh II-IIae, q. 88, a. 5 et q. 89, a. 4.

[85] Among these laws see especially cc. 124–126, 11, 96–100.

Definition, Capability, Nullity

Canon 1191 — §1. A vow, that is, a deliberate and free promise made to God about a possible and better good, must be fulfilled by reason of the virtue of religion.

§2. Unless they are prohibited by law, all who possess suitable use of reason are capable of making a vow.

§3. A vow made out of grave and unjust fear or malice is null by the law itself.

A vow is a promise made to God, the fulfillment of which is a serious religious obligation. A promise implies more than a wish or a desire but rather is a firm decision to fulfill what is vowed. A vow must be made with sufficient deliberation, knowingly, and with due discernment. The object of the vow must be something good; otherwise it is not a vow and has no effect. It must be something that the one vowing is capable of fulfilling, and it must be something better, i.e., better than not doing it, or better than its opposite. The good that is vowed may be relatively better depending on the person and circumstances. For example, whether a vow to perpetual virginity is a better good than matrimony would depend on whether the person has a true vocation to a life of celibacy.

Not only must the one vowing have the use of reason, but it must be a sufficient use of reason appropriate to the object of the vow. For example, the minimal use of reason normally required of children for reception of first communion (c. 914) would not be sufficient for the profession of vows in a religious institute (cf. c. 656, 1°).

The vow must be freely made, i.e., without grave and unjust fear, or as a result of malice. A vow made under such circumstances would be invalid. Fear is grave when, in order to escape some serious harm that is perceived, a person sees no alternative other than to take the vow. Fear is unjust if it is inspired by a threat that is not deserved; it is just if it is inspired by a threat that is deserved. For example, a secular cleric living in concubinage is told by the bishop to take a vow in his presence never to repeat that sin or, if the cleric does not take the vow, he will be given an onerous penance. The cleric takes the vow motivated by grave fear of the penance, but the vow is valid insofar as the penance is deserved and is just.

Malice (dolus) in the context of this canon is the deliberate act of lying or of concealing the truth in order to get another person to make a vow which he or she would not do if the truth were known, or in order for oneself to get permission to make a vow, which would not be permitted if the truth were known. For example, a novice conceals from her superiors some external forum fact that, if known, would result in her not being admitted to profession of vows. Such malice invalidates the profession of vows (cf. c. 656, 4°).

Also invalid is a vow made out of ignorance or error concerning an element which constitutes the substance of the vow or which amounts to a condition sine qua non (c. 126). Ignorance is lack of knowledge; error is mistaken judgment. Ignorance or error invalidates a vow if the person vowing lacked knowledge of, or erred in judgment about, something that is of the substance of the vow. For example, a woman who, believing her husband to have survived a war, vows in gratitude to go to Mass every day, and only later discovers that he in fact was killed in the final hours of battle, is not bound by the vow.

A condition sine qua non is one which is so important that the vow would not have been taken if it had been known that the condition was not verified or could not be fulfilled. For example, a religious brother, who is unaware of or mistakes the juridical effects of a solemn vow of poverty and believes he can keep his property, takes solemn vows in a religious institute on the condition, whether explicit or implicit, that he retain ownership of his goods (cf. c. 668, §§4–5).[86]

Distinctions

Canon 1192 — §1. A vow is public if a legitimate superior accepts it in the name of the Church; otherwise, it is private.

§2. A vow is solemn if the Church has recognized it as such; otherwise, it is simple.

§3. A vow is personal if the person making the vow promises an action; real if the person making the vow promises some thing; mixed if it shares the nature of a personal and a real vow.

This distinction between a public and private vow is not exact because members of some secular institutes and some associations of the faithful take vows which are accepted by a legitimate superior, yet these are considered private vows or, in the case of secular institutes, "semi-public vows."[87] A more accurate distinction, modeled on the difference between solemn and simple vows, is simply this: a public vow is one which is recognized as such by the Church; otherwise it is private. An essential element of religious life is the profession of vows which are recognized as public (cc. 607, §2; 654). Members of secular institutes assume vows or some other sacred bond as determined by the constitutions (c. 712). Societies of apostolic life, by definition, do not take "religious" vows, but in some of them the members assume the evangelical counsels by some bond (vow, oath, promise) as defined in the constitutions (c. 731).

This is the only place in the revised code where solemn and simple vows are mentioned. The older religious orders (monastics, canons regulars, mendicants, Jesuits) have perpetual solemn vows, and the more recent apostolic congregations have perpetual simple vows. The chief juridical difference between the two is that religious who profess a solemn vow of poverty renounce ownership of all their temporal goods (c. 668, §§ 4–5), whereas religious who profess a simple vow of poverty have a right to retain ownership of their patrimony but must give up its use and any revenue (c. 668, §1). A temporary vow, which expires after a stated period of time, is always a simple vow.

[86] If this situation existed and the brother wanted to leave religious life due to his error, he should seek an indult of departure in the usual way (c. 691) rather than attempt to prove that his profession was invalid.

[87] See J. Zammit, Il voto e la promessa (Rome: Pontifical Lateran University, 1995) 201.

A personal vow binds the person to perform some act, e.g., to make a pilgrimage or to fast. A real vow binds the person to give a thing, e.g., a donation of property to a religious institute. A mixed vow consists of both personal and real elements, e.g., to make a pilgrimage to a shrine and to contribute funds for a new chapel there.

Obligation

Canon 1193 — By its nature a vow obliges only the person who makes it.

This is a change from the previous law (CIC 1310, §1), which said that the obligation of a real vow, or the real part of a mixed vow, passes on to the heirs of the one who died without having fulfilled the vow. There might be a moral or legal obligation on the part of heirs to fulfill the vow of a deceased person, but there is no obligation arising from that person's vow itself.

Cessation

Canon 1194 — A vow ceases by the lapse of the time designated to fulfill the obligation, by a substantial change of the matter promised, by the absence of a condition on which the vow depends, by the absence of the purpose of the vow, by dispensation, or by commutation.

A vow ceases to bind when the obligation of the vow is fulfilled. There are six other ways by which a vow ceases to bind:

(1) when the time appointed for the fulfillment of the obligation has passed, e.g., one vows to make a pilgrimage to Rome during the Holy Year and it is not possible to fulfill the vow during that year;

(2) when there has been a substantial change in the matter promised, i.e., the thing promised becomes impossible or wrongful whether in itself or due to circumstances, e.g., one vows to attend Mass each year at a certain church and the church is closed, or one vows to give a large donation to the parish building fund and it becomes necessary to use the money to pay for emergency medical care;

(3) when a condition on which the vow depends no longer exists, e.g., one vows to give a donation to the Church if one's mother is cured of cancer and she is not;

(4) when the purpose for which a vow was made no longer exists, e.g., one vows to fast every day because of obesity, and the excess weight is lost;

(5) by dispensation (c. 1196); and

(6) by commutation (c. 1197).

Suspension

Canon 1195 — The person who has power over the matter of the vow can suspend the obligation of the vow for as long a time as the fulfillment of the vow brings disadvantage to that person.

Suspension is a temporary cessation of the fulfillment of a vow; the obligation of the vow resumes when the reason for the suspension ceases. A person who has power over the matter of a vow is a person whose own rights are affected by the vow of another. If this person's rights are adversely affected by the fulfillment of the vow, he or she may suspend the vow in question, even against the will of the one who made the vow.

Dispensation

Canon 1196 — In addition to the Roman Pontiff, the following can dispense from private vows for a just cause provided that a dispensation does not injure a right acquired by others:

1° the local ordinary and the pastor with regard to all their subjects and even travelers;
2° the superior of a religious institute or society of apostolic life if it is clerical and of pontifical right with regard to members, novices, and persons who live day and night in a house of the institute or society;
3° those to whom the Apostolic See or the local ordinary has delegated the power of dispensing.

Dispensation from a vow is its complete cancellation for a just reason by an authority competent in law. Just reasons include the public good, a serious difficulty in fulfilling the vow, excessive scrupulosity. In doubt or error about the adequacy of the reason, the dispensation may be lawfully given.

The acquired right (cf. c. 4) which may be injured must be understood in a strict sense, i.e., only a right which has been lawfully acquired, not something which is merely promised. For example, some years ago a man had vowed to endow a chair at a Catholic university and had established a foundation for this purpose upon which the funding of the chair has since depended, but recently his personal fortune suffered losses and now he wants to dissolve the foundation which he controls; he may not be dispensed from his vow without the agreement of the university since its acquired right to these funds would be harmed.

Commentators on the 1917 code said that only the Holy See was able to dispense from a vow if those who would be harmed by the dispensation refused to consent to it.[88] Since Vatican II it must be presumed that the diocesan bishop also has this power.[89] Although canons 85–93 are not applicable here since they deal only with dispensation from laws, not vows, these canons may be helpful as a parallel passage (cf. c. 17).

Transients (vagi) are not expressly mentioned here, but they are included in number one because they are subjects of the local ordinary and the pastor in the place where they are staying (cf. c. 102, §2). The local ordinary or pastor may give the dispensation to his subjects whether they are in or outside the territory at the time of the dispensation, and whether he himself is in or outside his own territory when he dispenses.

Those who stay day and night in a house of a religious institute or society of apostolic life include students and other residents, lay staff, and even guests who stay overnight.

Commutation

Canon 1197 — The person who makes a private vow can commute the work promised by the vow into a better or equal good; however, one who has the power of dispensing according to the norm of can. 1196 can commute it into a lesser good.

The commutation of a vow is the substitution of the act or work (opus) promised by the vow to some other act. If the act to be substituted is as good or better than the original act that was vowed, the person who made the vow can commute it. If the act to be substituted is a lesser good than the original act that was vowed, the commutation is validly granted only by a competent superior as in the previous canon. The authorities competent to dispense are also competent to commute the vow to a greater or equal good—not just to a lesser good—if this is desired by the person seeking the commutation.[90]

Suspension by Religious Profession

Canon 1198 — Vows made before religious profession are suspended while the person who made the vow remains in the religious institute.

Any private vow is suspended by the law itself at the first profession of a religious (c. 655), and it continues to be suspended as long as the religious remains in the institute, i.e., until definitive departure at which time the vow begins to bind again.[91] A religious may continue to observe the non-binding vow if he or she wishes, but only with the permission of the competent superior if the act in question is incompatible with religious obligations or arouses public notice, e.g., if the religious must miss a common act of the community in order to perform the deed privately vowed. This canon does not apply to members of societies of apostolic life who should seek a dispensation from a private vow if this is warranted.

[88] See, e.g., S. Woywod, A Practical Commentary on the Code of Canon Law, rev. by C. Smith (New York: Joseph F. Wagner, 1946) n. 1333.

[89] LG 27; CD 8, 11; c. 381, §1.

[90] This may happen if the person is ignorant of or reluctant to use his or her own power to commute.

CHAPTER II
AN OATH
[cc. 1199–1204]

The six canons of this chapter treat: the definition of an oath and the prohibition of a proxy (c. 1199); the obligation and nullity of oaths (c. 1200); the nature of a promissory oath (c. 1201); the cessation of the obligation of an oath (c. 1202); suspension, dispensation, and commutation of oaths (c. 1203); and the strict interpretation of oaths (c. 1204).

Definition, Proxy

Canon 1199 — §1. An oath, that is, the invocation of the divine name in witness to the truth, cannot be taken unless in truth, in judgment, and in justice.

§2. An oath which the canons require or permit cannot be taken validly through a proxy.

By swearing an oath, one takes God as a witness to the truth or sincerity of what one says or promises. While the essence of a vow is a promise made to God, an oath is an invocation of the divine name. No precise wording for an oath is prescribed; any suitable formula may be used provided God is invoked.

Oaths are classified as assertory or promissory. An assertory oath is one by which God is invoked to bear witness to the truth of an affirmation or to the denial of some fact. A promissory oath is one by which God is invoked to attest to the sincerity of intention of the oath-taker with regard to a future act or omission of an act which he or she is now promising. The promissory oath always concerns the future.[92] An example of a promissory oath is the oath of fidelity on assuming an office to be exercised in the name of the Church.[93] In a judicial proceeding, an oath taken before testifying is a promissory oath by which the person promises to tell the truth; an oath taken after the testimony is an assertory oath by which the person asserts that he or she has told the truth (cf. c. 1532).

The words "in truth, in judgment, and in justice" come from Jeremiah 4:2. The elements of truth, judgment, and justice pertain to both assertory and promissory oaths. Regarding truth, in an assertory oath a person swears to assert the truth as he or she knows it; in a promissory oath the person must have a true and sincere intention to fulfill the promise made. A false assertion or promise made under oath before an ecclesiastical authority constitutes the crime of perjury which is to be punished by a just penalty (c. 1368). Judgment requires careful discernment or judgment of the reason for taking an oath; only some cause of real necessity or importance justifies the taking of an oath. Justice demands, in the case of an assertory oath, that the affirmation or negation which the person wishes to corroborate be lawful; in the case of a promissory oath, justice requires that the person be able to assume morally and lawfully the obligation of fulfilling the promise (cf. c. 1201, §2).

The second paragraph prohibits a person from using another to swear an oath on his or her behalf. Although in the strict sense this requirement pertains only to oaths demanded or admitted in the canons, i.e., in the code, it may be taken as a general rule applicable also to oaths required or admitted by ecclesiastical laws outside the code. It does not apply, however, to oaths that are not required or admitted by the law. An oath submitted on one's own initiative could be taken by a proxy.

[91] Applicable to definitive departure are cc. 684, §5; 688; 689; 692; 694–700; but not 686 on exclaustration.

[92] E. J. Moriarty, Oaths in Ecclesiastical Courts, CanLawStud 110 (1937) 3.

[93] See commentary at c. 833; cf. also cc. 380, 1454, 1283, 1°.

Obligation, Nullity

Canon 1200 — §1. A person who freely swears to do something is bound by a special obligation of religion to fulfill what he or she affirmed by oath.

§2. An oath extorted by malice, force, or grave fear is null by the law itself.

The first paragraph applies only to promissory oaths. A religious obligation is incurred by a promise made under oath, unlike a simple promise which does not invoke the divine name. The second paragraph applies to all oaths. Malice, force, or grave fear can invalidate an oath; also, an oath is invalid if it was sworn in ignorance or error concerning an element which constitutes its substance or which amounts to a condition sine qua non.[94] In contrast with canon 1191, §3 which expressly mentions that fear or malice must be unjust, this canon implicitly suggests the element of injustice through the use of the word "extorted."[95]

Nature of Promissory Oath

Canon 1201 — §1. A promissory oath follows the nature and conditions of the act to which it is attached.

§2. If an oath is added to an act which directly tends toward the harm of others or toward the disadvantage of the public good or of eternal salvation, then the act is not reinforced by the oath.

The first paragraph states the principle that an oath does not change the nature of the promise or any conditions that might be attached to it. The oath reinforces the promise by making it a religious obligation, but the promise itself is in no way altered. For example, a wealthy woman swears to donate a large sum of money to the diocese if the bishop builds a certain shrine, but the bishop wants the money for another purpose. The woman is not bound to give him the money, even though she swore an oath, because the promise was conditioned.

The second paragraph says, in effect, that an oath is invalid if the act that is promised directly tends to be harmful to others or disadvantageous to the public good or eternal salvation. An act that would have deleterious effects would be contrary to the virtue of religion, specifically the virtue of justice which is a defining element of an oath (c. 1199, §1). An oath sworn to fulfill such an act would have no effect.

Cessation of Obligation

Canon 1202 — The obligation arising from a promissory oath ceases:

1° if it is remitted by the person for whose benefit the oath was made;

2° if the matter sworn to is substantially changed or if, after the circumstances have changed, it becomes either evil or entirely indifferent or, finally, impedes a greater good;

3° if the purpose or a condition under which the oath may have been taken ceases;

4° by dispensation or commutation, according to the norm of can. 1203.

A promissory oath ceases to bind when the promised act has been fulfilled. The obligation ceases before its fulfillment in the nine ways mentioned in the canon:

(1) if the beneficiary remits the thing sworn, e.g., the bishop refuses to accept a donation a person has sworn to give for a specific purpose;

(2) if what is sworn is substantially changed, e.g., a man swears to donate his house to a religious community but the house is destroyed by fire;

[94] See c. 126 and commentary on c. 1191, §3.

[95] Comm 12 (1980) 378.

(3) if due to changed circumstances what is sworn becomes evil, e.g., a man swears to marry a certain woman but then discovers she does not want children;

(4) if due to changed circumstances what is sworn becomes entirely indifferent, e.g., a woman swears to give the parish a certain statue sought by the pastor, but a new pastor does not care whether she gives it or not;

(5) if due to changed circumstances what is sworn would impede a greater good, e.g., a man swears to make a pilgrimage at a certain time, but it becomes necessary to care for his ailing mother;

(6) if the purpose for which the oath was taken no longer exists, e.g., a woman swears to leave a bequest to her parish, but the parish is closed before she dies;

(7) if a condition under which an oath was taken no longer exists, e.g., a man swears to assist an impoverished neighbor (the fact of his poverty being an implied condition), but then the neighbor gets a good job;

(8) by dispensation; or

(9) by commutation.

Suspension, Dispensation, Commutation

Canon 1203 — Those who can suspend, dispense, or commute a vow have the same power in the same manner over a promissory oath; but if the dispensation from the oath tends to the disadvantage of others who refuse to remit the obligation of the oath, only the Apostolic See can dispense the oath.

Canons 1195–1197 on the suspension, dispensation, and commutation of vows are also applicable to promissory oaths. There is one significant difference: this canon expressly restricts to the Apostolic See a dispensation from an oath when the dispensation may disadvantage others who have refused to remit its obligation. Under these circumstances, a dispensation from an oath by an authority inferior to the Apostolic See would be invalid.

While canon 1198 allows for the automatic suspension of private vows made by a person before his or her religious profession, there is no such provision with regard to promissory oaths. If a promissory oath conflicts in any way with the religious life, it should be suspended, dispensed, or commuted in accord with canons 1195–1197.

Strict Interpretation

Canon 1204 — An oath must be interpreted strictly according to the law and according to the intention of the person taking the oath or, if that person acts out of malice, according to the intention of the person to whom the oath is made.

Oaths are to be interpreted according to the strict wording of what is sworn. In the case of some oaths, the law itself is the principal basis for understanding the meaning of the oath. For example, many church officials must swear to assume certain obligations when they take the oath of fidelity on assuming an office to be exercised in the name of the Church.[96] These obligations must be interpreted according to the strict meaning of the words of the oath and only in reference to the requirements of the law to which they refer.

If there is doubt about the meaning of an oath, the intention of the person taking the oath should be considered. For example, a woman swears an oath before her pastor to give the parish a gold chalice. The woman's intention in swearing the oath determines the meaning of "gold chalice," whether it be solid gold or gold plated. However, if the oath is sworn deceitfully, the intention of the person to whom the oath was made prevails. For example, a pawn shop dealer swears an oath that the chalice he is selling the pastor is gold, and the pastor thinks he is getting a solid gold chalice because the price is too high for a gold-plated chalice. The pastor buys the chalice, discovers it is only gold plated, and wants his money back. In interpreting the meaning of "gold chalice," the pastor's intention to buy a solid gold chalice prevails over the intention of the dealer to sell a gold-plated chalice because the pastor was deceived by the ambiguous wording of the oath.

[96] See commentary on c. 833.

Bibliography

Anandarayar, A. "Cremation and Ecclesiastical Legislation." Indian Theological Studies 30 (1993) 131–144.

D'Ostilio, F. "Il culto dei santi beati venerabili servi di Dio: Ciò che è dovuto permesso vietato auspicabile." ME 117 (1992) 63–90.

Henchal, M. J. "Cremation: Canonical Issues." J 55 (1995) 281–298.

Huels, J. M. "The Liturgy of the Hours in Parishes." In More Disputed Questions in the Liturgy, 85–96. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1996.

———. The Pastoral Companion: A Canon Law Handbook for Catholic Ministry, chapter 13. 2nd rev. ed. Quincy, Ill.: Franciscan, 1995.

McIntyre, J. P. "An Apology for the 'Lesser Sacraments.'" J 51 (1991) 390–414.

Seasoltz, R. K. New Liturgy, New Laws, chapters 9–10. Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1980.

Spirito, P. "Il giuramento nel diritto canonico." Apol 61 (1988) 807–815.

Sucheski, Z. "La cremazione nella legislazione della chiesa." Apol 66 (1993) 653–728.

Zammit, J. Il voto e la promessa. Rome: Pontifical Lateran University, 1995.

Part III
SACRED PLACES AND TIMES
[cc. 1205–1253]

Part three is divided into two titles, one on sacred places and the other on sacred times. The principal sources for this section are the 1917 Code of Canon Law, Sacrosanctum Concilium (Vatican II's constitution on the liturgy), the 1977 Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar of the Roman Pontifical, the 1975 General Instruction of the Roman Missal, the 1969 General Roman Calendar,[1] and the 1966 apostolic constitution of Pope Paul VI, Poenitemini,[2] which was a major revision of the Church's penitential discipline.

Since the promulgation of the 1983 code, a revised title of the Roman Ritual and a revised liturgical book which are pertinent to matters treated in this section have been published. The first of these is De benedictionibus of 1984 which was significantly adapted by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL) and the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) and was published under the name Book of Blessings.[3] The revised liturgical book is the Caeremoniale episcoporum of 1984; the English version, the Ceremonial of Bishops, appeared in 1989. Another important document that touches on some of the matters treated here, and which has actually changed the previous discipline,[4] is the 1993 Directory for the Application of the Principles and Norms on Ecumenism. Other ecclesiastical documents containing provisions related to this section are mentioned in the footnotes.

In reference to sacred places, the Eastern code treats only churches and cemeteries (CCEO 868–874); funerals are treated in the same section with cemeteries (cc. 874–879). Feast days and days of penance are treated together (CCEO 880–883).[5]

[1] Paul VI, mp Mysterii paschalis, February 14, 1969, AAS 61 (1969) 222–226; DOL 442.

[2] February 17, 1966, AAS 58 (1966) 177–198; The Pope Speaks 11 (1966) 363–371; excerpts in DOL 358.

[3] The English translation of De benedictionibus was published in 1987 by ICEL; newly composed blessings were published by the USCC in 1988. The completed Book of Blessings (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1989) went into effect for the dioceses of the U.S. on December 3, 1989.

[4] See the commentary on c. 1248.

[5] Further references to the Eastern code are made only when there is a notable difference from the Latin law.

TITLE I
SACRED PLACES
[cc. 1205–1243]

Title I has an introductory section on sacred places in general (cc. 1205–1213) followed by five chapters on churches (cc. 1214–1222), oratories and private chapels (cc. 1223–1229), shrines (cc. 1230–1234), altars (cc. 1235–1239), and cemeteries (cc. 1240–1243). The introductory section has nine canons that treat: the definition of sacred places (c. 1205), the minister of dedications (c. 1206), the minister of blessings (c. 1207), certificate of blessing or dedication (c. 1208), proof of dedication or blessing (c. 1209), sacred and profane uses of sacred places (c. 1210), the desecration of sacred places (c. 1211), the loss of dedication or blessing (c. 1212), and the right of ecclesiastical authority vis-à-vis sacred places.

Definition

Canon 1205 — Sacred places are those which are designated for divine worship or for the burial of the faithful by a dedication or a blessing which the liturgical books prescribe for this purpose.

A sacred place is a place that: (1) has been lawfully designated for divine worship or the burial of the faithful by the competent ordinary, and (2) has been dedicated or blessed according to the proper liturgical rite. Churches, oratories, private chapels, shrines, and altars are dedicated or blessed according to the Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar.[6] Cemeteries are blessed according to the Rite of Blessing a Cemetery.[7] Only those places which are destined for divine worship or the burial of the faithful should be dedicated or blessed according to these rites.[8] For example, a church hall that is to be used for Sunday Mass and for other purposes during the week should not be dedicated or blessed as a sacred place, but should be given an appropriate blessing from the Book of Blessings, which blessing would not make it a sacred place.[9]

Minister of Dedications

Canon 1206 — The dedication of any place belongs to the diocesan bishop and to those equivalent to him by law; they can entrust the function of carrying out a dedication in their territory to any bishop or, in exceptional cases, to a presbyter.

Only churches and altars are dedicated; other sacred places are blessed. A dedication is a sacramental that makes a church or an altar a sacred place.[10] Once dedicated, the church or altar is excluded from profane uses. The ordinary minister of dedication is the diocesan bishop,[11] but if he is unable to preside, he is to entrust it to another bishop, preferably to one who assists him in the pastoral care of the community for which the church has been built or, in altogether special circumstances, to a presbyter to whom he must give a special mandate.[12] The mandate may be given orally or in writing.

Minister of Blessings

Canon 1207 — Sacred places are blessed by the ordinary; the blessing of churches, however, is reserved to the diocesan bishop. Either of them, [6] This is the general title of what are actually several separate rites, individually titled and numbered. There are rites for the laying of the foundation stone or commencement of work on the building of a church, dedication of a church, dedication of a church already in use for sacred celebrations, dedication of an altar, blessing of a church, blessing of an altar, blessing of a chalice and paten.

[7] DB ch. 35, BB ch. 43.

[8] See c. 1210 for an exception to the rule that sacred places must be used solely for religious purposes.

[9] See BB ch. 16, "Order for the Blessing of a Parish Hall or Catechetical Center."

[10] See the commentary on cc. 1169 and 1217.

[11] This includes the canonical equivalents of the diocesan bishop. See cc. 381, §2 and 427, §1.

[12] RDCA II, 6; IV, 12.

moreover, can delegate another priest for this purpose.

The general rule is that the blessing of a sacred place is celebrated by the ordinary who is competent in accord with canon 134, §1. The blessing of churches, in the strict sense of canon 1214, is reserved to the diocesan bishop, as is the dedication of altars.[13] Delegation for the blessing of a sacred place would usually be a special delegation for a specific case, but general delegation is not excluded.

Certificate of Blessing or Dedication

Canon 1208 — When the dedication or blessing of a church or the blessing of a cemetery has been completed, a document is to be drawn up, one copy of which is to be kept in the diocesan curia and another in the archive of the church.

The canon is concerned only with churches and cemeteries, not other sacred places. Nevertheless, it would be helpful to observe this canon also for other places to have written proof of their blessing, especially in later years when witnesses are no longer living. The liturgical law gives rules for recording the dedication of a church and altar, which in part may also serve as a suppletory norm (c. 19) for the blessing of other sacred places:

> The record of the dedication of the church should be drawn up in duplicate, signed by the bishop, the rector of the church, and representatives of the local community; one copy is to be kept in the diocesan archives, the other in the archives of the church.... In this record mention should be made of the day, month, and year of the church's dedication, the name of the bishop who celebrated the rite, also the titular of the church and, where applicable, the names of the martyrs or saints whose relics have been deposited beneath the altar.[14]

Proof of Dedication or Blessing

Canon 1209 — The dedication or blessing of any place is sufficiently proven by one witness who is above suspicion, provided that no harm is done to anyone.

Anyone who has the use of reason can act as a witness. A witness above suspicion is a person of good reputation who would have no reason to lie. An oath (c. 1199) can be administered to give additional juridical value to the witness's testimony. The testimony of a single witness does not suffice if that testimony could harm anyone's interests. The interests in question would principally be either those of the owner of the place or of the persons who use the place.[15]

Sacred and Profane Uses

Canon 1210 — Only those things which serve the exercise or promotion of worship, piety, or religion are permitted in a sacred place; anything not consonant with the holiness of the place is forbidden. In an individual case, however, the ordinary can permit other uses which are not contrary to the holiness of the place.

[13] The commentary at c. 1217 explains when a church should be dedicated and when it should be blessed.

[14] RDCA II, 25.

[15] For example, a pontifical lay religious institute wants to demolish an old shrine, dear to some faithful, that requires costly repairs, and sell the property it stands on. Provided the value of the shrine and property does not exceed the limit for an alienation, the religious could have it demolished on their own authority if it were not blessed. If it had been blessed, the diocesan bishop could block demolition by refusing to decree the loss of blessing (c. 1212), and the institute would be faced with taking recourse to the Holy See or submitting to the will of the bishop. In this case the shrine's blessing could not be proved merely on the basis of one witness, since the witness's testimony would harm the interests of the religious institute.

The ordinary's permission is not needed to use a sacred place for a purpose that serves the exercise or promotion of worship, piety, or religion, e.g., a concert of sacred music,[16] a sacred drama, a retreat conference. The pastor, superior, or other person in charge of the sacred place could permit this. The ordinary's permission is necessary for each case to use a sacred place for a secular purpose, e.g., a concert of classical music which is secular in inspiration, graduation exercises, a talk on a secular topic in the interest of the public good. No permission may be given to use a sacred place for anything that offends against the holiness of the place, e.g., a concert of loud rock music, a political rally, merchandising.

Desecration

Canon 1211 — Sacred places are violated by gravely injurious actions done in them with scandal to the faithful, actions which, in the judgment of the local ordinary, are so grave and contrary to the holiness of the place that it is not permitted to carry on worship in them until the damage is repaired by a penitential rite according to the norm of the liturgical books.

The Ceremonial of Bishops has a chapter devoted to "Public Prayer after the Desecration of the Church," but a footnote explains that the rite of public prayer to be observed, described as a penitential rite of reparation, is to be used for the desecration of any sacred place.[17] The canon speaks of "violation" rather than "desecration" but, since the Ceremonial was published after the code, it is clear that the term "desecration" is not obsolete.

The Ceremonial of Bishops speaks of the harmful, scandalous actions that desecrate a sacred place as crimes: "The crimes in question are those that do grave dishonor to sacred mysteries, especially to the eucharistic species, and are committed to show contempt for the Church, or are crimes that are serious offenses against the dignity of the person and of society."[18] Since the profanation of a sacred thing, movable or immovable, is itself a crime (c. 1376), it is not necessary that any additional canonical delict be committed, but the action must be objectively serious, cause serious harm and scandal to the faithful, and be contrary to the holiness of the place. The local ordinary judges whether these conditions exist. If so, the penitential rite of reparation is to be celebrated. In the case of a church that has been dedicated, the diocesan bishop is the proper minister,[19] but delegation of another bishop or presbyter is not excluded. For places that have been blessed, the rite may be fittingly celebrated by the bishop, other ordinary, the priest in charge of the place, or another priest who has their permission, whether express or at least presumed.

The reparation rite is to be celebrated as soon as possible, either as part of Mass or a liturgy of the word. Until that time, no sacrament or other rite may be celebrated in the place. Instead there should be preaching and devotional exercises to prepare the people for the penitential rite of reparation, and they should be encouraged to celebrate the sacrament of penance for their own inner con-

[16] See CDW, letter to the presidents of episcopal conferences and the presidents of national liturgical commissions, November 5, 1987, N 24 (1988) 3–10. In n. 10 of this letter it says that the ordinary's permission is necessary for a concert in the church, but it fails to distinguish between concerts of sacred or religious music and concerts of secular music. In keeping with c. 1210, the ordinary's permission is needed only for concerts of secular music, since a concert of sacred or religious music falls within the meaning of serving the promotion of piety or religion. See J. Huels, "Canonical Comments on Concerts in Churches," W 62 (1988) 165–172; and idem, Disputed Questions in the Liturgy Today (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1988) 111–120.

[17] CB VI, ch. 20.

[18] CB 1070. CIC 1172 listed the crimes that brought about the desecration of a church, provided they were certain, notorious, and committed within the church itself: (1) homicide; (2) a sinful and serious shedding of blood; (3) godless and disgraceful uses to which the church has been converted; (4) burial of an infidel or of a person excommunicated by condemnatory or declaratory sentence.

[19] CB 1072.

version.[20] The sacrament of penance would have to be celebrated in some other church or oratory (c. 964, §1) since no sacrament may be celebrated in the sacred place before the rite of reparation.

Loss of Dedication or Blessing

Canon 1212 — Sacred places lose their dedication or blessing if they have been destroyed in large part, or have been turned over permanently to profane use by decree of the competent ordinary or in fact.

If a sacred place cannot be used before major repairs due to destruction by war, arson, vandalism, natural disasters, etc., it loses its dedication or blessing. The mere deterioration of a church that has been in steady use and requires temporary repairs during which the place cannot be used would not result in the loss of dedication or blessing. However, in the case of a major restoration of a sacred place which includes a new altar, there should be a new dedication or blessing. If the same altar is used and there has been no major destruction, there may not be a new dedication of the church after restoration because the dedication of the altar is a central part of the rite of dedication. A church that has been elevated in status, such as a church being ranked as a parish church, may have a new dedication provided a new altar is to be dedicated.[21]

If a sacred place is to be given over permanently for profane uses, the competent ordinary should first issue a decree in writing, directed to the person responsible for the sacred place, stating that the place in question is no longer a sacred place and has by the decree lost its dedication or blessing. The issuance of the decree is subject to the rules for individual administrative acts and individual decrees (cc. 35–47, 48–58), and recourse may be taken against it if a person, physical or juridic, is aggrieved by it. Although a sacred place also loses its dedication or blessing when in fact it has been permanently given over for secular purposes, this is not a legal option for omitting a decree but simply a provision of law in case a decree is not issued. A decree should be issued because it recognizes the authority of the ordinary who had the competence to establish the sacred place, it leaves no uncertainty about the status of the place, and it allows the possibility of recourse.

Right of Church Authority

Canon 1213 — The ecclesiastical authority freely exercises its powers and functions in sacred places.

This is a statement of the right of competent church authorities to conduct their own legitimate affairs in any sacred place without interference from the state or other entity or person. This assertion may have practical effects. In some places the secular courts may defer to canon law when it is not contrary to the civil law. In other places where canon law is not recognized, and even in places where the rights of the Church are violated by the State, it is all the more important that the Church's rights be stated unambiguously in law so that there is a secure basis for protesting offenses against the free exercise of the Catholic faith in sacred places and for seeking redress.[22]

CHAPTER I CHURCHES
[cc. 1214–1222]

The nine canons of this chapter treat: the definition of a church (c. 1214), the necessity of the bishop's consent to establish a church (c. 1215), the liturgical norms and expert advice to be followed (c. 1216), the dedication of a new church (c. 1217), the title of a church (c. 1218), the right to divine worship in a church (c. 1219), care for [20] CB 1071.

[21] RDCA III, 1.

[22] The right of a fugitive to seek asylum in a church, recognized in the former law (CIC 1179), was suppressed in the revised code.

churches (c. 1220), free entry to churches for divine worship (c. 1221), and the relegation of churches to profane uses (c. 1222).

Definition

Canon 1214 — By the term church is understood a sacred building designated for divine worship to which the faithful have the right of entry for the exercise, especially the public exercise, of divine worship.

The principal juridical element defining a church—as distinct from an oratory (c. 1223) or a private chapel (c. 1226)—is the right of the faithful to go there. The most common examples of churches are cathedrals and parish churches. Because churches have a public character, they are subject to the authority and oversight of the diocesan bishop.[23]

Consent of Bishop

Canon 1215 — §1. No church is to be built without the express written consent of the diocesan bishop.

§2. The diocesan bishop is not to give consent unless, after having heard the presbyteral council and the rectors of the neighboring churches, he judges that the new church can serve the good of souls and that the means necessary for building the church and for divine worship will not be lacking.

§3. Although religious institutes have received from the diocesan bishop consent to establish a new house in the diocese or the city, they must also obtain his permission before building a church in a certain and determined place.

The rules of this canon apply for both the building of a new church and the canonical establishment of a church in a place where an oratory or chapel already exists. Consultation with the presbyteral council and the rectors of the neighboring churches is a requirement for the validity of the act (cc. 124, 127). The term "rector" as used here refers to the pastor, religious superior, chaplain, or anyone in charge of the neighboring churches, not just the rectors of canon 556. The neighboring churches are only those churches in the sense of canon 1214, not oratories, shrines, or private chapels. The bishop must listen to the advice of the presbyteral council and the neighboring rectors and afterward decide whether the new church will serve the pastoral good and whether it has adequate financial prospects.

If the bishop approves the establishment of a formal religious house in accord with canons 608–611, the religious institute, if it is clerical, has a right to have a church (c. 611, 3°). Thus, the bishop can give the institute a church already established. The institute does not have a right to build a new church, though it does have the right to build a new oratory. To build a church requires the additional consent of the bishop as prescribed by this canon, which includes the bishop's approval of the exact site for it.

Liturgical Norms and Expert Advice

Canon 1216 — In the building and repair of churches, the principles and norms of the liturgy and of sacred art are to be observed, after the advice of experts has been taken into account.

Principles and norms on church art and architecture are chiefly found in Vatican II's constitution on the liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium, and the liturgical books.[24] These principles and norms require that churches be designed in keeping with their proper liturgical function and that they be worthy of the rites to be celebrated there.

[23] See cc. 397; 557; 683, §1; 738, §2.

[24] SC 122–128, GIRM 253–280, RDCA II, 3. Also helpful is the BCL statement, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1978). Although this statement of itself has no binding force, it is based on principles and norms of the liturgy and of sacred art which themselves are binding. The statement was prepared by experts under the authority of the bishops' committee and is a reliable and authoritative resource for matters of church art and architecture.

> Churches and other places of worship should be suited to celebrating the liturgy and to ensuring the active participation of the faithful. Further, the places and requisites for worship should be truly worthy and beautiful, signs and symbols of heavenly realities.[25]
>
> The very nature of a church demands that it be suited to sacred celebrations, dignified, evincing a noble beauty, not mere costly display, and it should stand as a sign and symbol of heavenly realities. The general plan of the sacred edifice should be such that in some way it conveys the image of the gathered assembly. It should also allow the participants to take the place most appropriate to them and assist all to carry out their individual functions properly.[26]

Among those whose advice must be sought in the construction, restoration, or remodeling of churches are the diocesan commissions on liturgy and art.[27] Other experts to be consulted should include a reputable architect and, when possible, a liturgical consultant.[28]

Dedication of a New Church

Canon 1217 — §1. After construction has been completed properly, a new church is to be dedicated or at least blessed as soon as possible; the laws of the sacred liturgy are to be observed.

§2. Churches, especially cathedrals and parish churches, are to be dedicated by the solemn rite.

The ideal expressed in the canon is that a new church should be dedicated or at least blessed as soon as it is completed and before it is used for divine worship. The reason for this is primarily to bring out fully the symbolism and meaning of the rite of dedication.[29] Moreover, without the dedication or blessing it is not a sacred place and Mass may not be celebrated there except in a particular case of need (c. 932, §1). It is preferable to dedicate rather than bless churches; cathedral and parish churches must be dedicated.[30] However, a church must be blessed rather than dedicated if there is no altar to be dedicated, or if the place is only temporarily set aside for divine worship, e.g., a building destined to become a parish hall after the church is built.[31] The solemn rites of dedication and blessing are those in the Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar.[32]

When a church is dedicated, such appointments as the baptismal font, cross, images and statues, organ, bells, and stations of the cross are to be considered as blessed, duly erected, and installed.[33] This rule also applies to the blessing of a church.

The Eastern code uses the term "consecration" of a church rather than "dedication." The consecration of churches is reserved to the eparchial bishop, who can grant the faculty of consecrating only to another bishop (CCEO 871).

Title of Church

Canon 1218 — Each church is to have its own title which cannot be changed after the church has been dedicated.

The title that is given may be the Blessed Trinity, a mystery in the life of Christ, or a title already accepted in the liturgy, the Blessed Virgin Mary under a title already accepted in the liturgy, the Holy Spirit, one of the angels, or an approved

[25] GIRM 253, DOL 1643.
[26] RDCA II, 3; DOL 4371.
[27] GIRM 256, SC 126.
[28] The Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions in Washington, D.C. publishes a national directory of consultants. Some helpful publications are M. B. Mauck, Places for Worship: A Guide to Building and Renovating (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1995); and idem, Shaping a House for the Church (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1990).
[29] RDCA III, 1.
[30] GIRM 255.
[31] RDCA III, 1; V, 1.
[32] Cf. also CB VI, 864–971. For further discussion on the dedication or blessing of a church, see the commentary on cc. 1169 and 1205–1209.
[33] CB 864.

saint. The title may not be that of a blessed without an indult of the Apostolic See. There may be only one title, except in the case of saints listed together in the Roman Calendar.[34] The titular feast of the church is celebrated annually with the rank of a solemnity. The feast of the Assumption is the feast day for all churches named after the Blessed Virgin Mary without a particular mystery or title or with a title that lacks its own liturgical day.[35]

Additional norms governing the titles of churches were issued in 1999. Chief among these are:

(1) Once a blessed is approved by the Holy See for insertion in a diocesan liturgical calendar, it is not necessary to have a further indult to name a church after that blessed in that diocese.

(2) Once a church is dedicated, the title may not be changed except for grave reasons and with an indult of the Apostolic See.

(3) If the church has not been dedicated but only blessed, the diocesan bishop may change the title for a grave reason after carefully considering all the circumstances.

(4) If several parishes are suppressed and a new one is established using one of the churches, its title must be retained, but it may be changed if it is a new building. The churches of the suppressed parishes are also to retain their own titles if they are considered to be "co-parishes."

(5) If several parishes are each suppressed and united into one new parish, it is permitted, for pastoral reasons, to give it a new name different from the previous title of the parish church.[36]

Right to Divine Worship

Canon 1219 — In a church that has legitimately been dedicated or blessed, all acts of divine worship can be performed, without prejudice to parochial rights.

This is a statement of the right to celebrate liturgical actions in a church once it has been dedicated or blessed. Certain liturgical celebrations are ordinarily reserved to parish churches and cathedrals, notably infant baptism, confirmation, adult initiation, the reception of a baptized person into full communion with the Catholic Church, marriages, and funerals.[37] The right to liturgical celebrations in a church is lost when the dedication or blessing is lost in accord with canons 1212 and 1222.

Care for Churches

Canon 1220 — §1. All those responsible are to take care that in churches such cleanliness and beauty are preserved as befit a house of God and that whatever is inappropriate to the holiness of the place is excluded.

§2. Ordinary care for preservation and fitting means of security are to be used to protect sacred and precious goods.

This is an exhortation directed to those responsible for the upkeep of churches. It expresses common sense values which may hardly seem necessary in a code of law. However, the canon would serve a useful purpose if an abuse needed to be corrected.

Free Entry for the Liturgy

Canon 1221 — Entry to a church is to be free and gratuitous during the time of sacred celebrations.

[34] RDCA II, 4. See V. Lanzani, "Pastor Bonus art. 69: I patroni," N 25 (1989) 226–233.

[35] SCSDW, Decreta authentica 2529.

[36] CDWDS, notification Omnis ecclesia titulum, February 10, 1999, N 35 (1999) 158–159. See also idem, notification Ad spirituale fidelium bonum, November 29, 1998, N 34 (1998) 664; English translation in RR (1999) 20–21.

[37] See cc. 530; 857, §2; 1118, §1; 1177, §1. See also cc. 558, 559, and 560.

This rule, which follows from the right of the faithful to go to a church (c. 1214), applies to all liturgical celebrations. It does not apply at times when no liturgical celebrations are occurring,[38] including special events, such as concerts, held in a church.[39] In some churches of great historic or artistic value a small fee is charged to tourists. Where that is the case, provision should be made for the free entry, at least for some period each day, of those who wish to pray before the blessed sacrament (cf. c. 937).

Relegation to Profane Use

Canon 1222 — §1. If a church cannot be used in any way for divine worship and there is no possibility of repairing it, the diocesan bishop can relegate it to profane but not sordid use.

§2. Where other grave causes suggest that a church no longer be used for divine worship, the diocesan bishop, after having heard the presbyteral council, can relegate it to profane but not sordid use, with the consent of those who legitimately claim rights for themselves in the church and provided that the good of souls suffers no detriment thereby.

The decision to relegate a church to profane use pertains solely to the diocesan bishop, even if the church is owned by a juridic person other than the diocese or parish. Since the diocesan bishop grants permission for the establishment of a church, he is the competent authority to issue the decree that removes its dedication or blessing and relegates it to secular use (c. 1212).

Paragraph one treats a case when it is impossible to repair a badly damaged church. The impossibility of restoring the church does not mean only an architectural impossibility but would also include an impossibility due to insufficient funds available from the parish, religious institute, or other juridic person that owns the church.

The second paragraph covers other situations of grave need when the church still is able to be used for divine worship or when it is possible to restore it to such use. Before relegating such a church to profane use, the diocesan bishop must observe all the requirements of the law.

(1) He must determine if there is a grave reason for doing so, e.g., inadequate finances to maintain the church properly, or a small number of parishioners together with a shortage of priests.

(2) He must consult the presbyteral council (c. 127, §1).

(3) He must have the consent of those who could legitimately claim rights for themselves in the church, which consent is necessary for the validity of his act (c. 127, §2, 1°).

(4) He must determine that the good of souls would not be harmed.

(5) He must determine that the proposed use of the place will not be sordid, which judgment should be made in keeping with cultural variables and local circumstances.

Those who could lawfully claim rights for themselves in the church would in every case be the juridic person or persons who own the church property. For example, a parish owns the church building and a religious institute owns the land on which it was built. The bishop would have to obtain the consent of both the pastor (cc. 515, §3; 532) and the competent authority of the religious institute (c. 638), but not the pastor if the parish has already been suppressed (cc. 515, §2; 123). A physical person might also be able to claim rights, e.g., a major donor to the church whose donation [38] A suggestion to make admission to churches free at all times was deliberately rejected in the code revision process. See Comm 12 (1980) 388.

[39] Nevertheless, the CDWDS suggested to ordinaries, as one of the rules they might require for granting permission for a concert in a church, that admission be free of charge. See letter, n. 10 c, English version, N 24 (1988) 3–10. This is only a suggestion and is not binding unless the ordinary makes it binding on his own authority.

was accepted on the condition that the church would continue in use as a sacred place for a certain period (cf. c. 1284, §1, 3°).

Those who contributed unconditional donations to the building, restoration, or upkeep of the church would not have any claim to the church and the bishop need not consult them or obtain their consent (cf. cc. 1255–1257, 1267), but appropriate consultations of such persons likely would be pastorally beneficial. Although offerings given by the faithful for building or maintaining a church may be used only for that purpose (c. 1267, §3), this principle of law is not a basis for the donors' claiming a right of consent to the relegation of the church to a profane use. Nor is it a basis for claiming a return of the donation that was initially used for the purpose of building or maintaining the church when at a later time that church is lawfully designated by the bishop for a profane purpose. The Church, in the sense of canon 1258, owns the church building; the donors do not. The competent authorities of the Church, in accord with the law, have sole authority to make determinations about the use of a church.

CHAPTER II
ORATORIES AND PRIVATE CHAPELS
[cc. 1223–1229]

The seven canons of this chapter treat: the definition of an oratory (c. 1223), establishment and conversion to profane use (c. 1224), the right to liturgical celebrations (c. 1225), the definition of a private chapel (c. 1226), the right of bishops to have a private chapel (c. 1227), permission for Mass or other sacred celebrations in a chapel (c. 1228), and the blessing of oratories and private chapels (c. 1229).

Definition of an Oratory

Canon 1223 — By the term oratory is understood a place for divine worship designated by permission of the ordinary for the benefit of some community or group of the faithful who gather in it and to which other members of the faithful can also come with the consent of the competent superior.

An oratory, frequently called a "chapel" in ordinary discourse, is different from a church principally in virtue of who has a right to make use of it. All the faithful have the right to go to a church, but only that community or group of people for whom an oratory was established has the right to make use of it. An oratory may be established for any specified community or group of the faithful: a religious community, people in a nursing home, students and staff in a school, etc. Unless the matter is regulated by particular law, the competent superior who may permit others to have access is the person in charge of the institution or other place of which the oratory is a part, such as the superior of a religious house, the administrator of a nursing home, the rector of a seminary, the principal of a school, etc. The competent ordinary whose permission is needed to establish an oratory is defined in canon 134, §1. The permission is to be given in writing (c. 37).

In every house of a religious institute there must be an oratory or a church in which the Eucharist is celebrated and reserved (c. 608). This applies only to religious houses that have been erected with all the formalities of the law (c. 609), not to informal communities of religious. Moreover, the permission of the ordinary for the establishment of the oratory must be obtained even if he has already granted permission to establish a religious house or informal community.[40]

Houses of societies of apostolic life have a right to have an oratory in which the Eucharist is celebrated and reserved but, unlike houses of religious institutes, they are not required to do so (c. 733, §2). For all houses of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life, the rule of canon 934, §2 must also be observed on the custody of the blessed sacrament and the necessity of having a priest celebrate Mass in the oratory on a regular basis, at least twice a month insofar as possible.

[40] The reason for this separate permission is seen in c. 1224: the ordinary must first inspect the place before he can decree its canonical erection as an oratory.

Any oratory other than that of a house of a religious institute or society of apostolic life requires the permission of the local ordinary for the reservation of the Eucharist. This permission is separate from the permission necessary to establish the oratory. Before granting this permission the local ordinary should make certain that provision has been made for the regular celebration of Mass there in accord with canon 934, §2.

Establishment and Conversion to Profane Use

Canon 1224 — §1. The ordinary is not to grant the permission required to establish an oratory unless he has first visited the place destined for the oratory personally or through another and has found it properly prepared.

§2. After permission has been given, however, an oratory cannot be converted to profane use without the authority of the same ordinary.

The canon restricts the ordinary's power: he may not grant permission to establish an oratory unless he or a delegate has visited the place and has found the space and its appointments suitable for its intended uses, especially for the liturgical services that are to be celebrated there. In making this judgment the ordinary should be guided by pertinent principles and norms of liturgy and of sacred art (cf. c. 1216). Once this permission is granted, the oratory may not be used for domestic purposes, but it does not become a sacred place until it has been blessed.[41]

The ordinary who may establish an oratory is the one who is competent to decree that it may be converted to profane uses. Whether or not the oratory was blessed, the ordinary should decree in writing the fact of the oratory's conversion to a secular purpose so that there be legal clarity about the status of the place.[42]

Right to Liturgical Celebrations

Canon 1225 — All sacred celebrations can be performed in legitimately established oratories except those which the law or a prescript of the local ordinary excludes or the liturgical norms prohibit.

This is a statement of a right to have any liturgical celebration in an oratory unless a particular celebration is excluded by law (ius), whether universal or particular, including general administrative norms and legal customs, or by a prescript of the local ordinary. The canon must also be read in conjunction with canon 932, §1 which requires that the Eucharist ordinarily be celebrated in a sacred place. For the oratory to be a sacred place, it must be blessed (c. 1205).

Infant baptism, adult initiation, and marriage are generally celebrated in parish churches, but the universal law also makes provision for them to be celebrated in other churches and oratories (cc. 530, 857, 1118). Funerals may be celebrated only in churches (c. 1177); a dispensation from the diocesan bishop would be necessary to celebrate a Catholic funeral in an oratory unless a legitimate custom, acquired right, or privilege is in force.

Small lay religious communities and other similar communities are encouraged to participate in Mass on Sundays at the parish church.[43] The celebration of the principal liturgies of the Easter triduum by all small communities in oratories and churches is discouraged by the Holy See:

> It is fitting that small religious communities, both clerical and lay, and other lay groups should participate in the celebration of the Easter Triduum in neighboring principal churches. Similarly where the number of participants and ministers is so small that the celebrations of the Easter Triduum cannot be carried out with the requisite solem-

[41] Cf. cc. 1205, 1229; Comm 12 (1980) 339.
[42] See commentary on c. 1212.

[43] SC Rites, instr Eucharisticum mysterium 26, May 25, 1967, AAS 59 (1967) 539–573; DOL 1255.

nity, such groups of the faithful should assemble in a larger church.[44]

A prescript in the context of this canon refers to a singular administrative decree or precept issued by the local ordinary.[45] The local ordinary could prohibit one or more specific liturgical celebrations in an oratory. He should not prohibit the eucharistic celebration in an oratory since it is the central act of divine worship of all communities and groups in the Church and is a chief purpose for having an oratory. Rather, if the competent ordinary has a most serious reason for wanting Mass prohibited in a certain oratory, he should remove by decree the status of the place as an oratory (cc. 1224, §1; 1212).

The bishop may not prohibit the celebration of Sunday Mass in oratories, which the faithful attend with the consent of the competent superior, in order to compel them to attend a parish church. It is clear from canon 1248, §1 that the Sunday Eucharist is not a parochial right.

Definition of a Private Chapel

Canon 1226 — By the term private chapel is understood a place for divine worship designated by permission of the local ordinary for the benefit of one or more physical persons.

Unlike an oratory, which is established for a specific community or group of the faithful, a chapel is established only for one or several persons, e.g., a bishop or a noble family. Except for the case mentioned in the following canon, only the local ordinary may permit the establishment of a private chapel; personal ordinaries may not. By definition, a private chapel is established for the purpose of divine worship, specifically for those liturgical acts that ordinarily are not to be celebrated outside a sacred place. A chapel without the reservation of the blessed sacrament, one that is to be used only for private meditation, the liturgy of the hours, or popular devotions, is not the private chapel of this canon and therefore its erection does not require authorization from the local ordinary.

Privilege of Bishops

Canon 1227 — Bishops can establish a private chapel for themselves which possesses the same rights as an oratory.

The rights of a bishop's chapel are the right to celebrate Mass there, to reserve the blessed sacrament (c. 934, §1, 2°), and to celebrate all other liturgical actions that may be celebrated in an oratory. The right applies to all bishops—diocesan bishops, titular bishops, retired bishops.

Sacred Celebrations

Canon 1228 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1227, the permission of the local ordinary is required for Mass or other sacred celebrations to take place in any private chapel.

The sacred celebrations intended in this canon must be understood as only those liturgical actions which as a rule are to be celebrated in a church or oratory. The local ordinary's permission would not be required to celebrate in a private chapel the liturgy of the hours or most sacramentals. The local ordinary's permission would also not be needed for the celebration of a non-sacramental marriage there.[46]

[44] CDW, littcirc Paschalis sollemnitatis 43, January 16, 1988, N 24 (1988) 81–107; Origins 17 (1988) 679–687. The Roman Missal, in the rubrics for the evening Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday, says that only one Mass of the Lord's Supper may be celebrated in churches and oratories without the permission of the local ordinary.

[45] See cc. 35–58. A restriction on the right to celebrate a specific liturgical act or acts in oratories must be given by the local ordinary observing the formalities of the law. Otherwise the right to that liturgical celebration is not lost.

[46] See c. 1118, §3. The officiating priest or deacon would, of course, need the faculty to assist at the marriage.

The permission to hold sacred celebrations habitually in a private chapel is preferably given in writing as proof of its being granted, especially in later years when there is a new local ordinary. The permission should specify exactly which liturgical celebrations are permitted. Before permission is granted, the local ordinary or his delegate should inspect the place and see if it is suitable for the liturgical celebrations requested (cf. c. 1224, §1). Separate authorization is required to reserve the blessed sacrament in a private chapel (c. 934, §1, 2°). This permission should not be granted unless there is a priest who can celebrate Mass there at least twice a month, as far as possible (c. 934, §2). This rule maintains the intimate connection between the Eucharist celebrated and reserved.[47] Moreover, the local ordinary should require that the chapel be blessed as a condition for granting permission to celebrate the Eucharist there (cc. 932, §1; 1205).

Blessing of Oratory/Private Chapel

Canon 1229 — It is fitting for oratories and private chapels to be blessed according to the rite prescribed in the liturgical books. They must, however, be reserved for divine worship alone and free from all domestic uses.

Oratories and private chapels are blessed, not dedicated. The blessing prescribed for oratories and private chapels is found in chapter 5 of the 1977 Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar of the Roman Pontifical. The minister of blessing is the competent ordinary or his delegate (c. 1207). When an oratory or chapel is blessed, such things in it as the cross, images, organ, and stations of the cross are considered blessed and installed by the one rite of blessing and therefore should not be blessed separately.[48]

An oratory or private chapel that has not been blessed with the official rite of blessing is not a sacred place and is not subject to the limitations on its uses mentioned in canon 1210. Nevertheless the law requires that all oratories and private chapels, even if not blessed, be reserved only for divine worship and be free from all domestic use. This would not exclude occasional non-religious use, provided the use does not cause offense or wonderment to the group or community or persons for whom the oratory or chapel has been established. Although this is not expressly stated in the law, it is evident from the fact that the ordinary may grant permission to use even dedicated churches for a non-religious purpose in individual instances provided it is not contrary to the holiness of the place (c. 1210).[49]

It is appropriate, but not required, that an oratory or a chapel be blessed. Even if an oratory or a chapel has been in use for a long time, it may still be blessed and should be blessed if it is regularly used for the celebration of the Eucharist.[50] If a multi-purpose room is to be used for both cultic and non-cultic activities, it may be blessed by an appropriate blessing from the Roman Ritual,[51] but not with the rite from the Pontifical.

CHAPTER III
SHRINES
[cc. 1230–1234]

The five canons of this chapter treat: the definition of a shrine (c. 1230), national and international shrines (c. 1231), shrine statutes (c. 1232), privileges of shrines (c. 1233), and religious services and votive offerings of art and piety at shrines (c. 1234).

[47] HCWE 1–6.

[48] CB 954.

[49] The one who is permitted to do the more is also permitted to do the less. See RI 53.

[50] See cc. 932, §1 and 1205. In contrast, a church must be dedicated or at least blessed and this should be done, if possible, when the church is first opened for use (RDCA III, 1). The law does not say the same about an oratory or private chapel, so either may be used, even for a long time, before it is blessed; but if Mass is to be celebrated there on a regular basis, it should be blessed as soon as possible.

[51] Cf. BB ch. 16; c. 932, §1.

Definition

Canon 1230 — By the term shrine is understood a church or other sacred place to which numerous members of the faithful make pilgrimage for a special reason of piety, with the approval of the local ordinary.

The notion of a shrine contains two essential elements: (1) it is a sacred place and (2) the local ordinary has approved it for the purpose of pilgrimage by the faithful. A sacred place is one which: (1) has been designated for divine worship or the burial of the faithful, and (2) has been dedicated or blessed with the prescribed liturgical rite (c. 1205). It is necessary that the sacred place and the devotion that is fostered be approved by the local ordinary so that the faithful may go there on pilgrimage if they wish. It is not juridically necessary that a shrine arise out of the people's devotion or even that they actually frequent it; a shrine could be approved with the hope or expectation that this would occur after the shrine is built.

This section on shrines is new to the 1983 code and is not retroactive. In the case of new shrines established since the 1983 code, the local ordinary's approval must be expressed.[52] Prior to the 1983 code, religious institutes or other juridical persons could establish shrines without the express approval of the local ordinary. It is fitting that this approval now be required in the law since divine worship and popular piety are areas subject to regulation by and the vigilance of the diocesan bishop or other local ordinary.[53]

Shrines that have the title of "minor basilica" are also subject to a 1989 Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments decree.[54] This decree lays down the conditions for obtaining the title of minor basilica, the liturgical and pastoral offices and works that are to be provided at basilicas, and special concessions granted to basilicas.

National and International Shrines

Canon 1231 — For a shrine to be called a national shrine, the conference of bishops must give its approval; for it to be called an international shrine, the approval of the Holy See is required.

Shrines that had already been called national or international before the 1983 code went into effect may continue using that title even without the approbation of the competent authority. In the case of competing claims to the title of national or international shrine, the ecclesiastical authorities mentioned in this canon may decide the issue in keeping with the law as well as customs, privileges, acquired rights, the patrimony of institutes of consecrated life (c. 578), and other pertinent facts. In a case of recourse the Congregation for the Clergy has competence.[55]

Statutes

Canon 1232 — §1. The local ordinary is competent to approve the statutes of a diocesan shrine; the conference of bishops for the statutes of a national shrine; the Holy See alone for the statutes of an international shrine.

§2. The statutes are to determine especially the purpose, the authority of the rector, and the ownership and administration of goods.

The law does not require that every shrine have its own statutes, but simply points out who is competent to approve such statutes when they are drawn up. However, the competent authority could [52] Before the 1983 code, the official definition of a shrine, a definition approved by Pope Pius XII in 1955, made no mention of the local ordinary's permission being necessary for a shrine's erection. See DDC 7:870. Local ecclesiastical authority did, however, have competence over pious pilgrimages. See SCConc, decree, February 11, 1936, AAS 28 (1936) 167; CLD 2, 573–575.

[53] See cc. 392; 397; 678, §1; 838, §4; 839, §2.

[54] Decree Domus ecclesiae, November 9, 1989, N 26 (1990) 13–17; BCLN 26 (1990) 217–219. See J. Evenou, "Pastor bonus art. 69: basiliche minori," N 25 (1989) 234–236.

[55] PB 97, 1°.

require such statutes before granting the approval required by the preceding canon. There is an implied preference in this canon that each shrine have its own statutes in order to regulate with clarity the matters mentioned in paragraph two of the canon.

Privileges

Canon 1233 — Certain privileges can be granted to shrines whenever local circumstances, the large number of pilgrims, and especially the good of the faithful seem to suggest it.

Privileges may be granted by a legislator, namely, the diocesan bishop, a particular council, the pope, an ecumenical council, or by an executive authority who has delegation (cf. c. 76). Privileges for a shrine might include the absolution of censures, special indulgences, the celebration of specified parochial functions, etc.

Shrine Services, Votive Offerings

Canon 1234 — §1. At shrines the means of salvation are to be supplied more abundantly to the faithful by the diligent proclamation of the word of God, the suitable promotion of liturgical life especially through the celebration of the Eucharist and of penance, and the cultivation of approved forms of popular piety.

§2. Votive offerings of popular art and piety are to be kept on display in the shrines or nearby places and guarded securely.

This is an exhortation which is preceptive in its general orientations, but the details are left to the shrine director and staff under the vigilance of the diocesan bishop.

CHAPTER IV
ALTARS
[cc. 1235–1239]

This chapter of five canons treats: fixed or movable altars (c. 1235), the altar's construction (c. 1236), the dedication or blessing of an altar and the relics under it (c. 1237), the loss of dedication or blessing (c. 1238), and the reservation of the altar's use to divine worship, also excluding burial beneath it (c. 1239).

Fixed or Movable

Canon 1235 — §1. An altar, or a table upon which the eucharistic sacrifice is celebrated, is called fixed if it is so constructed that it adheres to the floor and thus cannot be moved; it is called movable if it can be removed.

§2. It is desirable to have a fixed altar in every church, but a fixed or a movable altar in other places designated for sacred celebrations.

In oratories and private chapels the altar may be fixed or movable. It is preferable, though not required, that the altar in a church be fixed. An altar is not an object but a sacred place, a place that symbolizes Christ.[56] This symbolism is more clearly manifest if the altar is permanently positioned in one place. In new churches there should be only one altar in the church "so that in the one assembly of the people of God the one altar may signify our one Savior Jesus Christ and the one eucharist of the Church."[57] A second altar is permitted in a separate blessed sacrament chapel at which weekday Mass may be celebrated; additional altars are prohibited.[58] Since the altar is a symbol of Christ, the duplication of altars distorts this symbolism. Moreover, in churches constructed since 1977, statues and pictures of saints may not be placed above the altar.[59]

The altar should be freestanding to allow the ministers to walk around it easily and to allow Mass to be celebrated facing the people. It should be posi-

[56] See RDCA IV, 7.
[57] RDCA IV, 7.
[58] RDCA IV, 7. Churches, oratories, and private chapels erected before the Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar went into effect in 1977 are not affected by the law stipulating that there be only one altar.
[59] RDCA IV, 10.

tioned to be the focal point on which the attention of the whole congregation centers naturally.[60]

Construction

Canon 1236 — §1. According to the traditional practice of the Church, the table of a fixed altar is to be of stone, and indeed of a single natural stone. Nevertheless, another worthy and solid material can also be used in the judgment of the conference of bishops. The supports or base, however, can be made of any material.

§2. A movable altar can be constructed of any solid material suitable for liturgical use.

The law favors a fixed altar's construction from stone, preferably from a single, natural stone. The use of stone conveys a sense of solidity and permanence and is thus appropriate for symbolizing Christ's presence in a sacred place. Other worthy and solid materials may be used if permitted by the conference of bishops. The material used for the construction of a movable altar is not said to be subject to regulation by the conference of bishops, but it should be "becoming, solid material suited to liturgical use, according to the traditions and customs of different regions."[61] The appropriate material to be used in the construction of a movable altar can be determined by local authorities who are competent to make decisions about church design and furnishings.

Dedication or Blessing, Relics

Canon 1237 — §1. Fixed altars must be dedicated, and movable altars must be dedicated or blessed, according to the rites prescribed in the liturgical books.

§2. The ancient tradition of placing relics of martyrs or other saints under a fixed altar is to be preserved, according to the norms given in the liturgical books.

The rites of dedication and blessing of altars are found in the Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar, chapters 4 and 6. The minister of dedication is the diocesan bishop. If he cannot be present in person, he may delegate another bishop, especially an episcopal vicar or auxiliary who has the pastoral care of that community. In special circumstances the diocesan bishop may give a special mandate to another priest to dedicate an altar.[62] The dedication of an altar is a more elaborate rite than a blessing and includes the anointing of the altar with sacred chrism.

An option in the Rite of Dedication of an Altar is the bishop's placing of relics in an aperture beneath the table of a fixed altar of a church.[63] The following are the principal liturgical laws governing relics vis-à-vis altars:[64]

(1) A reliquary must not be placed on the altar or set into the table of the altar, but placed beneath the table of the altar, as the design of the altar permits.

(2) The relics should be of a size sufficient for them to be recognizable as parts of human bodies; very small relics may not be used.

(3) The relics must be authentic; relics of doubtful authenticity may not be used.[65]

(4) When any relics are exposed for veneration, they should not be placed on the table of the altar.

(5) Only fixed altars may have relics placed beneath them.

Loss of Dedication or Blessing

Canon 1238 — §1. An altar loses its dedication or blessing according to the norm of can. 1212.

[60] GIRM 262.
[61] GIRM 264, DOL 1654.

[62] RDCA IV, 12.
[63] RDCA IV, 47.
[64] RDCA IV, 10–11.
[65] The CCS is competent to authenticate relics. See PB 74.

§2. Altars, whether fixed or movable, do not lose their dedication or blessing if the church or other sacred place is relegated to profane uses.

An altar loses its dedication or blessing if it suffers major destruction or if it has been given over permanently to profane use in fact or by a decree of the competent ordinary. If a church, oratory, or private chapel loses its dedication or blessing, the altar in it may be transferred for use in another sacred place and is not dedicated or blessed again unless the competent ordinary previously secularized the altar by decree. In the event of an altar's desecration, its dedication or blessing is not lost but the provisions of canon 1211 are applicable.

Reserved for Divine Worship

Canon 1239 — §1. An altar, whether fixed or movable, must be reserved for divine worship alone, to the absolute exclusion of any profane use.

§2. A body is not to be buried beneath an altar; otherwise, it is not permitted to celebrate Mass on the altar.

Proper reverence for the altar means that the only objects that may be placed on it are those which are necessary for the liturgical celebration. The document, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, is instructive on this point:

> The altar, the holy table, should be the most noble, the most beautifully designed and constructed table the community can provide.... It is holy and sacred to this assembly's action and sharing, so it is never used as a table of convenience or as a resting place for papers, notes, cruets, or anything else.[66]

The body of a saint may be placed beneath a fixed altar since it is a relic. If any other corpse is buried under an altar, Mass may not be celebrated on it. According to canon 1202 of the 1917 code, Mass could be celebrated in a church in which a corpse had been buried as long as the place of burial was at least a meter away from the altar; the present law makes no provision for this situation.

CHAPTER V
CEMETERIES
[cc. 1240–1243]

The four canons of this chapter treat: the establishment and blessing of cemeteries (c. 1240), optional cemeteries (c. 1241), burial in churches (c. 1242), and particular laws on cemeteries (c. 1243).

Establishment and Blessing

Canon 1240 — §1. Where possible, the Church is to have its own cemeteries or at least areas in civil cemeteries that are designated for the deceased members of the faithful and properly blessed.

§2. If this cannot be achieved, however, then individual graves are to be properly blessed.

Catholic cemeteries, as well as parts of cemeteries that are reserved for the burial of the Catholic faithful, should be blessed according to the appropriate rite in the Book of Blessings.[67] The blessing makes it a sacred place subject to the canons on sacred places in general (cc. 1205–1213). In a blessed cemetery (or in that part of a non-Catholic cemetery that has been blessed for Catholics), a cross is to be erected as a sign of hope in the resurrection. The rite of blessing is preferably celebrated by a bishop, but he may entrust it to a priest, particularly one involved in the pastoral care of the faithful who have established the cemetery. Sunday is the preferred day for the blessing, but it may be done on any day except Ash Wednesday and the days of Holy Week. If a new cemetery is to be used jointly by various Christian denominations, there should be an ecumenical celebration to mark its opening.[68] A document is to be drawn up in duplicate recording the blessing of the cemetery with one copy for the diocesan curia and the other for the cemetery archives.[69]

[66] BCL (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1978) n. 71.

[67] BB ch. 43, DB ch. 34.

If a Catholic is to be buried in a cemetery that has not been blessed, the individual grave is blessed at the time of the burial in accord with the Rite of Funerals.[70] Non-Catholic Christians, if they do not have their own cemetery, may be buried in a Catholic cemetery with the permission of the diocesan bishop, which permission may be given on a general basis or reserved for individual cases.[71]

The wording of this canon, unlike that of the following one, is preceptive. The Church is to have its own cemeteries where possible. This obligation is binding on the diocese itself, unless there is sufficient space in parish or other Catholic cemeteries for the burial of all the faithful. Reasons for the impossibility of having Catholic cemeteries include lack of available land, insufficient funds, and serious difficulties posed by civil law or civil authorities.

Optional Cemeteries

Canon 1241 — §1. Parishes and religious institutes can have their own cemetery.

§2. Other juridic persons or families can also have a special cemetery or tomb, to be blessed according to the judgment of the local ordinary.

Parishes, religious institutes, other juridic persons, and even Catholic families may have their own cemeteries. The cemeteries of parishes and religious institutes should be blessed. The cemeteries of other juridic persons and of private families may be blessed with the permission of the local ordinary. This canon does not refer to diocesan cemeteries, which are considered in the previous canon.

[68] BB 1418–1421, DB 1115–1118.
[69] CB 1056.
[70] OEx 53, OCF 218.
[71] Ecum Dir 137.

Burial in Churches

Canon 1242 — Bodies are not to be buried in churches unless it is a question of burying in their own church the Roman Pontiff, cardinals, or diocesan bishops, including retired ones.

The wording of this canon would indicate that the diocesan bishop may not be buried in any church except his own cathedral. However, the liturgical law of the 1984 Ceremonial of Bishops, number 1164, extended this privilege of burial in a church: "The body of a deceased bishop is buried in a church, and as a rule in the cathedral church of his diocese. A retired bishop is buried in the cathedral church of his last see, unless he has made other arrangements." Excluded from burial in churches are auxiliary and other titular bishops and all other persons except the pope, cardinals, and diocesan bishops.

Several commentators, basing their view on rulings of the Holy See on the old law, state that the general prohibition on burial in churches applies also to oratories and private chapels.[72] However, this interpretation extends the meaning of "churches" beyond its canonical sense (c. 1214). Such a change in meaning would require an authentic interpretation (c. 16, §1).

Particular Laws

Canon 1243 — Particular law is to establish appropriate norms about the discipline to be observed in cemeteries, especially with regard to protecting and fostering their sacred character.

The universal law here upholds the value of protecting and fostering the sacred character of cemeteries. However, it specifies that this goal is to be accomplished by means of particular law—at the level of the nation or other region, the province, and/or the diocese. The canon speaks of ius particulare rather than lex. This includes true laws enacted by legislative authority, but it also includes executory decrees, guidelines, instructions, and other kinds of executory norms. All of these are acceptable means to fulfill the requirement of this canon.[73]

[72] See, e.g., Pamplona ComEng, 767–768; CLSGBI Com, 698; CLSA Com, 852; Chiappetta Com, 350.

TITLE II
SACRED TIMES
[cc. 1244–1253]

The two chapters of this title are divided according to the two kinds of sacred times: feast days and days of penance. "Feast days" in this context refer only to Sundays and holy days of obligation, not to celebrations that have the rank of "feast" in universal or particular liturgical calendars. Further principles and rules on the subject matter of this section are found in Sacrosanctum Concilium, chapter 5,[74] and the General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar.[75] Two introductory canons establish the competent authorities over feast days and days of penance (c. 1244) and the authorities who may grant dispensations from and commutations of the obligations of feast days and days of penance (c. 1245).

The Eastern code treats feast days and days of penance together in one section (CCEO 880–883). The holy days common to all the Eastern churches sui iuris are Sundays, Christmas, Epiphany, the Ascension, the Dormition of Mary, and Saints Peter and Paul (CCEO 880, §3). Eastern Catholics are obliged either to participate in the Divine Liturgy (Eucharist) on these days or, if the prescripts or the legitimate custom of their own church sui iuris requires it, in the celebration of the divine praises (CCEO 881, §1). The faithful who are outside the territorial boundaries of their own church sui iuris may observe the feast days and days of penance in force where they are staying; families in which parents are of different churches sui iuris may observe the norms of either church in regard to feast days and days of penance (CCEO 883).

Competent Authorities

Canon 1244 — §1. It is only for the supreme ecclesiastical authority to establish, transfer, and suppress feast days and days of penance common to the universal Church, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1246, §2.

§2. Diocesan bishops can decree special feast days or days of penance for their dioceses or places, but only in individual instances.

The first paragraph refers only to feasts and days of penance in the universal Latin church. The feast days in question are the days of obligation specified in canon 1246, §1; the days of penance are those specified in canon 1250. The supreme authority is the pope alone or the college of bishops acting together with the pope (cc. 331, 336). The transference of a feast refers to a change of its day of celebration.

Since feast days and days of penance in the code imply a legal obligation to observe them in a certain way (cc. 1247, 1251), the special feast day or day of penance established by the diocesan bishop may be understood as one with a legally binding obligation to participate in Mass on the feast day or to do a specified penitential act or acts on the day of penance. The bishop can establish such a day in an individual instance (per modum tantum actus), but not on an ongoing basis. To be legally binding, the obligation should be stated in a general decree establishing the special feast or day of penance, which decree must be promulgated (cc. 29; 8, §2). A decree is not necessary if the bishop does not intend to impose a legal obligation but only to encourage or invite the people to observe a special feast day or day of penance. The word translated "to decree" (indicere) in paragraph two has other meanings, non-[73] See the January 28, 1975 Christian Burial Guidelines of the National Catholic Cemetery Conference, CLD 9, 688–702. These guidelines are used as a basis for particular law in the dioceses of the U.S.A. and Canada.

[74] SC 102–111.
[75] DOL 440.

preceptive in nature, including "to proclaim," "to declare," "to announce."

The nature of feast days approved for universal and particular calendars suggests that the special feast day of obligation decreed by the bishop should be a celebration of some mystery or title of God, Jesus, or the Blessed Virgin Mary, or the feast day of a saint or blessed. The day chosen may not conflict with liturgical days of greater precedence.[76]

The bishop may wish to decree a special day of penance for particular reasons—even of a social or civil character—that commend the urgency of prayer, reparation, or reconciliation. The day chosen should not be a day or time of rejoicing, such as a Sunday, a solemnity, or the octave of Easter.

Dispensation and Commutation

Canon 1245 — Without prejudice to the right of diocesan bishops mentioned in can. 87, for a just cause and according to the prescripts of the diocesan bishop, a pastor can grant in individual cases a dispensation from the obligation of observing a feast day or a day of penance or can grant a commutation of the obligation into other pious works. A superior of a religious institute or society of apostolic life, if they are clerical and of pontifical right, can also do this in regard to his own subjects and others living in the house day and night.

Dispensation from or commutation of the obligation to observe a feast day or day of penance (in universal law) refers to the obligations of canons 1247 or 1251. Diocesan bishops have general competence to dispense from universal disciplinary laws (c. 87, §1), but pastors, other priests, and deacons may dispense from universal or particular laws only when this power is specifically given to them (c. 89), as in this canon for the benefit of pastors and clerical superiors. The canons on the use of executive power of governance and on dispensations are applicable to the dispensation of this canon (cc. 136–144, 85–93). A just reason for dispensing is required for the validity of the dispensation (c. 90).

"Individual cases" refers not only to a single instance, but also to an individual situation that is ongoing, e.g., a person who must be at work each week during the times of Sunday Mass. In an ongoing case, it is advisable to commute rather than dispense. For example, the pastor could commute the obligation to attend Mass on Sunday to another day each week. An individual case also refers to a situation affecting several or many persons, e.g., those attending a banquet on a day of abstinence. Those staying day and night in the house of a religious institute or society of apostolic life include not only students, maintenance personnel, etc., who stay on a regular basis, but even guests who stay only one night.

The bishop may issue prescripts (norms, guidelines, instructions, policies, etc.) governing dispensations and commutations from the obligations of feast days and days of penance, e.g., by establishing general cases that would constitute a just reason for dispensing in order to give guidance to pastors and superiors in judging the sufficiency of reasons.

CHAPTER I FEAST DAYS
[cc. 1246–1248]

The three canons of this chapter treat: Sundays and holy days (c. 1246), holy day obligations (c. 1247), and feast day observance.

Sundays and Holy Days

Canon 1246 — §1. Sunday, on which by apostolic tradition the paschal mystery is celebrated, must be observed in the universal Church as the primordial holy day of obligation. The following days must also be observed: the Nativity of our [76] "Table of Liturgical Days according to Their Order of Precedence," index of General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar, DOL 3825.

Lord Jesus Christ, the Epiphany, the Ascension, the Body and Blood of Christ, Holy Mary the Mother of God, her Immaculate Conception, her Assumption, Saint Joseph, Saint Peter and Saint Paul the Apostles, and All Saints.

§2. With the prior approval of the Apostolic See, however, the conference of bishops can suppress some of the holy days of obligation or transfer them to a Sunday.

The paschal mystery is the life, passion, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ—the central theological realities of every liturgical celebration which are most especially experienced by the Christian community on Sunday, the day of the resurrection. The canon reflects the renewed importance placed on Sunday by the Second Vatican Council:

> The Lord's Day is the first holyday of all and should be proposed to the devotion of the faithful and taught to them in such a way that it may become in fact a day of joy and of freedom from work. Other celebrations, unless they be truly of greatest importance, shall not have precedence over the Sunday, the foundation and core of the whole liturgical year.[77]

Solemnities, feasts of the Lord, and All Souls take precedence over Sundays in ordinary time, but not over the Sundays of Advent, Lent, and Easter.[78]

The ten holy days of obligation in the universal Latin church are on the same dates as those of the 1917 code (CIC 1247). In the order in which they appear in canon 1246 of this code they are: December 25, January 6, the sixth Thursday after Easter, the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, January 1, December 8, August 15, March 19, June 29, and November 1. The only changes are in the feasts themselves. Instead of the Solemnity of Mary Mother of God, the feast of the Circumcision was celebrated on January 1; the Body and Blood of Christ was formerly called the Most Holy Body of Christ.

Due to the demands of work and life it is difficult for people to observe all ten solemnities as days of obligation. Moreover, not all of these feasts have equal importance in the many cultures of the world's Catholics. Thus it is appropriate that the law grants to conferences of bishops the authority to suppress the obligation of some of them or transfer them to a Sunday, which decisions become effective after confirmation by the Congregation for Bishops. The practice of the Holy See is that there must be at least two holy days in every country—Christmas and a solemnity of Mary. For those feasts not retained as holy days of obligation, the episcopal conference has two options: either to transfer the feast to a Sunday or to retain the feast on its proper day but to abolish the obligation to participate in the Eucharist and abstain from servile work.

In the United States, Epiphany and the Body and Blood of Christ are transferred to Sundays; Saint Joseph and Saints Peter and Paul are celebrated on their proper days, but the obligations are suppressed. Whenever January 1, August 15, or November 1 fall on a Saturday or a Monday, the obligation to attend Mass is suppressed.[79] The decision whether to transfer the Solemnity of the Ascension to the Seventh Sunday of Easter is left to each ecclesiastical province.[80]

[77] SC 106, DOL 106. See also John Paul II, aplett Dies Domini, May 31, 1998, AAS 90 (1998) 713–766; Origins 28 (1998) 133–151.

[78] In 1990, Norm 5 of the General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar was changed as follows: When December 8 occurs on a Sunday, the Immaculate Conception is transferred to December 9. When March 19 or 25 occurs on a Sunday, St. Joseph's or the Annunciation are transferred to the next day respectively, unless either occurs on Passion Sunday or Easter, in which case they will be celebrated on the Monday following the second Sunday of Easter. See CDWDS, decr, April 22, 1990, N 26 (1990) 160–161; BCLN 26 (1990) 225–226.

[79] BCLN 28 (1992) 95–96. The decisions of other English-speaking conferences of bishops are given in Pamplona ComEng, indexed on p. 1307.

[80] BCLN 34 (1999) 82.

Holy Day Obligations

Canon 1247 — On Sundays and other holy days of obligation, the faithful are obliged to participate in the Mass. Moreover, they are to abstain from those works and affairs which hinder the worship to be rendered to God, the joy proper to the Lord's day, or the suitable relaxation of mind and body.

The obligations are twofold: participation in the Mass and abstention from unnecessary and burdensome work or business. Participation at Mass minimally means physical presence and consciousness. Although the precept to attend Mass may be fulfilled the evening before the feast day, the precept of rest obliges only on the day itself.[81] Both precepts are binding on the faithful according to the ordinary rules for the subject of ecclesiastical laws (c. 11).

Those whose livelihood requires them to work on holy days and/or Sundays are morally excused from the observance of the rest, but not necessarily from participation in the Mass. Those who have a just reason for missing Mass on Sundays or holy days on a regular basis should seek a dispensation, or preferably a commutation, in accord with canon 1245. Those who find it impossible, or impossible without serious inconvenience, to attend Mass in individual instances are morally excused from the observance of the obligation and need not seek a dispensation.

Feast Day Observance

Canon 1248 — §1. A person who assists at a Mass celebrated anywhere in a Catholic rite either on the feast day itself or in the evening of the preceding day satisfies the obligation of participating in the Mass.

§2. If participation in the eucharistic celebration becomes impossible because of the absence of a sacred minister or for another grave cause, it is strongly recommended that the faithful take part in a liturgy of the word if such a liturgy is celebrated in a parish church or other sacred place according to the prescripts of the diocesan bishop or that they devote themselves to prayer for a suitable time alone, as a family, or, as the occasion permits, in groups of families.

The obligation to participate in the Mass may be satisfied at any time during the twenty-four hours of the feast day itself, or on the evening before it. "Evening" should be understood as anytime from 4:00 P.M. onward.[82] The legislator uses the word "evening" (vesper), not "afternoon" (post meridiem); in keeping with the proper meaning of the word (cf. c. 17), an afternoon Mass before 4:00 is not an evening Mass and does not satisfy the obligation. The precept may be satisfied at any Catholic Mass, i.e., not only when the texts are those of the Sunday or holy day. For example, attendance at a wedding Mass after 4:00 on a Saturday fulfills the Sunday obligation. The Mass must be celebrated in a Catholic rite, i.e., in the liturgical rite of any Catholic church sui iuris, but not in a church which is not in full communion with the Catholic Church, although using a Catholic liturgical rite. The former Ecumenical Directory of 1967 granted a privilege permitting Catholics to fulfill their Sunday and holy day obligation at the divine liturgy of a separated Eastern church.[83] This privilege was suppressed in the 1993 Directory for the Application of the Principles and Norms on Ecumenism.[84]

The second paragraph is a recommendation, not a binding obligation, directed toward Catholics who are not able to participate in the Sunday Eucharist due to the absence of a priest or another

[81] Comm 12 (1980) 359.

[82] See Pius XII, apconst Christus Dominus VI, January 6, 1953, AAS 45 (1953) 14–24; CLD 4, 275–276. See also J. Huels and T. Willis, "What Time for Anticipated Masses?" Emmanuel 96 (1990) 34–41.

[83] ED 47.

[84] See Ecum Dir 115. One could argue that the privilege had already been revoked in 1983 by this canon since it made no exception for the separated Eastern churches.

grave cause. The recommendations given are not alternative ways for fulfilling one's Sunday obligation; rather, the obligation morally ceases to bind when it is impossible to fulfill it. In 1988 the Congregation for Divine Worship issued the Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Presbyter.[85] The Directory recommends a liturgy of the word, morning or evening prayer, or occasionally the celebration of a sacrament or sacramental, each of which should include the Sunday readings. The service is to be led by a deacon, acolyte, lector, or other lay minister for the benefit of the faithful who are unable to go to a neighboring church for Mass. The Directory specifies that there may be only one celebration of this nature in a church on a Sunday, and it may not be done if Mass is celebrated that day or the evening before. Masses that are televised are not to be recommended as an alternative for persons who are able to gather for a Sunday celebration; they are intended for the sick, home-bound, prisoners, etc., who are unable to go to church.[86]

CHAPTER II
DAYS OF PENANCE
[cc. 1249–1253]

In addition to feast days, Christian time is made sacred by days of penance. Pope Paul VI's 1966 apostolic constitution, Poenitemini, provides the historical, doctrinal, and disciplinary background for the following canons on penitential days and times.[87] The five canons of this chapter treat: individual and common observance of penance (c. 1249), penitential days and times (c. 1250), abstinence and fast (c. 1251), those bound to fast and abstinence (c. 1252), and the competence of the conferences of bishops over the observance of fast and abstinence (c. 1253).

Individual and Common Observance

Canon 1249 — The divine law binds all the Christian faithful to do penance each in his or her own way. In order for all to be united among themselves by some common observance of penance, however, penitential days are prescribed on which the Christian faithful devote themselves in a special way to prayer, perform works of piety and charity, and deny themselves by fulfilling their own obligations more faithfully and especially by observing fast and abstinence, according to the norm of the following canons.

Penitence is a part of the Christian life binding all the faithful in virtue of the divine law.[88] Although the faithful are free to choose their own forms of penitence, particular penitential days and times, specified in canon 1250, are established by ecclesiastical law in order to promote a common observance of penance. The canon mentions several ways that days of penance are observed. The first three (prayer, works of piety and charity, and self-denial by fulfilling one's obligations more faithfully) are left to the individual faithful to observe in their own way or to the regulations of the conference of bishops.[89] The final ways (fast and abstinence) are specific penitential acts binding the faithful in accord with canons 1251 and 1252. The adverb "especially" (prae-

[85] June 2, 1988, N 24 (1988) 366–378; Origins 18 (1988) 301–307. For the dioceses of the U.S., see Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest: Leader's Edition (New York: Catholic Book Publishing Company, 1994) and Gathered in Steadfast Faith: Statement of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy on Sunday Worship in the Absence of a Priest (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1991). For commentaries see M. Henchal, Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest (Washington, D.C.: Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions, 1992); and J. Huels, "Sunday Liturgies without a Priest," W 64 (1990) 451–460.

[86] See NCCB, "Guidelines for Televising the Liturgy," BCLN 33 (1997) 1–5. See also SC 20.

[87] February 17, 1966, AAS 58 (1966) 177–198; The Pope Speaks 11 (1966) 363–371; excerpts in DOL 358.

[88] Poenitemini I, DOL 3021; cf. Mt 3:2, 4:2–4; Mk 1: 12–15; Lk 4:1–2.

[89] See Comm 12 (1980) 364.

sertim) recalls the words of Paul VI that "fast and abstinence have a privileged place" among the forms of penance.[90]

Penitential Days and Times

Canon 1250 — The penitential days and times in the universal Church are every Friday of the whole year and the season of Lent.

Friday is a day of penance in memory of the passion and death of Christ. Penitential practices during the season of Lent dispose the faithful to celebrate the paschal mystery.[91] The Second Vatican Council said that Lenten penance should not only be internal and individual but also external and social, that it should be suitable to the present time, to different regions and circumstances, and that the conferences of bishops should make recommendations in this regard.[92]

Abstinence and Fast

Canon 1251 — Abstinence from eating meat or some other food according to the prescripts of the conference of bishops is to be observed on every Friday of the year unless a Friday occurs on a day listed as a solemnity. Abstinence and fasting, however, are to be observed on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

The law of abstinence prohibits the eating of meat, but eggs, milk products, and sauces made from animal fats may be eaten, as may fish and all cold-blooded animals (e.g., frogs, clams, turtles). The law of the fast means that only one full meal may be taken during the day; two light meals are permitted in accord with local custom as to the amount and kind of food. The consumption of solid food between meals is prohibited, but liquids may be taken at any time.[93] Sacrosanctum Concilium also recommends fasting on Holy Saturday.[94] The conference of bishops may substitute for abstinence from meat abstinence from some other food. This adaptation is more meaningful in countries where the people rarely eat meat.[95]

Those Bound to Abstain/Fast

Canon 1252 — The law of abstinence binds those who have completed their fourteenth year of age. The law of fasting, however, binds all those who have attained their majority until the beginning of their sixtieth year. Nevertheless, pastors of souls and parents are to take care that minors not bound by the law of fast and abstinence are also educated in a genuine sense of penance.

The completion of the fourteenth year occurs at midnight at the end of one's fourteenth birthday. The age of majority begins at midnight at the end of one's eighteenth birthday. The beginning of the sixtieth year occurs at midnight at the end of one's fifty-ninth birthday.[96] Unlike the fast, there is no upper age at which the law of abstinence ceases to bind. It should be noted that these norms are unrelated to the law of the eucharistic fast of canon 919 which gives no age limits but does except the elderly and the infirm.

Competence of Episcopal Conference

Canon 1253 — The conference of bishops can determine more precisely the observance of fast and abstinence as well as substitute other forms of penance, especially works of charity and exercises of piety, in whole or in part, for abstinence and fast.

[90] Poenitemini III, DOL 3020. See also Comm 12 (1980) 366.
[91] General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar 27, DOL 3793.
[92] SC 109.
[93] Cf. Paenitemini III, §§1–2; DOL 3023.
[94] SC 109.
[95] See Comm 12 (1980) 364 for a record of the discussion by the coetus on sacred times and places/divine worship.
[96] See cc. 97, §1; 203.

Fasting and abstinence must be observed everywhere on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday, but for other Fridays and the season of Lent the conferences of bishops have broad competence to establish both obligatory and recommended penitential practices. In the United States, fasting on all weekdays of Lent is strongly recommended; on all Fridays of the year the NCCB recommends abstinence from meat, prayer, penance (especially by eating less food), and almsgiving for the sake of world peace. Abstinence from meat is obligatory on all the Fridays of Lent.[97]

[97] NCCB, pastoral statement, November 18, 1966, CLD 6, 679–684. NCCB, The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response 298, May 3, 1983. For the policies of other English-speaking conferences see Pamplona ComEng, 1307.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Agnelo, G. "Santuari, pellegrinaggi e liturgia." N 28 (1992) 247–260.

Foster, M. S. "The Violation of a Church (Canon 1211)." J 49 (1989) 693–703.

Fox, J. "Notes on the Canonical Status of Shrines." N 28 (1992) 261–269.

Fuentes, J. A. "Regulación canónica de las celebraciones dominicales en ausencia de presbítero." IC 24 (1984) 559–574.

Henchal, M. "Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest." J 49 (1989) 607–631.

———. Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest. Washington, D.C.: Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions, 1992.

Huels, J. M. "Concerts in Churches." In Disputed Questions in the Liturgy Today, 111–120. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1988.

———. "Preparing and Celebrating the Paschal Feasts." W 63 (1989) 71–79.

———. "Sunday Liturgies without a Priest." W 64 (1990) 451–460.

———. "The Sunday Mass Obligation." In More Disputed Questions in the Liturgy, 61–72. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1996.

———, and T. Willis. "What Time for Anticipated Masses?" Emmanuel 96 (1990) 34–41.

Longhitano, A. "Il sacro nel Codice di Diritto Canonico." Ius Ecclesiae 6 (1994) 709–730.

Manzanares, J. "De celebrationibus dominicalibus absente presbytero iuxta Directorium Christi Ecclesia." P 78 (1989) 477–501.

Martín, J. L. "El directorio para las celebraciones dominicales en ausencia de presbítero." REDC 66 (1989) 615–639.

Mathieu, M.-T. "Réflexion sur le jeune." Vie Consacrée 58 (1986) 113–122.

Poveda, A. B. "Precepto Dominical y la nueva cultura del ocio." Apol 59 (1986) 513–531.

BOOK V
THE TEMPORAL GOODS OF THE CHURCH
[cc. 1254–1310]

INTRODUCTION

Robert T. Kennedy

A fundamentalist reading of some passages in the New Testament can lead to the conclusion that ownership of material goods is antithetical to the gospel and, hence, is forbidden to the Church. Passages susceptible to such an interpretation include those which recount the command of Jesus to his apostles to "take no gold, nor silver, nor copper in your belts, no bag for your journey, nor two tunics, nor sandals, nor a staff" (Mt 10:9–10), the challenge of Jesus to the rich member of the ruling class to "sell all that you have and distribute the money to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven and come, follow me" (Lk 18:22), and the warning of Jesus to the assembled multitude that "none of you can be my disciple unless you give up all your possessions" (Lk 14:33).

Fundamentalist interpretation takes such passages out of context and isolates them from other relevant passages, such as those which speak of Jesus and his apostles having a common fund out of which they met their own needs and those of the poor (Jn 12:6; 13:29), or which recount the practice in early Christian communities of possessing material goods in common and from their sale providing for the needy members of the community (Acts 2:44–45; 4:34–35), or the early practice of taking up collections to aid the poor of other communities (Rom 15:25–28).

In the light of a reading of sacred scripture in its entirety, the magisterium has consistently made a distinction between the laudable observance of evangelical poverty in pursuit of spiritual perfection, on the one hand, and the practice of ordinary virtue necessary for salvation, on the other. With equal consistency the magisterium has affirmed the Church's right to own material goods necessary for the fulfillment of its spiritual mission, and denied the existence of theological obstacles to its doing so.

The Second Vatican Council, while reaffirming the excellence of evangelical poverty, individual and corporate (PC 13; PO 17), reiterated in a number of passages the need of the Church for material resources in order to carry out its mission (LG 8; GS 76; PC 13; DH 4), and specified in still other passages the particular aspects of the mission for which material goods are essential, namely, the proper ordering of divine worship (PO 17; SC 128), the fitting support of the clergy (PO 17, 20, 21; CD 21, 31) and others who devote themselves to the service of the Church (AA 22; AG 17), and the exercise of charity toward those in need (PO 17; GS 88; GE 8; IM 3). In addition to reaffirming these traditional teachings, the council, as an aspect of the ecclesiology of communio, emphasized the need for dioceses and other ecclesial communities to contribute from their material resources to assist one another to fulfill their common mission (LG 13, 23; CD 6; AA 10; PO 21; AG 19, 29, 38), and recommended that the laity, called to active participation in the life and activity of the Church, contribute their knowledge, experience, and special skills to make more efficient the administration of the material resources of the Church (AA 10; AG 41; PO 17, 21).

In the context of such conciliar teachings, Book V sets forth the guiding principles and disciplinary norms to govern the acquisition, use, administration, and disposition of what the title of Book V calls the "temporal goods of the Church." By "temporal goods" is meant all non-spiritual assets, tangible or intangible, that are instrumental in fulfilling the mission of the Church: land, buildings, furnishings, liturgical vessels and vestments, works of art, vehicles, securities, cash, and other categories of real or personal property. The phrase "of the Church" is less easily defined, partly because of the diverse meanings of the word "church" throughout the code, ranging from the community of the baptized (c. 204) to a sacred building (c. 1214). Book V itself, in one of its early canons, accords a specialized meaning to "church" in the area of temporal goods (see c. 1258), but that specialized meaning is said to apply only if the context or nature of a particular matter does not dictate otherwise. Different meanings are in fact dictated by context or subject matter in a number of canons in Book V. The word "church," then, in the title of Book V must have a signification broad enough to include its several meanings throughout the book.

Difficulty in interpreting the title of Book V is due also to use of the apparently possessive "of" in referring to the temporal goods "of the Church." The implication is that Book V is dealing with temporal goods belonging to a single owner known as "the Church." In fact, however, the goods which form the subject matter of Book V belong to many owners: the Apostolic See, individual dioceses, institutes of consecrated life, societies of apostolic life, parishes, other public juridic persons, private juridic persons, and natural persons individually and in association. The universal Church, although said to have the capacity to own temporal goods (c. 1255), does not in fact own any such goods.

What is common to all the temporal goods which form the subject matter of Book V, then, is not ownership, since the goods belong to many different owners, nor is it a relationship to a univocal understanding of "church" which in fact has multiple meanings within Book V. Rather, it is a common orientation to the work of the Church, that is, to the worship of God, to proclaiming the good news of the gospel, and to facilitating the flourishing of God's kingdom of justice and charity. This is spiritual work, but work which on this earth necessarily involves the use of temporal goods which are said to be "of the Church," not because of who owns them but because of the supernatural mission they serve.

In regard to temporal goods, that mission needs the support and assistance of carefully drafted and faithfully observed laws of the Church designed to guard against improper acquisition, excessive accumulation, and imprudent administration, and to ensure the protection, faithful use, and wise disposition of the things of this world which have been placed in the service of a kingdom that is not of this world. That is the rationale for the inclusion of Book V in the Code of Canon Law, and that should be the motivation for careful study and faithful observance of its provisions.

The canons of Book V are divided into five sections:

- Introductory Canons (cc. 1254–1258)
- The Acquisition of Goods (title I: cc. 1259–1272)
- The Administration of Goods (title II: cc. 1273–1289)
- Contracts and Especially Alienation (title III: cc. 1290–1298)
- Pious Wills in General and Pious Foundations (title IV: cc. 1299–1310)

INTRODUCTORY CANONS [cc. 1254–1258]

Five preliminary canons set forth fundamental principles underlying the disciplinary norms of Book V and define technical terminology important to proper interpretation of those norms. The principles include the right of the Church to own material possessions, the purposes for which the Church does so, the independence of the Church from civil authority in the exercise of the Church's property rights, the essential elements of ownership, and the competence of the Church to confer upon juridic persons of the Church's own creation the capacity to own temporal goods. Terminological precision is given to the term "ecclesiastical goods" (bona ecclesiastica) and the word "church" when used in relation to temporal goods, as in the expression "church property."

Independence from Civil Authority

Canon 1254 — §1. To pursue its proper purposes, the Catholic Church by innate right is able to acquire, retain, administer, and alienate temporal goods independently from civil power.

Book V opens with a declaration of the Church's independence from civil authority in regard to temporal goods. More is claimed than simply the independent origin of the Church's property rights; the Church also claims independence from civil authority in the exercise of its rights to acquire, possess, administer, and dispose of temporal goods.[1]

The claim is rooted in centuries of conflicts between the Catholic Church and civil governments which, at various times and in various ways, have sought to deprive the Church of its material possessions. Restrictions on acquisitions, excessive taxation, forced alienations, and the outright seizure of church lands and revenues have, since the early Middle Ages, evoked strong reactions from bishops, local and ecumenical councils, and popes. The severity of the deprivations left little room for moderation in papal and conciliar pronouncements condemning the confiscations and insisting upon freedom of the Church from the jurisdiction of civil authorities in regard to temporalities.[2] The insistence found succinct expression in canon 1495, §1 of the 1917 code, and is reiterated, in substantially the same wording, in canon 1254, §1 of the present code.

While historically the result of Church-State conflicts, the Church's claim to independence, when interpreted in an absolute sense as it often has been, has itself spawned among some church leaders attitudes of defiance of civil authority, ranging from ignoring the provisions of civil law to open hostility toward civil government, both of which have given rise to added Church-State conflicts which have often resulted in harm to the Church.

The teaching of the Second Vatican Council affords needed moderation to the Church's claim by nuancing the understanding of the independence sought by the Church. According to the council, the degree of independence needed by the Church will be achieved wherever the principle of religious freedom set forth in Dignitatis humanae is put into practice.

> [W]here the principle of religious freedom is not only proclaimed in words or simply

[1] The earlier CLSA translation, in affirming that the Church "has" an innate right independently of civil power, gave rise to an ambiguity as to whether the claim is simply one of independent origin of the Church's rights or of their exercise as well. The new translation better comports with the Latin text which contains no such ambiguity.

[2] Brief summaries of many of the Church-State struggles over temporal possessions and of related statements of the magisterium may be found in J. Goodwine, The Right of the Church to Acquire Temporal Goods, CanLawStud 131 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1941) 50–98; U. Wiggins, Property Laws of the State of Ohio Affecting the Church, CanLawStud 367 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1956) 3–39.

> incorporated in law but also given sincere and practical application, there the Church succeeds in achieving a stable situation of right as well as of fact and the independence which is necessary for the fulfillment of her divine mission. This independence is precisely what the authorities of the Church claim in society.[3]

The principle of religious freedom set forth in Dignitatis humanae, however, acknowledges the right and duty of civil authority to regulate the exercise of religious freedom in the interests of public order.[4] The independence of the Church spoken of in Dignitatis humanae, then, is an independence compatible with reasonable regulation by civil authority in the interests of public order.[5] It is solely the degree of independence necessary for the fulfillment of the Church's mission; it is not an absolute independence, but simply freedom from unreasonable regulation or restriction.

Such a nuanced understanding of the Church's independence from civil authority should guide the interpretation of canon 1254, §1, for the code is to be interpreted in the light of the image of the Church proposed by the council. Dignitatis humanae itself, in speaking of the right of religious bodies to acquire and use suitable funds and properties, prefaces its assertion with the words "provided the just requirements of public order are observed."[6] And several canons in Book V belie a claim to absolute independence by exhorting compliance with the provisions of civil law,[7] and even, at times, by "canonizing" such provisions.[8]

In view of the conciliar teaching, it would perhaps have been preferable to omit altogether in canon 1254 the claim to independence from civil authority, limiting the canon to a simple affirmation of the Church's innate rights of ownership, as was proposed during the revision process[9] and as has been done in the parallel canon in the more recently promulgated Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.[10] Notwithstanding the continued presence of the claim in canon 1254, §1, administrators of church property need to be aware of both the theoretical and practical propriety of recognizing in civil authority a limited but significant regulatory role in the ownership of temporal goods by the Church.

Use of the adjective "innate" in canon 1254, §1 affirms that the right to own temporal goods without unreasonable interference from civil authority is indigenous to the Church, both as a society of human beings and as a divinely instituted body whose mission requires the use of temporal goods. It is not a right which has been conferred upon the Church by any civil government or legal system. The term "Catholic Church" in this canon should be understood, in accord with canon 1, as referring only to the Latin church; as noted above, the parallel canon in the Eastern code omits any claim to independence from civil authority.

Canon 1254, §1 lists four essential elements of ownership of temporal goods: acquisition, retention, administration, and alienation. Acquisition, administration, and alienation are governed, respectively, by titles I, II, and III of Book V; retention is governed by individual canons in each of these titles. The 1917 code listed only the first three elements of ownership; the fourth, alienation, was regarded as an act of extraordinary administration. The drafters of the revised code, however, considered alienation a juridic act that is essentially different from administration,[11] to be governed by different norms. This distinction appears not to have been universally assimilated as [3] DH 13 (emphasis added).

[4] DH 7.

[5] The council understood the essential elements of public order to be justice, peace, and public morality. DH 7.

[6] DH 4.

[7] See cc. 1284, §2, 2°, 3°; 1286, 1°; 1299, §2.

[8] See cc. 1268, 1290.

[9] The original draft omitted the claim of independence from civil authority as polemical and needlessly reminiscent of past Church-State conflicts. The 1980 draft restored the claim in deference to those who feared that the omission might give rise to unforeseen doctrinal interpretations. Comm 5 (1973) 94; 12 (1980) 396.

[10] CCEO 1007.

[11] Comm 12 (1980) 396.

yet, leading to considerable confusion and not a few canonical errors.[12]

Purposes of Church Ownership

§2. The proper purposes are principally: to order divine worship, to care for the decent support of the clergy and other ministers, and to exercise works of the sacred apostolate and of charity, especially toward the needy.

Since the time of Gratian,[13] the purposes given in this paragraph as justifications for the Church's ownership of material goods had been traditional. The 1917 code, however, after listing divine worship and support of clerical and other ministers, substituted the vague "other proper purposes" for the traditionally specific reference to charity.[14] The Second Vatican Council restored the traditional formulation,[15] and canon 1254, §2 repeats the conciliar language virtually verbatim.

The restoration is significant. Omission of specific mention of charity as one of the principal purposes for the acquisition of material goods was instrumental in the development among some church administrators of an excessive possessiveness. The revised code seeks to reverse that unfortunate trend, in service to the conciliar teaching that "the spirit of poverty and of charity are the glory and authentication of the Church of Christ."[16]

Authors have differed as to whether or not the listing of the purposes in canon 1254, §2 is taxative. Insertion of the word "principally" indicates, for some, the existence of other purposes,[17] while others suggest that the insertion was made solely because the paragraph speaks generally of the purposes of the Church, not just of the ownership of temporal goods by the Church, and that the purposes of church ownership are, in fact, taxatively stated.[18] In any event, in light of the conciliar definition of the apostolate as all activity of the Church directed to bringing the world to Christ,[19] it would be difficult to conceive of any ecclesial purpose not included in "works of the sacred apostolate."

The question has been raised as to whether or not the purposes are listed in order of priority.[20] A negative answer would seem dictated by the different ordering of the same purposes in canon 222, §1 and in the parallel canon in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.[21] While circumstances may dictate that one or another purpose be given priority at a given time, church administrators need to be vigilant that none of the purposes becomes so dominant as to preclude fulfillment of the others. In particular, it should not be forgotten that one of the principal purposes for the acquisition of material possessions by the Church is to use them for, or give them to, the poor and needy.

Capacity for Ownership

Canon 1255 — The universal Church and the Apostolic See, the particular churches, as well as any other juridic person, public or private, are subjects capable of acquiring, retaining, administering, and alienating temporal goods according to the norm of law.

This canon is an immediate exercise of the independence asserted in the preceding canon; it affirms the capacity for ownership of temporal goods not only in the universal Church and Apostolic See, but also in particular churches and other [12] See commentary on cc. 1277, 1291, 1295.

[13] See Decretum, C. 12 q. 1 c. 23 (Friedberg I, 684–685).
[14] CIC 1496.
[15] PO 17.
[16] GS 88. See also cc. 640, 1285.
[17] V. De Paolis, De Bonis Ecclesiae Temporalibus: Adnotationes in Codicem: Liber V (Rome: Gregorian University, 1986) 29; F. Morrisey, "Acquiring Temporal Goods for the Church's Mission," J 56 (1996) 591.

[18] A. Maida and N. Cafardi, Church Property, Church Finances, and Church-Related Corporations: A Canon Law Handbook (St. Louis: Catholic Health Association, 1984) 10.
[19] AA 2.
[20] G. Roche, "The Poor and Temporal Goods in Book V of the Code," J 55 (1995) 316.
[21] CCEO 1007.

juridic persons of the Church's own creation. No intervention of civil authority is necessary; ecclesiastical authority is considered fully competent to confer capacity for ownership upon ecclesiastical entities and other church-related institutions.

Like the claim to independence itself, however, the conferral of proprietary capacity is minimally enforceable in contemporary society in the absence of a concordat or similar agreement between ecclesiastical and civil authorities. No such agreement exists in many nations, including the United States. Consequently, it is necessary in such nations to seek civil-law recognition, with accompanying civil-law capacity for the ownership of temporal goods, through incorporation or some other civil-law structuring of ecclesiastical entities such as dioceses and parishes and of other church-related institutions. Notwithstanding the Church's claim to independence, church authorities are exhorted to safeguard the ownership of ecclesiastical goods through civilly valid methods (c. 1284, §2, 2°). Once civil-law status has been acquired, the entity then has two sovereigns, canonical and civil, and is subject to the provisions of two legal systems. Church administrators are obliged by the law of the Church to comply with the provisions of both canon and civil law (c. 1284, §2, 3°).

The reference to particular churches includes dioceses, apostolic vicariates and prefectures, stably erected apostolic administrations, territorial prelatures and abbacies, and personal prelatures (cc. 368–373). The reference to juridic persons is to artificial persons, distinct from natural persons, created by competent ecclesiastical authority either by law or by decree, for an apostolic purpose, with the capacity for continuous existence and with rights and obligations conferred by canon law, to which they are wholly accountable (see cc. 113–123). In addition to particular churches, juridic persons include parishes, religious institutes and their provinces and houses, societies of apostolic life, secular institutes, seminaries, episcopal conferences, and, if so erected by decree of competent authority, church-related colleges, universities, hospitals, and other health-care and charitable institutions. Juridic persons whose personality is conferred upon them by law (e.g., dioceses, parishes, religious institutes) are public juridic persons, and act "in the name of the Church"; private juridic persons receive their personality only by decree of competent authority, and act only in their own name (see c. 116). Where not conferred by law, public juridic personality, like private juridic personality, may be conferred by decree. Thus, for example, a university or hospital could be either a public or private juridic person depending upon the decree which conferred the personality (see commentary on c. 116).

The term "Apostolic See" in this canon is used in the broad sense to include the various dicasteries of the Roman Curia (see c. 361). The term "universal Church" refers, anomalously, only to the Latin church (see c. 1).

Canon 1255 is not a taxative listing of all subjects capable of owning temporal goods in service to the mission of the Church. Individuals, and associations of natural persons as co-owners, are also recognized as capable of such ownership (see, e.g., cc. 310, 1269). A considerable amount of property used in the life and work of the Church is owned by individuals, from crucifixes and bibles in private homes and vestments and chalices used by priests in liturgical celebrations, to automobiles and countless other privately owned temporal goods used by individual members of the faithful in a myriad of charitable works. The purpose of canon 1255 is simply to affirm proprietary capacity in nonnatural ecclesial entities;[22] the capacity of natural persons, individually or in association, is presumed.

Ownership

Canon 1256 — Under the supreme authority of the Roman Pontiff, ownership of goods belongs to that juridic person which has acquired them legitimately.

[22] The law allows the possibility of a religious institute excluding or restricting, by the terms of its constitution, the capacity to own temporal goods, but not its juridic personality (c. 634, §1).

Whereas the preceding canon affirms the capacity of juridic persons to own temporal goods, this canon asserts the simple truth that actual ownership resides in the juridic person which has legitimately acquired the goods. Thus, property legitimately acquired by a parish—which, by law, is a juridic person (c. 515, §3)—is owned by the parish, not by the diocese, which is a distinct juridic person (c. 373). Property legitimately acquired by a religious province belongs to the province, not to the religious institute; province and institute are distinct juridic persons (c. 634, §1).

Notwithstanding its simplicity and seemingly obvious truth, canon 1256 gives rise to a number of Church-State conflicts as well as internal ecclesial disputes between diocesan bishops and pastors or other administrators of church property. The problems arise when the civil-law structure of a diocese does not mirror, or is otherwise incompatible with, the canonical structure, resulting in divergent views of the ownership of church-related property and of the appropriate persons to administer and alienate such property. A prime illustration exists in those dioceses in the United States where the diocese is civilly structured as a corporation sole. In such a diocese all, or nearly all, church-related assets are civilly owned by a single corporation whose sole member is the diocesan bishop. While such a structure is considered desirable by some because of the high degree of centralized control it affords, and because of its capacity to offer ample collateral as security for large construction and other loans, the corporation sole is viewed by others as highly undesirable from the viewpoint of liability, exposing as it does all parochial and other church-related assets within a diocese to satisfy creditors' claims against any individual parish or institution, and because centralized ownership and control of all church property within a diocese is contrary to the law of the Church.

Early in the twentieth century, the Holy See expressed to American bishops its disapproval of the corporation sole as a method of holding title to church property:

> Among the methods which are now in use in the United States for holding and administering church property, the one known as Parish Corporation is preferable to the others, but with the conditions and safeguards which are now in use in the State of New York. The Bishops therefore should immediately take steps to introduce this method for the handling of property in their dioceses, if the civil law allows it. If the civil law does not allow it, they should exert their influence with the civil authorities that it may be made legal as soon as possible. Only in those places where the civil law does not recognize Parish Corporations, and until such recognition is obtained, the method commonly called Corporation sole is allowed, but with the understanding that in the administration of ecclesiastical property the Bishop is to act with the advice, and in more important matters with the consent, of those who have an interest in the premises and of the diocesan consultors, this being a conscientious obligation for the Bishop in person.[23]

Although economic conditions have changed since that reply was issued, the law of the Church regarding ownership of each juridic person's property has not. In fact, liability considerations in contemporary American society, and the enhanced emphasis on subsidiarity in the 1983 code, argue strongly for the continued inappropriateness of the corporation-sole method of holding civil title to church-related property.[24] Where such a method remains in use, diocesan bishops and their finance officers and councils should make every effort to see that the laws of the Church governing the acquisition, retention, administration, and alienation of temporal goods are faithfully fulfilled.

[23] SCConc, July 29, 1911, CLD 2 (1956) 444–445.

[24] A contrary opinion, arguing the merits of the corporation sole, is presented in R. Kealy, "Methods of Diocesan Incorporation," CLSAP (1986) 163–177.

The term "legitimately" in canon 1256 refers to valid acquisition of ownership, not to licit acquisition. As long as the essentials of valid acquisition have been fulfilled, ownership accrues to the juridic person. Failure to fulfill a requirement for liceity (e.g., obtaining permission of the ordinary for a public juridic person to accept a gift with conditions attached—see c. 1267, §2) would render an acquisition of property illicit, but not illegitimate for purposes of canon 1256.

Reference to the authority of the Roman Pontiff is simply a reference to the teaching and governing authority of the Pontiff in regard to the ownership and use of property dedicated to one or another of the Church's purposes. It is not a suggestion of ownership by the Roman Pontiff.[25] Like canon 1255, however, canon 1256 is not taxative. Its purpose is to affirm ownership in juridic persons which have legitimately acquired temporal goods; ownership in natural persons, individually or in association, is presumed.

Canonical writing in English-speaking countries often points to the more complex, sophisticated understanding of ownership in the common-law system compared with what is thought to be a more simplistic notion conveyed by the Roman-law term dominium which is translated as "ownership" in canon 1256 and elsewhere in the code. Whereas common law acknowledges many forms of split or divided ownership (e.g., legal v. equitable ownership, various estates in land, and several forms of concurrent ownership), Roman-law dominium is said to have been undivided and absolute, much like common law's fee-simple ownership. The implication seems to be that use of the word dominium in the code limits the scope of the canons in which the word is used to instances of full, undivided ownership, and does not allow the application of such canons to contemporary forms of partial or divided ownership. Such a view is untenable for a number of reasons, principally because later Roman law used dominium interchangeably with proprietas (as does the code, which uses dominium in c. 1256 and proprietas in c. 1284, §2, 2°) which, less technical and broader in scope than classical dominium, embraced not only full ownership but several inferior modes of limited or partial ownership as well.[26] Moreover, virtually all ownership, partial or full, is acquired by juridic persons in the Church either by gift or contract, with the result that either the intention of the donor, which the code demands must be fulfilled (c. 1300), or the local civil law of contracts, which the code canonizes (c. 1290), determines the extent of ownership conveyed. Dominium in the code, then, is not confined to its meaning in classical Roman law, but refers to all forms of ownership, divided or undivided, recognized in contemporary society.

Ecclesiastical Goods

Canon 1257 — §1. All temporal goods which belong to the universal Church, the Apostolic See, or other public juridic persons in the Church are ecclesiastical goods and are governed by the following canons and their own statutes.

§2. The temporal goods of a private juridic person are governed by its own statutes but not by these canons unless other provision is expressly made.

This is a terminological canon giving a technical meaning to the expression "ecclesiastical goods" (bona ecclesiastica) as the temporal goods of a public juridic person, and subjecting such goods to all of the disciplinary norms of Book V in addition to the provisions of the statutes which govern the particular public juridic person to which the goods belong. The temporal goods of private juridic persons are not ecclesiastical goods and, though governed by the statutes of the private juridic person to which they belong, are not governed by the norms of Book V except where expressly provided otherwise. Canons providing otherwise include such canons as 1263; 1265, §1; 1267, §1; and 1269.

[25] Comm 12 (1980) 398.

[26] J.-P. Schouppe, Elementi di Diritto Patrimoniale Canonico (Milan: Giuffrè, 1997) 20, n. 28; F. Schulz, Classical Roman Law (Oxford: Oxford University, 1961) 338–344; W. Buckland, A Text-Book of Roman Law from Augustus to Justinian (Cambridge: Cambridge University, 1966) 186–194.

Distinguishing the property of private juridic persons from that of public juridic persons, with the latter subject to a greater number of disciplinary norms, is consistent with the greater autonomy which characterizes a private juridic person (see commentary on c. 116), and may often be an influential factor in the choice of canonical status for a church-related charitable institution, particularly in the health-care field where fulfillment of the detailed norms which govern the administration and alienation of ecclesiastical goods may be unduly burdensome and, at times, obstructive of efficient fiscal management.

Meaning of "Church"

Canon 1258 — In the following canons, the term Church signifies not only the universal Church or the Apostolic See but also any public juridic person in the Church unless it is otherwise apparent from the context or the nature of the matter.

This is another terminological canon, according a restrictive and somewhat anomalous signification to the word "church" as used in the remaining canons of Book V. Unless otherwise apparent from the context or nature of the matter, the term "church" throughout the remainder of Book V signifies not only the universal Church but also the Apostolic See and any public juridic person within the ecclesial community. It does not include private juridic persons, despite their orientation to works of the apostolate (see c. 114, §§1, 2), nor private associations of the faithful, despite their similar orientation (see cc. 298, 299).

The curious terminology derives from a post-Tridentine inclination to identify the Church with the hierarchy, an inclination found in the 1917 code[27] but scarcely reconcilable with the people-of-God ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council. According to canon 1258, "church" property is not simply any property dedicated to or used in the work of the Church, but only that which belongs to juridic persons which are closely governed by ecclesiastical authority (the characteristic that differentiates a public from a private juridic person[28]). Failure to advert to this technical meaning of "church" when used in regard to temporal goods in Book V can lead to considerable confusion and to not a few canonical errors.

TITLE I
THE ACQUISITION OF GOODS
[cc. 1259–1272]

This title begins with general principles regarding acquisition of material possessions needed for the Church's mission (cc. 1259–1261). Succeeding canons contain regulatory norms for unsolicited (c. 1267) and specific types of solicited contributions, namely, fund-raising in general (c. 1262), taxation (c. 1263), prescribed fees and offerings (c. 1264), begging for alms (c. 1265), and collections taken up in church (c. 1266). There follow three canons regarding prescription as a means of acquiring temporal goods (cc. 1268–1270), one canon concerning acquisition of goods for the support of the Holy See (c. 1271), and a final canon regarding the regulation and gradual suppression of benefices (c. 1272). A comprehensive knowledge of the provisions of the code governing the acquisition of goods requires knowledge also of canons 121–123, which provide for acquisition on the occasions of the consolidation (c. 121), division (c. 122), or extinction (c. 123) of public juridic persons in the Church.

[27] See, e.g., CIC 684–686 where establishment of associations of the faithful by hierarchical authority was called establishment "by the Church" (ab Ecclesia).

[28] See commentary on c. 116.

Right of Public Juridic Persons to Acquire

Canon 1259 — The Church can acquire temporal goods by every just means of natural or positive law permitted to others.

The right to acquire material possessions, affirmed generally in canon 1254, §1, is here specifically affirmed as belonging, pursuant to the norm of canon 1258, to each public juridic person within the Church. Further, the canon asserts the right to acquire by every just means of natural or positive law.

While the laudable intent of the canon is to claim for the Church's public juridic persons equality with similarly situated secular entities in the use of just means for the acquisition of goods, the references to natural and positive law are problematical. It may be doubted that the natural law contains much of anything regarding specific modes of acquisition (other than to prohibit theft and fraud), or can appropriately be said to apply to nonnatural entities such as juridic persons. Positive law, in keeping with canonical tradition, refers here to civil as well as canon law;[29] but civil laws frequently contain regulatory provisions that treat churches and church-related institutions differently from others as regards inheritances, accumulation of assets, and some forms of fund-raising. These differences in treatment need not be due to invidious discrimination but may be, and often are, motivated by considerations of sound public policy (e.g., maintaining, in the light of liberal tax exemptions for religious and charitable organizations, an adequate and fair tax base for the citizenry). Accordingly, canon 1259 would seem best understood as claiming for public juridic persons in the Church freedom from unjust restriction in the acquisition of temporal goods, a claim less problematically stated in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, which omits all reference to natural or positive law.[30]

Support from the Faithful

Canon 1260 — The Church has an innate right to require from the Christian faithful those things which are necessary for the purposes proper to it.

This canon asserts a right of the Church to demand from the Christian faithful what is necessary for fulfillment of ecclesial purposes. The text and context make clear that here "church" cannot be understood in the technical sense of public juridic person (see c. 1258), for the right is said to be "innate." Nothing is innate to a juridic person; as an artificial construct of a legal system, a juridic person cannot be said to have "innate" rights. Nor can "church" in this canon refer generally to the Christian faithful, since the canon asserts a right of the Church to make demands of the Christian faithful, clearly envisioning the Christian faithful as other than the Church, as the terms are used in this canon.

The word "church" appears to be used in canon 1260 to denote ecclesiastical authority, as the word frequently was used in the 1917 code (see commentary on c. 1258), despite the ecclesiological incongruity of such usage today. What appears to be asserted in canon 1260 is the right of ecclesiastical authority to require from the Christian faithful necessary financial support for ecclesial purposes. Confirmation of such an interpretation would seem to exist in the parallel canon in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches:

> The competent authority has the right to require from the Christian faithful whatever is necessary to attain the ends proper to the Church.[31]

[29] F. Cappello, Summa Iuris Canonici, 5th ed. (Rome: Gregorian University, 1951) 2:550; A. Vermeersch and J. Creusen, Epitome Iuris Canonici, 6th ed. (Rome: H. Dessain, 1940) 2:570.

[30] CCEO 1010.

[31] CCEO 1011.

In light of the obligation of the Christian faithful, stated in canon 222, §1, to assist with the needs of the Church, and the obligation of diocesan bishops, stated in canon 1261, §2, to urge fulfillment of the faithful's obligation, the affirmation of canon 1260 may seem to be superfluous. The focus of canons 222 and 1261, however, is on the internal raising of funds within the Church; the focus of canon 1260 appears to be on the right to raise funds vis-à-vis any attempts by civil authority to deny or restrict such a right, a focus that was explicit in the parallel canon in the 1917 code.[32] The import of canon 1260 is to affirm in members of the hierarchy an innate right (indigenous to their divinely instituted office) to require necessary support from the faithful vis-à-vis any attempts, especially by civil authority, to deny, interfere with, or unreasonably restrict such a right.

Canon 1261 — §1. The Christian faithful are free to give temporal goods for the benefit of the Church.

§2. The diocesan bishop is bound to admonish the faithful of the obligation mentioned in can. 222, §1 and in an appropriate manner to urge its observance.

Having stated as general principles the right of public juridic persons to acquire temporal goods by all just means (c. 1259) and the right of ecclesiastical authority to demand needed support from the faithful (c. 1260), canon 1261 sets forth two additional correlative principles: the right of the faithful freely to contribute, and the responsibility of diocesan bishops to urge the faithful to fulfill their obligation to meet the temporal needs of the Church.

Affirmation of the right freely to contribute appears to be directed at those, within or outside the Church, who would seek to deny or discourage such an exercise of religious liberty. Detailing the bishop's duty to admonish the faithful and urge fulfillment of their obligation of material support is a specification of the general responsibility of diocesan bishops to urge participation and assistance of the faithful in the various works of the apostolate (c. 394, §2), and to promote the discipline of the Church by urging the observance of all ecclesiastical laws (c. 392, §1). Fulfillment of the faithful's obligation is to be urged by the bishop "in an appropriate manner." Appropriateness of manner would include full, honest disclosure of needs and available resources, a preference for persuasion rather than coercion, and the offering of truly Christian motivation.

[32] CIC 1496.

Fund-Raising in General

Canon 1262 — The faithful are to give support to the Church by responding to appeals and according to the norms issued by the conference of bishops.

The preceding three canons set forth general principles regarding the acquisition of material possessions; canon 1262 is the first of several canons dealing with specific modes of acquisition. Primacy[33] is given to the solicitation of funds through appeals to which the faithful freely respond by contributing in the manner and amount of their own choice.[34]

Since such appeals can take many different forms and give rise to widely differing problems in different cultures, the canon wisely invokes the principle of subsidiarity in calling upon episcopal conferences to issue appropriate regulatory norms. In accord with canon 1258, the term "Church" in this canon refers to public juridic persons.

[33] During the revision process, what is now c. 1262 had earlier followed what is now c. 1263 on taxation. The positions of the two canons were reversed precisely to avoid the impression that taxation, rather than free-will responses to fund-raising appeals, is the preferred mode of acquisition. Rel 282.

[34] The earlier CLSA translation, which rendered subventiones rogatas as "collections," led to a truncated understanding of this canon as having to do with offerings taken up in churches. Collections in churches are the subject matter of c. 1266.

In 1977, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) issued guidelines for fund-raising by dioceses, diocesan agencies, and religious institutes in the United States.[35] The guidelines were developed in conjunction with the Leadership Conference of Women Religious and the Conference of Major Superiors of Men. Preceding the 1983 code by six years, the guidelines appear to have anticipated the intent of canon 1262 for regional norms to govern fund-raising in general by public juridic persons.

Under four topics dealing with motivation, official authorization, accountability, and technique, the NCCB guidelines offer practical wisdom in a laudably theological context. Emphasis is placed on the need to offer prospective donors theologically sound Christian motivation for financially participating in apostolic works. This is a needed antidote to secular motivations which often seem to infect contemporary religious fund-raising, such as the satisfaction of self-interest through lotteries, bingos, raffles, tax deductions, and guilt-assuaging expressions of gratitude for receipt through the mail of unsought and unwanted religious trinkets.

The guidelines draw attention to the inappropriateness among Christians of efforts to fund undefined future needs or total financial security as contrary to the gospel mandate to live by faith and trust in God, and warn against the incongruity of excessive fund-raising costs, especially when based on a percentage of the contributions which have been given for apostolic purposes. Protection of the Church's integrity is given as the rationale for requiring antecedent authorization and ongoing supervision by appropriate ecclesiastical authority of the scope and method of each fund-raising endeavor.

Noting that religious fund-raising gives rise to a sacred relationship of trust, the NCCB guidelines offer a challenging view of the extent of a fund-raiser's accountability:

> Fund-raising reports should be prepared in scope and design to meet the particular concerns of those to whom reports are due: namely, the governing body and membership of the fund-raising organization itself, religious authorities who approved and must monitor the fund-raising effort, donors to the particular organization and the giving public at large, and those who are beneficiaries of the funds given.[36]

It is regrettable that in seeking to fulfill its responsibility under canon 1262 to issue norms for fund-raising in general, the NCCB did not reaffirm the insights contained in its 1977 guidelines. The 1984 implementation of canon 1262 by the NCCB reads simply:

> The National Conference of Catholic Bishops authorizes diocesan bishops to establish norms for Church support by the faithful for their own dioceses.[37]

Notwithstanding the fact that the NCCB did not reissue as norms under canon 1262 the guidelines of 1977, there is nothing to prevent diocesan bishops from looking to those guidelines for inspiration in drafting norms for their own dioceses.

Canon 1262 and the NCCB guidelines are both confined to fund-raising by and for public juridic persons. This leaves fund-raising by private juridic persons and by church-related institutions which do not have juridic personality without regulatory norms or even guiding principles. Some solicitation of funds on behalf of such institutions may qualify as begging for alms, and so be regulated by the provisions of canon 1265, or as collections taken up in churches, and so be subject to canon 1266. For the rest, it would seem regrettable that in a matter such as this a lacuna exists in the law, one remedy for which would be an analogical application of the norms issued pursuant to canon 1262 (see c. 19).

[35] NCCB, Principles and Guidelines for Fund Raising in the United States by Arch/Dioceses, Arch/Diocesan Agencies and Religious Institutes (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1977); CLD 8 (1978) 415–421.

[36] CLD 8 (1978) 418.

[37] NCCB-CompNm 20.

Taxation

Canon 1263 — After the diocesan bishop has heard the finance council and the presbyteral council, he has the right to impose a moderate tax for the needs of the diocese upon public juridic persons subject to his governance; this tax is to be proportionate to their income. He is permitted only to impose an extraordinary and moderate exaction upon other physical and juridic persons in case of grave necessity and under the same conditions, without prejudice to particular laws and customs which attribute greater rights to him.

Having accorded primacy to free-will offerings given in response to fund-raising appeals, the code turns next to the matter of ecclesiastical taxation. Canon 1263 is the result of much debate and several revisions during the drafting process in an effort to meet the desires both of those who felt the need to expand the power of diocesan bishops beyond the severely restricted power to tax which had been granted to them in the 1917 code,[38] and those who opposed giving the bishop too much power to burden by diocesan taxes the finances of parishes and others doing the work of the Church in the diocese. The debated issues resolved by the final text of canon 1263 included: who can impose a tax (any local ordinary or only the diocesan bishop), who can be taxed, what can be taxed, to what extent, for what reasons, and only after what, if any, consultation.[39]

The canon has two parts. The first confers on the diocesan bishop the right, after consultation, to impose, for the needs of the diocese, a moderate tax proportionate to income upon public juridic persons subject to his governance. Unlike the second part, the first part makes no mention of grave necessity nor does it designate the tax as "extraordinary." This makes clear that the tax referred to in the first part could be a regularly recurring means of raising funds to meet regularly recurring diocesan needs, and, in that sense, may be considered to be an "ordinary" tax in contradistinction to the extraordinary tax referred to in the second part of the canon. Reluctance to use the word "ordinary" in the canon's first part appears to have been in deference to the decision to give primacy to voluntary responses to fund-raising appeals as the preferred mode of acquisition (see footnote 33); explicit reference to an "ordinary" tax could be misunderstood as an indication that taxation is to be an expected or preferred mode of acquiring needed funds.

The required consultation is to involve two bodies, the diocesan finance council and the entire presbyteral council, not just the college of consultors as is often the case (see, e.g., cc. 1277, 1292). Consultation should include such matters as the genuineness and relative importance of the diocesan need for which the tax is to be imposed, the appropriate meaning in the particular circumstances of "moderate" (a relative term but clearly indicative of limits), and the criteria for determining what qualifies as taxable income. Nothing would appear to preclude the tax from being a graduated income tax, but, in such a case, consultation should also include the various levels and percentages to be used.

If a tax is to be annual, or otherwise regularly recurring, a single consultation at the time of original imposition would appear insufficient to fulfill the intent of the consultation requirement. Consultation should be repeated prior to each renewal of the tax. While the bishop is not obliged to follow the advice he receives from either of the consultative bodies, failure to consult them would invalidate a tax, relieving those upon whom it had been imposed of the obligation to pay it (see c. 127, §1).[40]

[38] See CIC 1504–1506; D. Frugé, "Taxes in the Proposed Law," CLSAP (1982) 274–278.

[39] The legislative history of c. 1263 is amply traced in R. Kealy, Diocesan Financial Support: Its History and Canonical Status (Rome: Gregorian University, 1986) 312–330; see also Frugé, 279–287.

[40] The Eastern code, while requiring consultation of only the finance council, stipulates that the eparchial bishop receive the consent of the council before imposing a tax. CCEO 1012, §1.

Canon 1263 requires consultation of only two ecclesial bodies. When it comes to taxation, however, maximum representation of those who are to bear the burden of taxation is part of the ethos of some cultures. A diocesan bishop in the United States, for example, would be well advised to consult also the diocesan pastoral council, if one exists, the superiors of religious institutes of diocesan right, if such institutes are to be taxed, and representatives of other categories of public juridic persons to be subject to the proposed tax.

The Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts was asked if, in the first part of the canon, the words "public juridic persons subject to his authority" include external schools of religious institutes of pontifical right; the council replied in the negative.[41] Few, if any, schools of such religious institutes have been established as public juridic persons in their own right; most, therefore, would not be subject to such a tax imposed directly on the schools simply because they are not public juridic persons. Nor could the pontifical religious institute to which such a school belongs be taxed under the first part of canon 1263, because such an institute is not generally subject to the governance of the diocesan bishop and specifically enjoys autonomy regarding the internal management of its schools (c. 806, §1). Similarly, schools which, though established as public juridic persons in their own right, continue to be sponsored and governed by religious institutes of pontifical right, would not, according to the authentic interpretation, be subject to the authority of the diocesan bishop for purposes of a tax imposed in accord with the first part of canon 1263.[42]

The second part of canon 1263 empowers the diocesan bishop to impose an extraordinary tax upon other persons, physical and juridic, in cases of grave necessity and "under the same conditions." It is clear that this extraordinary tax cannot be regularly recurring and cannot be for regularly recurring diocesan needs. It is also clear that in order to be under the same conditions, it must be moderate, proportionate to income, and imposed only after consultation with the diocesan finance council and presbyteral council. Finally, it is clear that it can be imposed on natural (physical) persons, either individually or gathered in associations, and on private juridic persons; all of these qualify as "other physical and juridic persons."

What is considerably less clear is whether or not an extraordinary tax can be imposed on a public juridic person not otherwise subject to the diocesan bishop (e.g., a religious institute of pontifical right). Is the phrase "subject to his governance" in the first part of canon 1263 a "condition" which must also be fulfilled in an extraordinary tax imposed under the second part, or is "subject to his governance" simply part of the description of the persons taxable under the first part of the canon, leaving all other persons, including public juridic persons not subject to the diocesan bishop, taxable in the event of an extraordinary tax?

Arguments can be offered in support of either interpretation[43] and commentators, often without giving their reasons, have reached opposite con-

[41] AAS 81 (1989) 991.

[42] See L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 57–58.

[43] Arguments in favor of limiting extraordinary taxes to persons subject to the governance of the diocesan bishop could point to the fact that imposition of a tax, even extraordinary in nature, on persons not otherwise subject to the legislator is highly unusual. Moreover, during the revision process, the Secretariat at one point intimated that the taxing power of a diocesan bishop would be confined to persons subject to his governance (Rel 282). Contrary arguments could point to the fact that the Latin text of c. 1263 uses, in the first part, the word tributum, which connotes the classical notion of tribute being paid by subjects, but, in the second part, the canon uses the word exactionem, a broader term suggesting a legislative intention to reach beyond those who, strictly speaking, are subjects. Also, canon 264, providing for the support of a diocesan seminary, authorizes the imposition of a tax on juridic persons which have an establishment in the diocese, even if they are not otherwise subject to the diocesan bishop, thereby affording a precedent within the code for a more extensive interpretation of the second part of c. 1263.

clusions.[44] This leads to the practical conclusion that, until such time as an authentic interpretation is given, an attempt by a diocesan bishop to impose an extraordinary tax under canon 1263 on a public juridic person (or any person) not otherwise subject to his governance would be doubtfully valid and, hence, not binding (c. 14).

Although canon 1263 empowers diocesan bishops to impose taxes, it does not oblige them to do so. A diocesan bishop who chooses not to use the coercive instrument of taxation in order to meet the needs of the diocese, but who prefers to rely on free-will offerings in response to fund-raising appeals, is free to do so. Any attempt to assign a mandatory quota to parishes or other entities, however, would transform a fund-raising appeal into a tax, requiring the fulfillment of all the conditions of canon 1263.

Unlike the 1917 code[45] and the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches,[46] the 1983 code contains no provision prohibiting the imposition of a tax on Mass stipends. Early in the revision process, there was made known the intention to transfer the prohibition on such a tax to a more appropriate place in the code[47] (most likely to the section of canons governing Mass stipends). Accordingly, although the notion that no tax could be imposed on Mass stipends continued to be agreed upon by those drafting canon 1263,[48] no such prohibition was included in the revised canons on temporal goods. Apparently through inadvertence, the prohibition was not inserted into any other part of the code. This leaves Mass stipends technically taxable under the 1983 code, though in light of the expressed intention simply to relocate, not eliminate, the prohibition, and in light of the Eastern code's retention of the prohibition, a diocesan bishop may well choose to exempt Mass stipends from any tax he may impose.

The final clause in canon 1263 suggests that particular laws and customs could attribute more extensive taxing power to a diocesan bishop. A particular law of such a sort obviously could not originate at the diocesan level; it would have to be supradiocesan in origin, which would require review by the Apostolic See (cc. 446, 455). To acquire the force of law, a custom must be introduced by a community of the faithful with the intention of introducing a law (cc. 23, 25), an unlikely occurrence in the area of taxation. The clause, which was added after submission of the proposed code to the Pope, may have been inserted to accommodate the situation of the Church in some European nations where taxes for the support of churches are collected by civil authorities.[49]

Prescribed Fees and Offerings

Canon 1264 — Unless the law has provided otherwise, it is for a meeting of the bishops of a province:

1° to fix the fees for acts of executive power granting a favor or for the execution of rescripts of the Apostolic See, to be approved by the Apostolic See itself;

2° to set a limit on the offerings on the occasion of the administration of sacraments and sacramentals.

In keeping with tradition, canon 1264, 1° makes provision for seeking financial assistance on the occasion of the granting of a favor by executive authority in the Church. Such would include dispensations, privileges, and other juridic concessions granted by rescript in response to a request (see c. 59). The concession may originate [44] Canon 1263 is interpreted as limiting extraordinary taxes to persons subject to the governance of the bishop in F. Aznar Gil, La Administracion de los Bienes Temporales de la Iglesia, 2nd ed. (Salamanca: University of Salamanca, 1993) 166; and M. López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 781. The contrary opinion is expressed in J.-C. Périsset, Les Biens Temporels de l'Église (Paris: Tardy, 1996) 87; and J. Myers, in CLSA Com, 865.

[45] CIC 1506.

[46] CCEO 1012, §1.

[47] Comm 5 (1973) 95.

[48] Comm 12 (1980) 402.

[49] See V. De Paolis, I Beni Temporali della Chiesa (Bologna: Dehoniane, 1995) 111–112; K. Walf, "The Church Tax as a Means of Subsistence," Con 117 (1979) 20–27.

at the diocesan level or may consist of executing a rescript issued by the Holy See or extending a rescript previously issued by the Holy See (see c. 72). The purpose of assessing fees on such occasions is to provide a specific source of support for the administrative expenses of chanceries and other offices engaged in executive governance.

The canon directs that the amount to be sought on such occasions is to be determined by the bishops of the province. The determination need not be made in a formal provincial council, nor are auxiliary bishops excluded from a decision-making role. The syntax of the Latin text makes clear that approval of the Apostolic See must be obtained for all such fees, not just those for execution of rescripts of the Apostolic See itself.

The determination of fees for marriage dispensations, which received separate treatment under the 1917 code[50] but which receives no mention in the present code, is now subject to the prescriptions of c. 1264, 1°. Fees for expenses incurred by tribunals in their exercise of judicial governance, however, are regulated in an entirely different manner (see c. 1649).

Also, in keeping with long-standing tradition but arguably at variance with contemporary ecclesial thought, canon 1264, 2° makes provision for seeking financial assistance on the occasion of the administration of sacraments and sacramentals. The 1971 Synod of Bishops had stated:

> It seems greatly to be desired that the Christian people be gradually instructed in such a way that priests' incomes may be separated from the acts of their ministry, especially sacramental ones.[51]

The fact that in many regions of the world there as yet appears to be no other means of supporting priests and other clergy precluded the abolition of what had become known as "stole fees," but it was agreed that the term "fees" (taxas) should be replaced by the term "offerings" (oblationes) when referring to financial support given on the occasion of the administration of sacraments and sacramentals.[52] It was also agreed that the verb praefinire ("to fix"), used to describe the determination of fees for rescripts in c. 1264, 1°, should be replaced by the verb definire ("to set a limit on") when referring in canon 1264, 2° to offerings on the occasion of administering sacraments and sacramentals.[53] The import of number two is that provincial bishops are to set a limit above which it is not permissible to request an offering, though voluntary offerings in excess of the limit may be accepted.[54]

Determination of fees and offerings at the provincial level was retained notwithstanding the new structure of the episcopal conference because of varying economic conditions within many episcopal conferences. A suggestion that determination be made by each ordinary was rejected on the ground that fees and defined offerings should be uniform, at least within a province, as had been the discipline under the 1917 code.[55]

Offerings on the occasion of funerals, which received separate treatment under the 1917 code,[56] are explicitly said to be governed by canon 1264, taking care that the needy are not, because of their poverty, deprived of appropriate funeral rites (c. 1181). A similar provision for the needy is made

[50] CIC 1056.

[51] 1971 Synod of Bishops, The Ministerial Priesthood (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1972) 29; Comm 5 (1973) 95.

[52] Comm 12 (1980) 403.

[53] Ibid.

[54] The recommendation of the 1971 synod is reflected in cc. 531 and 551 which provide that offerings given on occasions of pastoral ministry are to be put into the parochial account unless, in regard to voluntary offerings (those in excess of the defined amount for the province), the contrary intention of the donor is clear.

[55] CIC 1507; Rel 283. Canon 952 of the present code also commits to the bishops of a province the determination of what offering may be sought on the occasion of the celebration and application of a Mass for a particular intention. A different method of determining the amount of fees and stipends is prescribed for the Eastern churches. CCEO 1013.

[56] CIC 1234.

in regard to offerings on the occasion of reception of the sacraments (c. 848).

In its opening words, canon 1264 allows for the possibility that different provisions might exist in other laws (as was the case, noted above, in regard to marriage dispensations and funerals in the 1917 code). No such other law exists in the 1983 code, but a future universal law (e.g., in regard to the execution of some papal rescripts) or particular law of an episcopal conference could contain provisions different from those of canon 1264. Such a law would take precedence. It would appear to be invalid as a violation of canon 1264, however, for an individual diocesan bishop or for a province of bishops to attempt to enact contrary legislation.

Begging for Alms

Canon 1265 — §1. Without prejudice to the right of religious mendicants, any private person, whether physical or juridic, is forbidden to beg for alms for any pious or ecclesiastical institute or purpose without the written permission of that person's own ordinary and of the local ordinary.

§2. The conference of bishops can establish norms for begging for alms which all must observe, including those who by their foundation are called and are mendicants.

The phenomenon of face-to-face begging for alms existed long before the advent of Christianity[57] and continues in modern society. The problems to which it gives rise are of concern to civil society and, when the object of the begging is alleged to be religious, to ecclesial society as well.

Among the ills the law of the Church seeks to minimize in this area are misrepresentation, fraud, exploitation of generosity, indecorous sales-pitches, and interference with the effectiveness of fund-raising by dioceses, parishes, religious institutes, and other public juridic persons. To guard against these and other ills associated with begging, canon 1265 requires all private persons, natural or juridic, intending to beg for alms for any religious purpose, to obtain written permissions from their own ordinary (diocesan or religious) and the ordinary of place where the begging is to take place. That the permissions be in writing is essential to verification of the authorization should it be challenged.

Although the canon makes no distinction between oral and written forms of begging, the majority of commentators on the parallel canon in the 1917 code concluded that only oral, person-to-person begging (as in door-to-door solicitation) was within the intended scope of the law.[58] It has generally been thought that written appeals entail far less imposition and coercion and can far more easily be dismissed, and hence do not lead to the kind of abuses the law is seeking to guard against; also, as a practical matter, it is virtually impossible to obtain written permission from the ordinary of every place into which a written appeal may go.

The begging that is restricted is that which is intended to reach, not just a few friends or acquaintances, but many persons approached individually or in groups of two or three. Solicitation of funds from large groups or from the faithful or public at large is subject to the norms for fund-raising in general (see c. 1262) or for collections to be taken up in churches (see c. 1266). So, too, solicitation of funds not by private persons but by official representatives of public juridic persons (such as diocesan bishops and pastors) is subject to the norms for fund-raising in general and for collections in churches.

The opening words of canon 1265, §1, stating that the provisions which are to follow are without prejudice to the right of religious mendicants, do not imply that religious mendicants can beg for alms whenever and wherever they wish without the required permissions; the words are intended simply to remind relevant ordinaries that begging for alms is indigenous to the life of a true mendicant and that, therefore, caution must be exercised when considering denying or restricting permission to mendicants, in order to assure that their right to beg is adequately being honored.[59] Since begging for alms is essential to the life of true mendicants, the consent of a diocesan bishop to erect a religious house of a mendicant institute within the diocese brings with it permission to beg for alms in that diocese;[60] in order for members of the house to beg in another diocese, however, permission of the relevant local ordinary is required.

[57] The expression stipem cogere, a technical expression derived from Roman law, signifies face-to-face begging. Cappello, 2:553. The earlier CLSA translation, mistaking the expression for fund-raising in general, gave c. 1265 an excessively broad scope.

[58] Vermeersch-Creusen, 2:573; G. Vromant, De Bonis Ecclesiae Temporalibus, 3rd ed. (Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1953) 89–90; T. Bouscaren, A. Ellis, and F. Korth, Canon Law: A Text and Commentary, 4th rev. ed. (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1966) 813.

Canon 1265, §2 authorizes episcopal conferences to supplement the provisions of paragraph one by additional norms which, like the provisions of paragraph one, must be observed by all, including true mendicants. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States has not, to date, issued any such norms.

Collections

Canon 1266 — In all churches and oratories which are, in fact, habitually open to the Christian faithful, including those which belong to religious institutes, the local ordinary can order the taking up of a special collection for specific parochial, diocesan, national, or universal projects; this collection must be diligently sent afterwards to the diocesan curia.

In the absence of a controlling norm in the 1917 code, commentators were generally of the opinion that, without an apostolic indult, a local ordinary could not order exempt religious to take up a collection in their churches unless they were also parish churches.[61] Canon 1266 expands the power of local ordinaries in this regard.[62]

Local ordinaries can order the taking up of special collections in all churches and oratories, even those belonging to religious institutes, if the churches or oratories are, as a matter of fact, open to the faithful at large on a regular basis. Churches and oratories differ in that all the faithful have a right of access to a church for divine worship, but no such right in regard to an oratory which, by definition, exists for the benefit of a particular community (compare cc. 1214 and 1223). Canon 1266 rests the right to order a collection on the de facto, rather than de iure, use of an oratory.

The collection must be for a specific, not indeterminate, undertaking, but it need not be diocesan; it can be parochial (e.g., aid to a poor or struggling parish) or national or international. Nor does the undertaking or project which is the object of a mandated collection have to rise to the level of a need or necessity, as in the case of a tax (see c. 1263), suggesting that the motivating causes for collections can be less urgent than those for taxes. The legislative history of canon 1266, however, indicates that mandated collections are envisioned as extraordinary means of raising funds and, hence, ought not to be employed immoderately.[63]

Among the several differences between ordering a collection, which can be done by any local ordinary, and imposing a tax, which can be done only by the diocesan bishop, the most significant is the absence of required consultation when mandating the taking up of a collection. This is no doubt due to the difference in nature between a noncoercive collection, in which no preset amount is designated as due, and a tax, which, of its nature, is coercive. It is arguable, however, that a multiplicity of mandated collections taken up during liturgical celebrations can cumulatively lead to a high level of frustration and disaffection among the faithful

[59] See ES I, 27.
[60] See c. 611, 1°.

[61] See, e.g., Vermeersch-Creusen, 2:574; Cappello, 2:553.
[62] The canon has its source in ES I, 37.
[63] Comm 12 (1980) 405.

that could perhaps be avoided by antecedent consultation with appropriately representative bodies. The placing of a mandatory quota upon a collection (e.g., requiring a parish to return a designated amount) transforms a collection into a tax, subjecting it to the consultative and other requirements of canon 1263.

The final clause in canon 1266 requires that the proceeds of a mandated collection be sent diligently (sedulo) to the diocesan curia. The import of the adverb is twofold: that the proceeds be sent without delay and in their entirety. Unless contributors have been so informed in advance, no part of the proceeds may be withheld at the parish or any other level; not to turn over the entirety of the collection immediately is to violate the intentions of the donors and, as such withholding becomes known, seriously to compromise the perceived integrity of fund-raising in the Church.

Unsolicited Offerings

Canon 1267 — §1. Unless the contrary is established, offerings given to superiors or administrators of any ecclesiastical juridic person, even a private one, are presumed given to the juridic person itself.

§2. The offerings mentioned in §1 cannot be refused except for a just cause and, in matters of greater importance if it concerns a public juridic person, with the permission of the ordinary; the permission of the same ordinary is required to accept offerings burdened by a modal obligation or condition, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1295.

§3. Offerings given by the faithful for a certain purpose can be applied only for that same purpose.

While in its opening words the first paragraph of this canon acknowledges the possibility of gifts to superiors or administrators being intended for their personal use, the paragraph reaffirms the traditional presumption that offerings made to such persons are intended for the juridic entity they represent and administer.[64] A contrary intention must be morally certain (constet). During the revision process it was suggested that this presumption be altered to accord with what seems to be contemporary practice to the contrary. The suggestion was rejected, and the presumption was explicitly made applicable to private as well as public juridic persons.[65]

The second paragraph contains three provisions. The first, applicable to the administrators of both public and private juridic persons, requires a just cause for the refusal of donations, a requirement entirely consistent with the fiduciary nature of an administrator's responsibilities. Depending upon the property being offered, there can be many just causes for refusal to accept (e.g., funds unethically acquired, property needing massive repairs).

The remaining provisions in canon 1267, §2 apply only to public juridic persons. If it is a matter of greater importance, an administrator of a public juridic person who wishes to decline an offering must have, in addition to a just cause, the permission of the proper ordinary. Definition of "greater importance" in this regard, purposefully left vague in the canon, should be determined in the statutes of the public juridic person (see commentary on c. 117).

The final provision in canon 1267, §2 concerns acceptance by public juridic persons of donations and requires permission of the proper ordinary for acceptance of a gift to which has been attached a modal obligation or condition, as well as fulfillment of the provisions of canon 1295, when relevant. A modal obligation, according to Roman law whence the term is derived, is an obligation undertaken at the time of accepting a gift which is enforceable against the donee but the breach of which does not result in reversion of the gift to the donor. A conditional gift, on the other hand, conditions transfer of ownership upon fulfillment of the condition; breach results in a reversion of ownership to the donor. Canon 1295 applies all the norms which govern restricted alienation of the property of public juridic persons (cc. 1291–1294) not only to alienation but also to transactions which entail risk of harm to the patrimonial condition of the juridic person. It can happen that the burden of a particular condition or modal obligation is such that acceptance of the gift to which it is attached entails risk of serious harm to the financial condition of the donee; in such situations, not only must the provisions of canon 1267, §2 be fulfilled, but also those of canons 1291–1294.

[64] CIC 1536, §1.
[65] Comm 12 (1980) 405.

The third paragraph of canon 1267 restates a fundamental canonical principle, expressed in several other canons,[66] that the intentions of donors must be carefully and diligently fulfilled. The presence of such a principle in many civil-law systems owes its origin to centuries-old canonical jurisprudence.

Prescription Applied to Temporal Goods

Canon 1268 — The Church recognizes prescription as a means of acquiring temporal goods and freeing oneself from them, according to the norm of cann. 197–199.

Prescription, in both canon and civil law, is a means of acquiring or losing a right, or of freeing oneself from an obligation, by the passage of time under conditions prescribed by law (see c. 197). Canon 1268 affirms the application of prescription to temporal goods, where it is a means of acquiring or losing the ownership of property or of discharging debts. Though included under the title "The Acquisition of Goods," prescription is of importance in the practical life of the Church not so much as a means of acquisition but as a means of losing church property. Administrators on diocesan, parochial, religious, and other levels need to be alert to the dangers of losing property, through inadvertence, by prescription.

[66] See, e.g., cc. 121; 122; 123; 1284, §2, 3°; 1300; 1303, §2; 1304, §1; 1307, §1; 1310, §2.

The rationale behind allowing transfer of ownership by prescription includes the concern to prevent issues of ownership from remaining uncertain or confused for long periods of time, the desire to encourage cultivation and care of property without fear of one day losing it to a long-dormant claim of ownership by another, and the demand of justice that legal action to vindicate a claim of ownership be brought within a time-frame when witnesses and relevant documentary evidence may reasonably be expected to be available.

The law of the Church "canonizes" the relevant civil law of prescription by according it the same effects at canon law except where the code provides otherwise (c. 197). Exceptions regarding the quality and duration of good faith (c. 198) and the ineligibility of certain matters for prescription (c. 199) are found in the fundamental canons governing prescription in Book I of the code.[67] Additional exceptions to the application of the civil law of prescription to temporal goods are provided in canons 1269 and 1270.

In the United States, there is considerable diversity in the laws of the fifty states concerning what is generally called "adverse possession" when referring to realty, and "prescription" when referring to personalty. Notwithstanding the diversity in detailed provisions, it is commonly required that possession of the property at issue be sufficiently open or public to arrest the attention of the true owner to the fact that the property is being appropriated by another. Also common is the requirement that the possession be pursuant to a claim that is adverse or hostile to the interests of the true owner; prescription does not operate, for example, in favor of a tenant, guardian, partner, agent, or trustee. It is universally required that the adverse possession be continuous, that is, uninterrupted throughout the statutory period of time.

Civil-law statutes of limitation, though technically not effective of transfers of ownership, have the same practical effect by precluding the bringing of legal action to vindicate one's ownership after expiration of the designated period of time. The code uses the term "prescription" in its broadest sense to include the prohibition of legal actions after expiration of designated time periods (see cc. 1362, 1363, 1492, 1512, 4°), and hence, with exceptions provided in the code, canonizes civil-law statutes of limitation (see commentary on c. 197).

[67] Among matters declared in c. 199 not to be subject to prescription are the certain boundaries of ecclesiastical territories and Mass stipends and obligations.

Canon 1269 — If sacred objects are privately owned, private persons can acquire them through prescription, but it is not permitted to employ them for profane uses unless they have lost their dedication or blessing; if they belong to a public ecclesiastical juridic person, however, only another public ecclesiastical juridic person can acquire them.

Sacred objects are those which are destined for divine worship by dedication or blessing (c. 1171). Examples would include relics, chalices, vestments, altar linens, and some religious images. Ownership of sacred objects often vests in dioceses, parishes, religious institutes, and other public juridic persons, but it may also vest in natural or private juridic persons. Canon 1269 limits to public juridic persons the acquisition by prescription of sacred objects owned by other public juridic persons. Sacred objects owned by private persons, natural or juridic, may be acquired through prescription by other private persons or by public juridic persons. A privately owned chalice, for example, left by its owner in a parish church when the owner goes to a foreign mission, could, through prescription, become the property of the parish. A chalice owned by a parish, however, could not, according to canon law, become the property of an individual priest by prescription. Canon 1269, in addition to placing a limitation on the canonization of the civil law of prescription, also prohibits any profane use of a sacred object (e.g., use of a blessed chalice or vestment as a prop in a theatrical production) unless the object has lost its dedication or blessing (usually by decree of a competent ordinary; see, for analogy, c. 1212).

Canon 1270 — If they belong to the Apostolic See, immovable property, precious movable objects, and personal or real rights and actions are prescribed by a period of a hundred years; if they belong to another public ecclesiastical juridic person, they are prescribed by a period of thirty years.

From the viewpoint of Church-State conflicts, the most troublesome of the canonical exceptions to the civil law of prescription concern the length of the prescription period. According to canon 1270, immovable property and precious movable objects as well as other real or personal property rights and claims belonging to the Apostolic See are subject to a one-hundred-year prescription period; those of other public juridic persons are subject to a thirty-year period.[68] Civil-law periods of time are generally briefer. In the United States, for example, prescription periods would rarely exceed twenty years for realty (the equivalent of immovable property) or six years for personalty (the equivalent of movable objects).

The code offers no explicit definition of precious movable objects. It does, however, define precious images as those distinguished by age, art, or veneration (c. 1189), and, in the context of alienation, speaks of goods precious for artistic or historical reasons (c. 1292, §2). The 1917 code had defined as precious those temporal goods which were of notable artistic, historical, or material value,[69] a definition incorporated into the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.[70] Canonical principles of interpretation[71] dictate, therefore, that in canon 1270 the expression "precious movable objects" be understood to refer to objects of notable value due to their material composition (e.g., gold, platinum, diamonds) or because of their status as antiques, artistic or historical treasures, or objects of veneration.

[68] The Eastern code, in addition to stipulating one-hundred-year and thirty-year prescription periods, adds a fifty-year period for property belonging to a church sui iuris or to an eparchy. CCEO 1019. By apostolic privileges granted long ago, the property of some religious institutes (e.g., Benedictines, Cistercians) is protected by lengthy prescription periods, such as sixty or one hundred years. Such privileges remain in effect (c. 4). See D. Tirapu, in Com Ex IV/1, 97; F. Morrisey, in CLSGBI Com, 717, n. 3.

A real right or claim is one whose object is a res, a particular piece of property, movable or immovable (e.g., a right to possess or use a building or remove minerals from the land of another); a personal right has as its object not property but a person against whom one has a claim for damages (e.g., for a breach of contract) or for the cessation or initiation of some activity. In common-law nations, such as the United States, actions to vindicate or enforce a real or personal right or claim are subject to statutes of limitation which vary in length depending upon the particular right at issue and the particular state in which the action is brought.

During the revision process it was suggested that no canonical exceptions be made to the relevant civil-law periods of time. The suggestion was rejected on the ground that it would lead to too much diversity.[72] The wisdom of that decision would seem questionable, not only because acceptance of diversity would appear to have been implied in the decision to canonize civil law in the first place, but also because disparity between the law of the Church and civil law leads inevitably to Church-State conflicts which, while always undesirable, are particularly regrettable in an area like prescription where no theological value is at stake. Moreover, the reluctance to allow diversity in the time periods required for the acquisition by prescription of real or personal property belonging to public juridic persons seems inconsistent with the allowance of such diversity in regard to the acquisition of property belonging to private juridic persons, and the adoption, as a general rule, of diverse civil-law periods for the initiation of actions in ecclesiastical tribunals (see c. 1492, §1).

[69] CIC 1497, §2.
[70] CCEO 1019.
[71] See cc. 6, §2; 17; 19.
[72] Comm 12 (1980) 407.

Support of the Apostolic See

Canon 1271 — By reason of the bond of unity and charity and according to the resources of their dioceses, bishops are to assist in procuring those means which the Apostolic See needs, according to the conditions of the times, so that it is able to offer service properly to the universal Church.

While this canon is new, the notion of financial contributions to support the work of the Apostolic See is not, and has, for a long time, found practical expression in the annual Peter's Pence collection throughout the world. Canon 1271 was drafted in order to insert into the code a canonical obligation to mirror the moral obligation which dioceses have to contribute the means necessary for the Apostolic See to fulfill its functions in service to the universal Church.[73]

The obligations, moral and canonical, flow from the communion and catholicity of the particular churches that together constitute the Catholic Church.[74] The Apostolic See is the principal earthly instrumentality of the unity and mutuality of concern through which the good of all the churches is fostered and furthered. Financial support of the various offices of the Apostolic See, therefore, is a common responsibility of all dioceses; long recognized as a moral obligation, it is now also a canonical obligation.

Although the canon speaks only of bishops, without the modifier "diocesan," and although the bonds of unity and charity of which the canon speaks bind all members of the episcopacy, the obligation of the canon would seem to fall only on diocesan bishops, and not also on auxiliary bishops. In speaking of bishops, the canon refers to the resources of "their" dioceses (suae dioecesis); use of the possessive pronoun implies reference only to bishops to whom the governance of a diocese has been entrusted in their own name, that is, diocesan bishops.

[73] Comm 12 (1980) 411.
[74] See LG 13, 23; CD 6; AG 38; Directory 46–49, 138.

The legislative history of canon 1271 suggests that, in the mind of the drafters, the ordering of a special collection to be taken up in all churches (see c. 1266) would be the means used by diocesan bishops to obtain financial support for the Apostolic See.[75] There is nothing in the law, however, that would confine diocesan bishops to the use of collections as the only appropriate means through which to fulfill the obligation of canon 1271. It would seem that even the imposition of a tax would be permissible for, while taxation must be for diocesan needs (c. 1263), enabling the Apostolic See to fulfill its responsibility of service to all dioceses is truly a need of each diocese flowing from the ecclesiology of communion and catholicity.

Since November 1992, it has been the practice of diocesan bishops in the United States to seek to fulfill canon 1271 by including an annual contribution to the Holy See, separate from the Peter's Pence collection, in the annual budget of each diocese. The amount of this voluntary contribution, which is sent directly to the Apostolic Nunciature, is expected by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops to equal the annual assessment paid by each diocese to the NCCB to defray its expenses. Methods of raising funds to meet annual budgets vary from diocese to diocese.

Reform of Benefices

Canon 1272 — In regions where benefices properly so called still exist, it is for the conference of bishops, through appropriate norms agreed to and approved by the Apostolic See, to direct the governance of such benefices in such a way that the income and even, insofar as possible, the endowment itself of the benefices are gradually transferred to the institute mentioned in can. 1274, §1.

A benefice in the strict sense is an endowed ecclesiastical office. In many countries, though not in the United States, bishoprics, pastorates, and other offices have long been established as benefices. The theoretical advantage of a benefice has been thought to be the freeing of the officeholder for ministry without having to be concerned with obtaining personal financial support. Practically, however, the system has led to financial inequities which in turn have frequently spawned the subordination of ministry to ecclesiastical ambition and avarice. To counter the undesirable effects, the Second Vatican Council sought the reform, even suppression, of the benefice system:

> The chief emphasis should be given to the office which sacred ministers fulfill. Hence the so-called benefice system should be abandoned or at least it should be reformed in such a way that the beneficiary aspect, that is, the right to revenues accruing to an endowed office, will be treated as secondary, and the main consideration in law will be accorded to the ecclesiastical office itself.[76]

Canon 1272 reflects a compromise between those who wanted total suppression of benefices and those who, because of particular circumstances including civil-law implications in certain regions, wanted a more nuanced approach supervised by episcopal conferences through norms approved by the Apostolic See.[77] The canon is of minimal relevance to the Church in some countries, including the United States, because of the absence of benefices in the strict sense.

[75] Comm 12 (1980) 411–412.

[76] PO 20.

[77] Comm 12 (1980) 412.

TITLE II
THE ADMINISTRATION OF GOODS
[cc. 1273–1289]

The organization of this title is essentially hierarchical, beginning with the affirmation of the Roman Pontiff as supreme administrator of all ecclesiastical goods (c. 1273), followed by norms dealing with administration by diocesan bishops and other ordinaries (cc. 1274–1278), and concluding with norms dealing with administration by persons other than ordinaries (cc. 1279–1289). Topics include remuneration of clergy and others who serve the Church, duties of administrators, acts of ordinary and extraordinary administration, required consultation by diocesan bishops and other administrators, social justice, responsibility for acts of administrators which are contrary to law, and required reporting by administrators.

Roman Pontiff as Supreme Administrator

Canon 1273 — By virtue of his primacy of governance, the Roman Pontiff is the supreme administrator and steward of all ecclesiastical goods.

Ownership of ecclesiastical goods is vested in public juridic persons in the Church (cc. 1256, 1257, §1). Administration, an essential element of ownership (see commentary on c. 1254, §1), must be undertaken on behalf of public juridic persons by natural persons designated for some public juridic persons by law and for others by the documents of foundation, statutes, or legitimate custom or, where these make no designation, by appointment by the ordinary to whom the public juridic person is subject (c. 1279). Acts of administration include maintenance, repair, and renovation of property, borrowing money, investment of revenues, entering into contracts, and all other actions necessary to preserve, make fruitful, or put to proper use temporal goods once acquired.

Canon 1273 affirms that, pursuant to his primacy of governance over the whole Church, the Roman Pontiff is supreme administrator and steward of all ecclesiastical goods. This acknowledges in the Roman Pontiff the right, rarely exercised, to supersede the designated administrator and place, directly or indirectly, any act of administration, ordinary or extraordinary, on behalf of any public juridic person in the Church.[78] Originally drafted to apply to all temporal goods in the Church,[79] canon 1273 was narrowed to ecclesiastical goods on the curious ground that the notion of ecclesiastical goods is used in preceding canons and so should be the focus of this one.[80] As a consequence, the Roman Pontiff is not said to be the supreme administrator or steward of goods belonging to private juridic persons. While this may be consistent with the greater degree of autonomy that characterizes private juridic persons as compared with public juridic persons (see commentary on c. 116), it is difficult to reconcile with the Roman Pontiff's "supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church, which he is always able to exercise freely" (c. 331), or with the provision in canon 1256 that ownership belongs to juridic persons "under the supreme authority of the Roman Pontiff."[81]

In affirming that it is pursuant to his primacy of governance that the Roman Pontiff is supreme administrator of ecclesiastical goods, canon 1273 makes clear that acts of administration of temporal goods are acts of governance.[82] Since it is the [78] De Paolis, De Bonis Ecclesiae Temporalibus, 81; Z. Combalía, in Com Ex IV/1, 109; López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 787.

[79] Comm 12 (1980) 412.

[80] Comm 12 (1980) 413.

[81] Some authors are of the opinion that, notwithstanding the wording of c. 1273, the Roman Pontiff is supreme administrator of the goods of private as well as public juridic persons. See, e.g., Combalía, in Com Ex IV/1, 109.

[82] Treatises on the theory of governance in the Church have traditionally divided governance into legislative, judicial, and executive, and subdivided executive governance into coactive, gubernative, and administrative functions, with the last of these identified with the administration of temporal goods. See, e.g., A. Ottaviani, Institutiones Iuris Publici Ecclesiastici (Vatican City: Vatican Press, 1958) 1:94–95, 325–346.

position of the code that lay persons as well as clerics may serve as administrators of ecclesiastical goods,[83] it would seem undeniable that lay persons can and do perform acts of governance. Whether or not, in doing so, lay persons exercise "power of governance" (jurisdiction) may be considered debatable,[84] but canon 1273 would seem clearly relevant to the debate.

Diocesan, Interdiocesan, and Supradiocesan Funds

Canon 1274 — §1. Each diocese is to have a special institute which is to collect goods or offerings for the purpose of providing, according to the norm of can. 281, for the support of clerics who offer service for the benefit of the diocese, unless provision is made for them in another way.

§2. Where social provision for the benefit of clergy has not yet been suitably arranged, the conference of bishops is to take care that there is an institute which provides sufficiently for the social security of clerics.

§3. Insofar as necessary, each diocese is to establish a common fund through which bishops are able to satisfy obligations towards other persons who serve the Church and meet the various needs of the diocese and through which the richer dioceses can also assist the poorer ones.

§4. According to different local circumstances, the purposes mentioned in §§2 and 3 can be obtained more suitably through a federation of diocesan institutes, through a cooperative endeavor, or even through an appropriate association established for various dioceses or for the entire territory of the conference of bishops.

§5. If possible, these institutes are to be established in such a way that they also have recognition in civil law.

Canon 1275 — An aggregate of goods which come from different dioceses is administered according to the norms appropriately agreed upon by the bishops concerned.

Several conciliar concerns led to the formulation of canon 1274.[85] Not least among them was replacement of the benefice system with more equitable remuneration for clergy who serve the diocese (see c. 1272). The first paragraph of canon 1274 mandates the establishment of a diocesan fund for the support, according to the norms of c. 281,[86] of clergy who devote themselves to ministry, unless other provision for their support has been made. In several nations, including the United States, the support of clergy who serve in a diocese is provided by the parishes and other institutions in which they serve. Canon 1274, §1 makes clear, however, that the obligation is a diocesan obligation. To the extent, therefore, that such support is, in fact, equitable in the light of diverse conditions of time and place, canon 1274, §1 imposes no obligation on a diocese; where such support is not equitable, however, the need of a diocese to supplement remuneration coming from parishes or other institutions would argue for the implementation of canon 1274, §1 by establishment of a diocesan fund to meet such a need. Whether or not the beneficiaries of such a fund are to be limited to clergy incardinated in the diocese, or should also include religious and externs serving within a diocese, is a matter for determination in the statutes of the fund.[87]

[83] See cc. 1282, 1287.

[84] For opposite views see F. Urrutia, "Delegation of the Executive Power of Governance," Stud Can 19 (1985) 343; and D-M. Jaeger, "The Relationship of Holy Orders and the Power of Governance according to the Revised Code of Canon Law or: Are the Laity Capable of the Power of Governance?" CLS-GBIN 62 (1984) 27. See also the commentary on c. 129.

[85] See PO 21.

[86] Among other noteworthy provisions, the norms of c. 281 make a distinction between married deacons who devote themselves completely to ministry and those who continue to receive remuneration from a civil profession which they continue to exercise.

[87] See Comm 12 (1980) 409.

The second paragraph of canon 1274 obliges the episcopal conference to see that a fund is established to provide adequate social security for clergy, where no such system exists. The canonical understanding of social assistance includes provision for suitable support during disability, illness, and old age (c. 281, §2).[88] The Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid programs presently in effect in the United States may be thought to obviate the need for action in this regard by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. Such programs, however, rarely suffice to provide adequate sustenance and medical care, making private pension plans and additional medical insurance virtually necessary. These may be, and in the United States usually are, part of the diocesan support of clergy, the subject matter of paragraph one of canon 1274. Paragraph two, however, while not obliging the episcopal conference to establish a fund for the various aspects of social security, does oblige the conference to see that such funds are established at appropriate levels. This would seem to place upon the episcopal conference an antecedent responsibility to learn if adequate provision for disability, illness, and old age among the clergy is being made through diocesan, regional, or other funds.

The third paragraph of canon 1274 reminds diocesan bishops of additional financial obligations flowing from their office as taught by the Second Vatican Council, namely, to provide for adequate remuneration to nonordained religious and laity who serve the Church, to meet the many educational, charitable, and other needs of the diocese for which temporal goods are needed, and to aid poorer dioceses. Remuneration for laity who serve the diocese should include disability, health, and retirement benefits (c. 231, §2). The mandate to establish a diocesan fund in order to fulfill these obligations is contingent upon such a fund or institute being necessary because of the absence of other available means of doing so.

Monies to fulfill these various obligations can come from free-will offerings of the faithful, responses to fund-raising appeals, taxes, prescribed fees, collections, and canonically approved alienations of diocesan property. Explicit reference to canon 1274, §1 is made in canon 1272 regarding what is to happen to the income and endowment of gradually suppressed benefices, and in canon 1303, §2 regarding the disposition of the principal of some non-autonomous foundations upon their termination.

The fourth paragraph of canon 1274 recognizes one of the salient features of contemporary economics, namely, the benefit of pooling or combining funds so as to produce higher yields on investments and greater rates of growth. Accordingly, paragraph four suggests and authorizes interdiocesan and supradiocesan approaches to the funds mentioned in paragraphs two and three. No similar suggestion is made in regard to the core support of clergy who serve the diocese (§1), perhaps in deference to the doctrinal position that priests form one presbyterate with their bishop and are not to be thought of as constituting a national or other supradiocesan presbyterate.[89] Canon 1275 directs that interdiocesan and supradiocesan funds are to be administered according to norms agreed upon by the diocesan bishops involved.

Notwithstanding the Church's claim of independence from civil authority in regard to temporal goods (see c. 1254), the fifth paragraph of canon 1274 urges the establishment of diocesan, supradiocesan, and interdiocesan funds in such a way as to ensure their protection under civil law. Liability concerns will often argue for separate civil-law incorporation of various diocesan funds; canonical separateness, by establishing funds as autonomous foundations (see cc. 115, §3; 1303, §1, 1°) and hence as ecclesiastical juridic persons distinct from the diocese, will often also be advisable in order to match civil-law separateness and thereby lessen liability of the diocese in ecclesiastical tribunals, and perhaps also in civil courts as well (see the discussion of the canonical status of [88] Prior to its mention of support for priests burdened by infirmity and ill health, the conciliar source for c. 1274 makes explicit reference to appropriate programs of preventive medicine and health benefits. PO 21.

[89] See PO 7, 8; CD 28.

church-related institutions following the commentary on cc. 113–123).

Supervisory Role of Ordinaries

Canon 1276 — §1. It is for the ordinary to exercise careful vigilance over the administration of all the goods which belong to public juridic persons subject to him, without prejudice to legitimate titles which attribute more significant rights to him.

§2. With due regard for rights, legitimate customs, and circumstances, ordinaries are to take care of the ordering of the entire matter of the administration of ecclesiastical goods by issuing special instructions within the limits of universal and particular law.

In marked contrast to canon 1273, which declares the Roman Pontiff to be supreme administrator of all ecclesiastical goods, canon 1276 does not declare the diocesan bishop or other ordinary to be the preeminent administrator of all ecclesiastical goods within the diocese or other jurisdiction. Rather, canon 1276 attributes to all ordinaries a supervisory role in regard to the administration of goods belonging to public juridic persons subject to them.

The administrator of ecclesiastical goods is ordinarily the person who directly governs the public juridic person to whom the goods belong (c. 1279, §1).[90] Thus, for example, a pastor is the administrator of the temporal goods belonging to a parish (c. 532). A diocesan bishop is the administrator of goods belonging to the public juridic person known as the diocese, but he is not the administrator of parochial and all other ecclesiastical goods situated within the diocese. In regard to the administration of such goods his role is supervisory. He has a responsibility to urge the observance of all laws of the Church by those whose responsibility it is to administer ecclesiastical goods, and to ensure that abuses do not creep into such administration. In this regard, canon 1276 is a specification of the general norms found in canon 392.

Supervision of administration by an ordinary extends, according to canon 1276, §1, only to public juridic persons. This is in keeping with the greater autonomy of private juridic persons. Canon 1276, §1, however, allows for lawful titles which give an ordinary greater rights. Such titles could include the statutes of a private juridic person which accord supervisory rights to the ordinary, or statutes of a public or private juridic person (e.g., a health-care, educational, or other charitable institution or foundation) designating the ordinary as administrator of its temporal goods.

The elements that constitute the supervisory role of an ordinary include the responsibility to issue appropriate regulatory instructions for the administration of ecclesiastical goods, with due regard for rights, lawful customs, and relevant circumstances (c. 1276, §2). Instructions must always be within the law; they cannot derogate from the law (e.g., by attempting to take away from pastors their right and duty to administer the goods of their parishes). Any instruction which cannot be reconciled with the law lacks all force (c. 34, §2).

Other elements of an ordinary's supervisory role are found in subsequent canons and include:

- appointment of administrators for public juridic persons whose governing documents fail to make provision for them (c. 1279, §2);
- reception, personally or through a delegate, of the required oath of an administrator regarding faithful performance of duty (c. 1283, 1°);
- determination of the limits of ordinary administration where the relevant statutes fail to do so (c. 1281, §2);[91]
- authorization of acts of extraordinary administration (c. 1281, §1);
- consent to long-term investments (c. 1284, §2, 6°);

[90] Particular law, statutes, or lawful custom can provide otherwise (c. 1279, §1), and, in the rare instance where no designation exists, the ordinary is to appoint a suitable person as administrator (c. 1279, §2).

[91] The wording of c. 1281, §2 commits such a determination to diocesan bishops, not to all ordinaries.

- intervention in cases of negligence by an administrator (c. 1279, §1);
- reception of annual reports and transmittal of them to the financial council (c. 1287, §1);[92]
- granting or denying permission to initiate or contest a legal proceeding in civil court (c. 1288);
- granting or denying permission to accept a non-autonomous foundation (c. 1304, §1);
- approval of provisions for the safe-keeping and investment of the endowment of a non-autonomous foundation (c. 1305);
- approval of the renunciation of the trial of an issue involving temporal goods (c. 1524, §2).

Ordinary and Extraordinary Administration by Diocesan Bishop

Canon 1277 — The diocesan bishop must hear the finance council and college of consultors to place acts of administration which are more important in light of the economic condition of the diocese. In addition to the cases specially expressed in universal law or the charter of a foundation, however, he needs the consent of the finance council and of the college of consultors to place acts of extraordinary administration. It is for the conference of bishops to define which acts are to be considered of extraordinary administration.

As the one who directly governs the public juridic person known as the diocese, the diocesan bishop is the administrator of temporal goods owned by the diocese (c. 1279, §1). The bishop's role in regard to diocesan property, then, is far greater than his supervisory role in regard to the administration of other ecclesiastical goods within the diocese. Yet, the law of the Church does not allow a diocesan bishop in his administration of diocesan financial matters always to act alone. Consultation with others, and at times even obtaining their consent, is required of him in important matters.

The rationale for this is twofold: first, to guard against the dangers of grave harm to the financial condition of a diocese from decisions hastily made in the absence of accurate and adequate information from truly knowledgeable and skilled experts; second, to free the diocesan bishop from the felt need to spend inordinate amounts of time attending to financial matters to the neglect of his many responsibilities in the teaching and sanctifying offices of the Church and in the nonfinancial areas of the governing office.

Canon 1277 has two parts, the first dealing with a diocesan bishop's acts of ordinary administration of greater importance, for which consultation of both the diocesan finance council and the college of consultors is required (for validity, according to the norm of c. 127, §1).[93] In general, acts of ordinary administration are those which occur regularly or whose financial consequences are moderate. Despite requests during the revision process for precise determination of what is meant by acts of ordinary administration of greater importance, the canon, in deference to economic diversity among the dioceses of the world, offers no specification of the term other than to indicate that its meaning is relative to the financial condition of each diocese.[94] Accordingly, the proper place in which to find a precise determination is in the statutes of each diocese. Well-drafted statutes (ideally the result of widespread consultation themselves) should indicate what kinds of ordinary transactions, and above what monetary limits, are considered to be of greater importance within the diocese. The law of the Church expects such a determination to be made; without it, the first part of canon 1277

[92] The wording of c. 1287, §1 requires that an annual report be made to a local ordinary, not to all ordinaries.

[93] Although the canon does not use the word "ordinary," it is clear from the use of the word "extraordinary" in the second part of the canon, which requires consent of the two consultative bodies, that the first part, which requires only that the two bodies be heard, concerns the more important acts of ordinary administration.

[94] See Comm 12 (1980) 414.

cannot be implemented. Such a determination, whether made in diocesan statutes or elsewhere, serves to remind the diocesan bishop, the finance council, and the college of consultors of the need for consultation, an exercise of shared responsibility without which the administration of diocesan property and finance may be qualitatively flawed.

The second half of canon 1277 deals with a diocesan bishop's acts of extraordinary administration, for which consent of both the finance council and the college of consultors is required (for validity, according to c. 127, §1). In general, acts of extraordinary administration are those which occur irregularly or whose financial consequences are considerable. The canon places upon the episcopal conference the responsibility to determine which acts of a diocesan bishop are to be regarded as acts of extraordinary administration, and additionally requires the consent of the finance council and college of consultors whenever another provision of universal law or the charter of a foundation requires it.

In implementing the directive of canon 1277 to define which of a diocesan bishop's acts of administration are to be considered extraordinary administration, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States seems not to have adverted to the fact that the 1983 code, unlike the 1917 code, regards extraordinary administration as a category of financial transaction distinct from alienation and other transactions governed by the norms for alienation.[95] The NCCB implementation of canon 1277, promulgated in June 1986, reads as follows:

> In accord with the norms of canon 1277, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops determines that the following are to be considered acts of extraordinary administration and therefore subject to the limits of canons that regulate such acts.
>
> 1. To alienate (in the strict sense, convey or transfer ownership) goods of the stable patrimony when the value exceeds the minimum limit (c. 1292, §1).
>
> 2. To alienate goods donated to the Church through a vow, or to alienate goods that are especially valuable due to their artistic or historical value regardless of the appraised value (c. 1292, §2).
>
> 3. To incur indebtedness (without corresponding increase in the assets of the diocese) that exceeds the minimum limit (c. 1295).
>
> 4. To encumber stable patrimony the value of which exceeds the minimum limit (c. 1295).
>
> 5. To lease church property when the annual lease income exceeds the minimum limit (c. 1297).
>
> 6. To lease church property when the value of the leased property exceeds the minimum and the lease is for more than nine (9) years (c. 1297).[96]

The first four acts of extraordinary administration defined by the NCCB are transactions already subject to the more exacting requirements of the canons governing alienation. The remaining two acts of extraordinary administration defined by the NCCB concern leasing which, in the 1983 code, is viewed as distinct both from extraordinary administration and alienation and is made subject to a distinct set of norms (see commentary on canon 1297).

Implementation of canon 1277 in other nations appears to evidence a better understanding of the nature of acts of extraordinary administration and the differences between them and acts of alienation or leasing. Some conferences classify as extraordinary administration certain types of transaction, such as the acceptance of onerous gifts or bequests, acquisition of real estate, creation or suppression of institutions, alteration of buildings, relocation of artistic or historical works, or erection of a cemetery. Others base the classification on the amount of money involved (but below the minimum set for application of the norms governing alienation). Still others require a combination of type of transaction and amount of money involved for classification as an act of extraordinary administration.[97] Perhaps opportunity will be afforded to the episcopal conference in the United States to reconsider and revise its complementary norms for canon 1277.

[95] See Comm 12 (1980) 396; De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 149–150; 179, n. 1; 183–184; López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 792; F. Morrisey, "Ordinary and Extraordinary Administration: Canon 1277," J 48 (1988) 722–723.

[96] NCCB-CompNm 21.

Role of Finance Officer

Canon 1278 — In addition to the functions mentioned in can. 494, §§3 and 4, the diocesan bishop can entrust to the finance officer the functions mentioned in cann. 1276, §1 and 1279, §2.

Each diocese is required by law to have a finance officer whose duty is to administer, under the authority of the bishop, the temporal goods belonging to the public juridic person known as the diocese (c. 494). The finance officer is not the administrator of such property, but acts as canonical agent for the diocesan bishop who remains the administrator.

Canon 1278 authorizes the diocesan bishop also to entrust to the finance officer fulfillment of the bishop's supervisory responsibilities in regard to the administration of other ecclesiastical goods within the diocese (see commentary on c. 1276), and specifically the appointment and re-appointment of suitable administrators of the temporal goods of public juridic persons subject to the bishop for which no such administrators have otherwise been provided (see c. 1279, §2).

The need for canon 1278 may be questioned by those who regard the diocesan bishop's supervisory role in regard to the administration of temporal goods by others to be within the exercise of the bishop's ordinary (attached to his office by law) executive power of governance.[98] As such, the supervisory responsibilities may be delegated in whole or in part without the need for any additional authorization (c. 137, §1). Delegation to a finance officer who is a member of the laity, however, might by some be considered questionable in the absence of an express provision such as canon 1278.

Administrators Other Than Ordinaries

Canon 1279 — §1. The administration of ecclesiastical goods pertains to the one who immediately governs the person to which the goods belong unless particular law, statutes, or legitimate custom determine otherwise and without prejudice to the right of the ordinary to intervene in case of negligence by an administrator.

§2. In the administration of the goods of a public juridic person which does not have its own administrators by law, the charter of the foundation, or its own statutes, the ordinary to whom it is subject is to appoint suitable persons for three years; the same persons can be reappointed by the ordinary.

This is the first in a series of canons that govern administration of temporal goods by persons other than ordinaries. The first paragraph sets forth the general principle that administration of ecclesiastical goods is the responsibility of the person who immediately governs the public juridic person that owns the goods. Canon 532, which designates the [97] "Canon 1277. Particular Legislation: Definition of Acts of Extraordinary Administration," CLD 11, 303–308; "Complementary Norms to the Code Promulgated by English-Language Conferences of Bishops," in Pamplona ComEng 1312, 1331, 1353, 1389, 1407; J. Martín de Agar, Legislazione delle Conferenze Episcopali Complementare al C.I.C. (Milan: Giuffrè, 1990) passim.

[98] See footnote 82 above.

pastor as the person responsible for the administration of the goods of the parish, is a specification of this general principle. Exceptions to the principle can be made by particular law, statutes of a public juridic person, or lawful custom; no particular law or statute, however, can derogate from universal laws such as canon 532 which contain no express provision for particular law to the contrary (c. 6, §1, 2°), and no custom contrary to current law can become lawful until it has been observed for thirty years by a community intending thereby to introduce a law (cc. 25, 26).

The second paragraph provides that in instances where no law (legislated or customary) or provision in a governing document (charter or statutes) designates an administrator, the ordinary (diocesan or religious) to whom the public juridic person is subject is to appoint a suitable person for a term of three years, and may reappoint the person for additional terms. The 1917 code had restricted appointment of administrators by ordinaries to suitable men and had discouraged reappointment.[99] The 1983 code reflects a deliberate change to allow the appointment of women and to allow reappointment.[100]

A concluding clause in the first paragraph of canon 1279 acknowledges the right of the relevant ordinary to intervene in case of negligence by an administrator. The right of intervention in the event of negligence is an essential element of supervision (see commentary on c. 1276). Negligence, however, is not the same as prudential disagreement, and ordinaries should exercise caution in seeking to override the judgments of those to whom the law or other governing documents, in service to the values of subsidiarity and shared responsibility, have entrusted the responsibilities of administration. Conversely, administrators must respect not only the legitimate supervisory role of ordinaries but also the competence of ecclesiastical authority to regulate the exercise of rights, including the rights of administrators, in the interest of the common good (see c. 223, §2).

The incompatibility with canon law of the corporation-sole approach to the ownership of church property in the United States (see commentary on c. 1256) is nowhere more evident than in the provisions of canon 1279. The right and responsibility of a diocesan bishop to appoint administrators of public juridic persons where they are lacking, and to intervene in cases of negligence by an administrator, make clear that according to the law of the Church the diocesan bishop himself is not the administrator of all ecclesiastical property within the diocese. Decision-making concerning temporal goods, within the parameters of canon law and legitimate instructions issued by the diocesan bishop, and the implementation of such decisions once made are responsibilities of the pastor in the case of a parish and of others who immediately govern other public juridic persons within a diocese.

Finance Council or Advisors

Canon 1280 — Each juridic person is to have its own finance council or at least two counselors who, according to the norm of the statutes, are to assist the administrator in fulfilling his or her function.

As is true of diocesan bishops in their administration of temporal goods belonging to the diocese (see c. 1277), so too in regard to other administrators the law of the Church does not favor financial administration by a single individual acting alone. This is particularly true when the administrator, such as a pastor, is called upon to fulfill many other responsibilities.

The need for financial, civil-law, and canonical expertise is critical in a complex modern world. Accordingly, canon 1280 requires administrators to be assisted by finance councils or at least two counselors,[101] and mandates the inclusion of norms to govern the role of such councils or advisors (e.g., when they must be consulted or when their consent must be obtained) in the statutes of the juridic person. The composition and functions of the diocesan finance council (see cc. 492–493, 1277, 1292) can serve as models for similar provisions in the statutes of other public juridic persons.

[99] CIC 1521, §1.
[100] Comm 12 (1980) 416.

[101] A parish is required to have a financial council, not simply the less formal counselors (c. 537).

The first words of canon 1280 give rise to an ambiguity found also in some subsequent canons in this title: is the canon binding on private as well as public juridic persons? The norms given in canon 1257 provide that the canons of Book V apply only to public juridic persons unless express provision is made to the contrary. Express provisions can be explicit or implicit. Canon 1280 contains no explicit reference to private juridic persons, but it is unclear if use of the phrase "each juridic person" is intended to imply inclusion of private juridic persons.

An affirmative response is suggested by the fact that the immediately preceding canon explicitly refers to ecclesiastical goods in paragraph one and to public juridic persons in paragraph two; use of the expression "each juridic person" in canon 1280 may reasonably be read, therefore, as indicating the legislator's intention to extend the scope of canon 1280 to all juridic persons, private as well as public. On the other hand, canons 1279, 1280, and 1281 may reasonably be read as a cluster of canons all referring to the same administrators, namely, the administrators of ecclesiastical goods explicitly referred to in canon 1279. Such a reading finds support in the legislative history of canon 1280 which was originally proposed as an addition to canon 1279.[102] Further support derives from the fact that canon 1267, §1, which uses the expression "any ecclesiastical juridic person," immediately adds the phrase "even a private one" to signal the intention to include private juridic persons; no such specification has been included in canon 1280. Doubt regarding the applicability of canon 1280 to private juridic persons would seem resolvable through the application of canon 14, leading to the conclusion that, pending authentic interpretation to the contrary, the provisions of canon 1280 are not binding on private juridic persons.[103]

It is, nonetheless, certainly advisable that private juridic persons, no less than public ones, be so structured as to make available to their administrators the assistance of expert financial advice, and it may fairly be presumed that most, if not all, private juridic persons are so structured. The practical importance of resolving the ambiguity in canon 1280 may, therefore, be minimal. The same ambiguity arises, however, in other canons where the practical consequences for private juridic persons can be considerable. It has seemed appropriate, therefore, to introduce the issue here where it first arises, and to continue the discussion when commenting upon subsequent canons.

Acts of Extraordinary Administration

Canon 1281 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescripts of the statutes, administrators invalidly place acts which exceed the limits and manner of ordinary administration unless they have first obtained a written faculty from the ordinary.

§2. The statutes are to define the acts which exceed the limit and manner of ordinary administration; if the statutes are silent in this regard, however, the diocesan bishop is competent to determine such acts for the persons subject to him, after having heard the finance council.

§3. Unless and to the extent that it is to its own advantage, a juridic person is not bound to answer for acts invalidly placed by its administrators. A juridic person itself, however, will answer for acts illegitimately but validly placed by its administrators, without prejudice to its right of action or recourse against the administrators who have damaged it.

[102] Comm 12 (1980) 415–416.

[103] That the applicability of c. 1280 to private juridic persons is doubtful seems amply confirmed by the divergent opinions of authors. De Paolis, in his earlier work, acknowledged the doubt without attempting to resolve it (De Bonis Ecclesiae Temporalibus, 90), but in his later work, relying solely on the words "each juridic person," takes the position that the canon is applicable to private juridic persons (I Beni Temporali, 163). See also L. de Echeverria, in Salamanca Com, 608; Morrisey, in CLSGBI Com, 725. Others hold that, despite the generality of its opening words, c. 1280 applies only to public juridic persons. See, e.g., Périsset, 165; V. Rovera, "I Beni Temporali della Chiesa," in La Normativa del Nuovo Codice, ed. E. Cappellini, 2nd ed. (Brescia: Querinian, 1985) 284.

There is nothing, explicit or implicit, in the wording of any of the paragraphs of canon 1281 to suggest that the canon applies to private juridic persons. Accordingly, canon 1257, §2 requires the conclusion that the canon applies only to public juridic persons.

Echoing the invalidating restrictions placed upon diocesan bishops when performing acts of extraordinary administration (see cc. 1277, 127, §1), the first paragraph of canon 1281 imposes an invalidating restriction upon acts of extraordinary administration by other administrators of temporal goods. For validity, a faculty is required from the ordinary (diocesan or religious) to whom the public juridic person whose goods are being administered is subject. In accord with principles of good governance, the law requires the faculty to be in writing; canonical tradition, however, regards an oral grant of faculties to be valid, viewing the additional requirement that the grant be in writing as designed only to facilitate proof and, therefore, as affecting only liceity.[104]

The requirement of a written faculty from a relevant ordinary is in addition to whatever requirements, for validity or liceity, are contained in the statutes of the public juridic person regarding acts of extraordinary administration. That is the import of the opening phrase in the first paragraph of canon 1281. Such statutory requirements could include, for example, hearing or obtaining the consent of the public juridic person's finance council or advisors (see c. 1280).

Use of the term "faculty" (imprecisely translated as "authority" in the earlier CLSA translation) in canon 1281 is not without relevance to the continuing debate over lay exercise of the power of governance. Unlike permission, a faculty is in the genus of power;[105] where required, as in canon 1281, its absence affects validity.[106] Since lay persons as well as clerics may serve as administrators of ecclesiastical goods (see cc. 1282, 1287), canon 1281 affords an instance where the law of the Church allows a faculty to be given to a lay person, something not acknowledged in the canons which govern preaching or assisting at marriage.[107]

The second paragraph of canon 1281 remits to the statutes of individual public juridic persons the determination of what kinds of financial transactions (e.g., purchasing, borrowing, renovating), and above what monetary limits, are to be regarded as acts of extraordinary administration. Only where the statutes fail to do so is the determination to be made by the diocesan bishop for public juridic persons subject to him. It seems unnecessary, and often ecclesiologically and economically inappropriate, for all parishes (or other public juridic persons) in the same diocese to have identical designations of acts of extraordinary administration; what is an extraordinary financial transaction, in kind or amount, for an inner-city parish may be quite routine, and hence ordinary, in an affluent suburban parish. Recognition of financial diversity is but one facet of truly catholic unity-in-diversity, even as such unity leads, or should lead, to effective concern on the part of rich ecclesial units for poorer ones.

The third paragraph of canon 1281 expresses three propositions the content of which seems self-evident: a public juridic person is not liable for acts invalidly placed by its administrators, but is liable for validly placed acts even if they are illicit, and in all cases has the right to hold liable any administrator who by invalid or illicit action has injured the public juridic person. An administrator's individual liability for causing financial damage is a specification of the general norm of canon 128.

[104] Cappello, 2:577; Vromant, 194; Vermeersch-Creusen, 2:591–592; De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 177.

[105] See, e.g., c. 132.

[106] The sole exception is in regard to preaching (see c. 764) where the notions of validity and invalidity are inapposite.

[107] Compare c. 764 with c. 766, and c. 1111 with c. 1112.

Even though a public juridic person is not canonically liable for an action that is canonically invalid (e.g., because of an administrator's failure to obtain the requisite faculty before placing an act of extraordinary administration), the action may have been civilly valid, resulting in consequent conflict and harm to the public juridic person. Civil lawyers representing public juridic persons in the Church would be well advised to see to it that canon 1281 is incorporated-by-reference in bylaws and other civilly governing documents so that the invalidity of canonically unauthorized actions by administrators will be honored at civil law as well as canonically.

If a canonically invalid financial transaction in fact proves advantageous, the public juridic person is free to ignore the invalidity and allow the transaction to stand. Administrators who place such actions should be reminded, however, that despite the ensuing advantage to the public juridic person, the law of the Church has been broken and the administrator's fidelity to the duties of office may thereby have been diminished.

Notwithstanding the technical inapplicability of canon 1281 to private juridic persons, the seemingly self-evident propositions of paragraph three would appear relevant to private as well as to public juridic persons.

Duties of Administrators

Canon 1282 — All clerics or lay persons who take part in the administration of ecclesiastical goods by a legitimate title are bound to fulfill their functions in the name of the Church according to the norm of law.

Canon 1283 — Before administrators begin their function:

1° they must take an oath before the ordinary or his delegate that they will administer well and faithfully;

2° they are to prepare and sign an accurate and clear inventory of immovable property, movable objects, whether precious or of some cultural value, or other goods, with their description and appraisal; any inventory already done is to be reviewed;

3° one copy of this inventory is to be preserved in the archive of the administration and another in the archive of the curia; any change which the patrimony happens to undergo is to be noted in each copy.

Canon 1284 — §1. All administrators are bound to fulfill their function with the diligence of a good householder.

§2. Consequently they must:

1° exercise vigilance so that the goods entrusted to their care are in no way lost or damaged, taking out insurance policies for this purpose insofar as necessary;

2° take care that the ownership of ecclesiastical goods is protected by civilly valid methods;

3° observe the prescripts of both canon and civil law or those imposed by a founder, a donor, or legitimate authority, and especially be on guard so that no damage comes to the Church from the non-observance of civil laws;

4° collect the return of goods and the income accurately and on time, protect what is collected, and use them according to the intention of the founder or legitimate norms;

5° pay at the stated time the interest due on a loan or mortgage and take care that the capital debt itself is repaid in a timely manner;

6° with the consent of the ordinary, invest the money which is left over after expenses and can be usefully set aside for the purposes of the juridic person;

7° keep well organized books of receipts and expenditures;

8° draw up a report of the administration at the end of each year;

9° organize correctly and protect in a suitable and proper archive the documents and records on which the property rights of the Church or the institute are based, and deposit authentic copies of them in the archive of the curia when it can be done conveniently.

§3. It is strongly recommended that administrators prepare budgets of incomes and expenditures each year; it is left to particular law, however, to require them and to determine more precisely the ways in which they are to be presented.

The paramount duty of all administrators, clerical or lay, of temporal goods belonging to public juridic persons is that they fulfill their responsibilities in the name of and in accord with the law of the Church. It is the essence of a public juridic person that all of its activity is undertaken in the name of the Church, that is, pursuant to a mission received from competent ecclesiastical authority and closely governed by that authority (see commentary on c. 116). It is in that sense that lay administrators of ecclesiastical goods, no less than clerics, act "in the name of the Church."

In view of the meaning of acting in the name of the Church, it was perhaps unnecessary to insert into canon 1282 the admonition to act in accord with the norm of law; such a mode of action is clearly included in the notion of acting in the name of the Church. The claim has occasionally, and erroneously, been made that altering the membership of a board of directors or trustees of a public juridic person, or of an institution (e.g., a hospital or university) canonically belonging to a public juridic person, so as to result in a board the majority of whose members are lay persons, has the effect of removing the entity and its property from the ambit of canon law, as if lay persons were not members of the Church or not competent to fulfill its laws. Canon 1282 makes it clear that lay persons, no less than clerics, act in the name of the Church and are bound by all applicable laws of the Church in their administration of temporal goods canonically belonging to public juridic persons.

Canon 1283 prescribes two preliminary obligations to be fulfilled by administrators before undertaking the duties of their office: the taking of an oath to serve well and faithfully, and the preparation of an up-to-date inventory and appraisal of all temporal goods to be administered. In the absence of a thorough, authenticated, and up-to-date inventory, serious conflicts can arise between individual administrators (such as pastors) and their successors over which assets belong personally to the administrator and which to the juridic person. It is the purpose of canon 1283 to prevent such conflicts by requiring up-to-date copies to be kept in the archives both of the juridic person and of the relevant curia.

There is nothing, explicit or implicit, in the wording of canon 1283 to suggest that its provisions are applicable to private juridic persons. Therefore, in accord with the norms of canon 1257, the obligations of canon 1283 are binding only on administrators of public juridic persons.[108] This seems entirely appropriate. Taking an oath before an ordinary and filing an inventory in the curial archive would be inconsistent with the relative autonomy of a private juridic person. Moreover, the administrators to whom canon 1283 refers seem clearly to be the same as those referred to in canon 1282, which is explicitly directed to administrators of ecclesiastical goods.

Canon 1284 begins with the words "All administrators," raising yet again the issue first raised in canon 1280 as to whether the canon is intended to apply only to administrators of public juridic persons or to all administrators of juridic persons, private as well as public. No explicit mention is made of private juridic persons (as, e.g., in cc. 1265, §1 and 1267, §1); the doubt concerns whether they are implicitly included in the reference to "all" administrators. The parallel canon in the 1917 code made explicit reference to administrators of ecclesiastical goods;[109] this phrase has been omitted in the 1983 code. It is not clear if the omission was made in order to extend the canon to cover private juridic persons, or simply because the words were seen as superfluous in view of an intention that canon 1284 should be considered part of a cluster of canons beginning with canon 1282, or even 1279, both of which make explicit the application only to public juridic persons.

[108] The parallel canon in the 1917 code (CIC 1522) explicitly applied to administrators of ecclesiastical goods "referred to in the preceding canon," namely, those appointed by the local ordinary to serve as administrators of ecclesiastical goods where no administrator had otherwise been provided (CIC 1521). The principal focus of CIC 1521, §2 was on lay men appointed to serve as administrators. Early in the revision process, it was decided to omit the phrase "referred to in the preceding canon" so that what was to become c. 1283 would apply to "administrators in general." Comm 5 (1973) 98. It is unclear whether "administrators in general" was intended only to mean clerical as well as lay, or those serving pursuant to law or statute as well as those appointed by a local ordinary, or was intended also to include administrators of private as well as public juridic persons. The promulgated text contains nothing to suggest its application to private juridic persons, and therefore, in accord with c. 1257, it is here interpreted to apply only to public juridic persons.

Nearly all of the provisions of canon 1284 are nothing more than commonly recognized principles of sound administration, and, on that basis, would be as applicable to private as to public juridic persons. But paragraph two, number six, requiring the consent of the ordinary for the investment of surplus funds, seems too close an involvement with hierarchical authority for a private juridic person (whose distinguishing feature, when compared with a public juridic person, is greater autonomy), especially since the effect of investment is to stabilize funds, making them part of stable patrimony the alienation of which is subject to regulatory norms only in the case of public juridic persons (see commentary on c. 1291). Also, in requiring the consent of the ordinary, paragraph two, number six makes clear that the words "all administrators," with which canon 1284 begins, cannot literally mean "all," since it clearly does not include administrators who are ordinaries. Moreover, paragraph two, number two makes explicit reference to ecclesiastical goods, and paragraph two, number three uses the word "church" in the specialized meaning given in canon 1258, which restricts it to public juridic persons. While it is arguable that only these two subparagraphs, because of their explicit references, are limited to administrators of public juridic persons, leaving all the other subparagraphs to apply to administrators of private juridic persons as well, there seems to be no sufficient reason for supposing the legislator thought the duties of paragraph two, numbers two and three important only for public juridic persons, while thinking the other duties important for private juridic persons as well. It seems more reasonable to conclude that the references to ecclesiastical goods in paragraph two, numbers two and three are indicative of the intended scope of the entire canon. As with canon 1280, doubt regarding the technical applicability of the provisions of canon 1284 to private juridic persons would seem resolvable, pending authentic interpretation, by the application of canon 14, leading to the conclusion that the provisions of canon 1284 are not, at the present time, canonically binding on private juridic persons.[110]

As noted above, the provisions of canon 1284 are, for the most part, basic dictates of sound financial administration. Most are self-explanatory; only a few warrant a word or two of comment. Notwithstanding the Church's claim of independence from civil authority in regard to temporal goods (c. 1254), administrators of ecclesiastical goods are enjoined to employ civilly valid methods of ownership (§2, 2°) and to observe all relevant civil laws so that no harm ensues to a public juridic person from nonobservance of such laws (§2, 3°). This confirms the need for a nuanced understanding of the independence claimed by the Church in regard to temporal goods (see commentary on c. 1254). Administrators are also enjoined to observe the intentions of founders and donors (§2, 3°, 4°), a concern of paramount importance repeatedly emphasized throughout the code.[111]

[109] CIC 1523.

[110] In the Latin text of the Eastern code, all the canons in the chapter dealing with administration (CCEO 1022–1033) make explicit reference to ecclesiastical goods. This is of minimal relevance in interpreting the 1983 code, however, since in the Eastern code there is no division of juridic persons into public and private.

[111] See footnote 66 above.

Whereas an earlier draft of paragraph two, number five had called for the payment of the principal (translated as "capital debt") due on a loan or mortgage as soon as possible,[112] the promulgated canon wisely substitutes "in a timely manner," thereby recognizing the economic prudence of retaining a debt at advantageous interest rates rather than, in order to pay the debt, sacrificing capital which may be invested at a higher rate of return. Investment of surplus funds remaining after payment of expenses requires consent of the relevant ordinary, diocesan or religious (§2, 6°). This requirement, like the others in canon 1284, is for liceity, there being nothing to indicate the contrary (see c. 10); but the statutes, or in their absence the diocesan bishop, could declare investment over a certain amount to be an act of extraordinary administration (c. 1281, §2), in which case failure to obtain a faculty from the ordinary would canonically invalidate the investment (c. 1281, §1). By investment is here meant a long-term investment sufficient to make the funds part of stable patrimony (see commentary on c. 1291), not deposits in savings accounts or short-term certificates of deposit.

Annual budgets, recommended but left to particular law to require and regulate (§3), are in fact required by the code in the case of one administrator, namely, the diocesan bishop; an annual budget of diocesan income and expenditures is to be prepared by the diocesan finance council according to the directions of the diocesan bishop (c. 493). All budgeting in the Church should be done, not just with a view to increasing income, meeting expenditures, and providing for unforeseen circumstances, but also in the light of the demands of social justice (see c. 1286) and in the light of one of the principal purposes of raising funds in the Church, namely, to be able to perform the works of charity toward the needy (see c. 1254, §2).[113]

[112] Comm 5 (1973) 98.

[113] Roche, 326–328.

Charitable Donations by Administrators

Canon 1285 — Within the limits of ordinary administration only, administrators are permitted to make donations for purposes of piety or Christian charity from movable goods which do not belong to the stable patrimony.

This is an instance where the force of the Latin is lost in English translation. The Latin fas est administratoribus, translated "administrators are permitted," is stronger than mere permission; fas connotes a religiously based right or responsibility. It can be translated "it is lawful," but with the connotation of lawful by divine command as distinguished from lawfulness by human command or right (ius est).

Canon 1285 recalls one of the principal purposes for the acquisition of material goods by the Church, namely, to give them away in acts of charity to the poor (see commentary on 1254, §2). The canon in effect places upon administrators the responsibility to fulfill this purpose by acts of piety and charity.[114]

The canon does limit charitable gifts by administrators to movable goods which are not part of stable patrimony and which are within the limits of ordinary administration. Movable goods are best understood as all temporal goods, tangible or intangible (e.g., securities), which are not immovable; the latter are land, buildings, and fixtures attached to the land (e.g., trees, shrubs, fences, large statues, sheds). The notion of stable patrimony is explained in the commentary on canon 1291. The limits of ordinary administration are to be defined in the statutes or, if the statutes are silent in this regard, by the diocesan bishop, after consulting [114] The parallel canon in the 1917 code (CIC 1535), located among the canons restricting alienation, was negative in tone, prohibiting gifts other than small amounts according to local custom unless there was an intervening just cause, and providing that successors could reclaim unjustified donations. The parallel canon in the Eastern code is similarly negative in tone, though it does not provide for reclamation of unjustified donations (CCEO 1029).

his finance council, for public juridic persons subject to him (c. 1281, §2).

Nothing is expressed in canon 1285 to suggest that its provisions apply to private juridic persons, and hence, in accord with canon 1257, §2, they do not. A similar canon applies to religious institutes (c. 640).

Social Justice

Canon 1286 — Administrators of goods:

1° in the employment of workers are to observe meticulously also the civil laws concerning labor and social policy, according to the principles handed on by the Church;

2° are to pay a just and decent wage to employees so that they are able to provide fittingly for their own needs and those of their dependents.

This is one of several canons in the code intended to give practical effect in the life of the Church to the social teaching of the magisterium as developed in preconciliar, conciliar, and postconciliar documents (see also cc. 222, §2; 287, §1; 528, §1; 747, §2; and 768, §2).[115] Canon 1286, 1° in effect calls upon church administrators to follow meticulously the teachings of the Church as well as the provisions of civil law regarding labor and social policy. It is regrettable that this meaning of the canon is somewhat obscured both by an awkward word order in the Latin text and by the English translation.

The translation accurately reflects the word order in the Latin text which refers first to civil law and then to church principles, a curious alignment of priorities for a Church that, in the opening canon of Book V, declares its independence from civil authority. The word order can give the erroneous impression that the principal articulation of the demands of social justice is to be found in the provisions of civil law rather than in the teachings of the Church. The sad truth is that in most if not all nations, including the United States, many people live and work in social and economic conditions far below the level demanded by the dignity of the human person as taught by the Church, and they do so despite the existence of civil laws ostensibly designed to further social justice. Meticulous conformity to civil laws that fall short of serving the fullness of social justice is hardly the measure of institutional behavior sought by the law of the Church. That is why in canon 1286, 1° observance of civil law is joined to fulfillment of the principles of social justice taught by the Church.[116]

[115] Leading magisterial documents include Leo XIII, ency Rerum Novarum, ASS 23 (1890–1891) 641; Pius X, mp Fin Dalla Prima, ASS 36 (1903–1904) 339; Pius XI, ency Quadragesimo Anno, AAS 23 (1931) 177, ency Divini Redemptoris, AAS 29 (1937) 65; Pius XII, ency Sertum Laetitiae, AAS 31 (1939) 635, 1941 Pentecost Message, AAS 33 (1941) 195, 1942 Christmas Message, AAS 35 (1943) 9, alloc To Italian Workers, AAS 35 (1943) 171, alloc Questa Grande Vostra Adunata, AAS 37 (1945) 284; John XXIII, ency Mater et Magistra, AAS 53 (1961) 401, ency Pacem in Terris, AAS 55 (1963) 257; Vatican II, Gaudium et spes, nn. 63–72, AAS 58 (1966) 1084–1094; Paul VI, ency Populorum Progressio, AAS 59 (1967) 257, aplett Octogesima Adveniens, AAS 63 (1971) 401; John Paul II, ency Redemptor Hominis, AAS 71 (1979) 257, ency Laborem Exercens, AAS 73 (1981) 577, ency Sollicitudo Rei Socialis, AAS 80 (1988) 513, ency Centesimus Annus, AAS 83 (1991) 793; Synod of Bishops, De Iustitia in Mundo, AAS 63 (1971) 923; NCCB, Economic Justice for All: Pastoral Letter on Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1986).

[116] The corresponding canon in the 1917 code made no reference to civil law, but was markedly more specific than the present canon in detailing what at the time were the Church's embryonic concerns for the welfare of employees (CIC 1524). The published legislative history of c. 1286, 1° is silent as to the reason for inserting the admonition to observe civil law. The explanation has been offered that, since 1917, secular legislation has developed sufficiently to make it possible for the law of the Church to refer to such legislation rather than offer a specific enumeration of canonical standards of social justice. CLSA, "Canonical Standards in Labor-Management Relations: A Report," J 47 (1987) 553, n. 20. The continuing inadequacy of the scope of social justice in civil legislation, however, makes it incumbent upon church employers to supplement their meticulous observance of civil law with equally meticulous observance of the more exacting demands of church teaching.

The uniquely valuable contribution of canon 1286, 1° is to remind church administrators that there are in the Church two sources of authentic guidance for appropriate behavior, the law and the magisterium. Neither is to be neglected. Administrators are called to look beyond the law, not only civil but canonical as well, to the teaching of the Church and conform their actions to its dictates and not just to those embodied in law.[117]

Unfortunately, this message may be clouded not only by the word order which can be misinterpreted as putting emphasis on meticulous observance of civil law, but also because of a translation that renders the Latin iuxta in its secondary meaning of "according to" rather than in its primary meanings of "alongside" or "immediately after" (from which is derived the English word "juxtapose"). The result is a translation which enjoins church administrators to observe civil laws "according to the principles handed on by the Church" instead of "alongside (or together with) the principles handed on by the Church." To speak of meticulous observance of civil law "according to the principles handed on by the Church" reduces church teaching to the role of placing occasional limitations upon the obligations of civil law,[118] as in the commonplace restriction that no one is bound to observe a civil law that is contrary to divine law, rather than recognizing in church teaching additional positive demands which transcend the content of civil law and which, on that account, must be followed by church employers as an affirmative duty.[119]

During the revision process efforts were made to expand the reference in canon 1286, 2° to a just and decent wage so that it would go beyond simply meeting necessitates (benignly translated as "needs"). It was recommended that reference be made to wages sufficient to enable employees and their families to enjoy not just the bare necessities of life, but the benefits of social and cultural life as well, and recommendations were made to add to the canon still other aspects of the betterment of the condition of workers.[120] Expansion beyond "necessities" was rejected, however, on the ground that the economic condition of many church entities could not sustain such an approach.[121] The approach, however, is part of the teaching of the Church;[122] even if not expressed in law, it cannot justifiably be ignored in practice by church administrators.

A particular cause of tension in some nations is the effort of church employees to exercise their human right to form labor unions or otherwise organize in order collectively to protect their interests. The teaching of the Church affirming such a right is clear, nowhere more so than in the conciliar document Gaudium et spes:

> Among the basic rights of the human person must be counted the right of freely founding labor unions. These unions should be truly able to represent the workers and to contribute to the proper arrangement of economic life. Another such right is that of tak-

[117] Brief but useful studies of the code's treatment of social justice in the context of the teachings of the Church may be found in T. Grant, "Social Justice in the 1983 Code of Canon Law: An Examination of Selected Canons," J 49 (1989) 112–145; D. Hermann, "The Code of Canon Law Provisions on Labor Relations," J 44 (1984) 153–193.

[118] The phrase is so interpreted in Grant, 134; Myers, in CLSA Com, 877.

[119] Other English translations of c. 1286, 1° also render iuxta as "according to." See CLSA Com, CLSGBI Com, Pamplona ComEng. The Eastern code replaces iuxta with secundum, the primary meaning of which is "after, behind, in the second place," which effectively accords appropriate priority to Church teachings by enjoining administrators to observe civil law after, or secondarily to, the principles handed down by the Church; the English translation, however, renders secundum as "according to" (CCEO 1030, 1°).

[120] Comm 12 (1980) 420.

[121] Rel 287. Though efforts to go beyond a wage sufficient to meet "necessities" failed in the drafting of c. 1286, explicit mention of pension, health, and social security benefits is included in c. 231, §2. See also the commentary on c. 1274.

[122] See, e.g., GS 67.

ing part freely in the activity of these unions without risk of reprisal.[123]

Resistance to the exercise of these rights cannot be justified on the ground that relevant civil law does not extend its jurisdiction to include employer-employee relationships in church-related enterprises. Church administrators should be motivated by the teaching of the Church to transcend the confines of civil law.[124]

Accountability

Canon 1287 — §1. Both clerical and lay administrators of any ecclesiastical goods whatever which have not been legitimately exempted from the power of governance of the diocesan bishop are bound by their office to present an annual report to the local ordinary who is to present it for examination by the finance council; any contrary custom is reprobated.

§2. According to norms to be determined by particular law, administrators are to render an account to the faithful concerning the goods offered by the faithful to the Church.

The focus of this canon is on administrators' accountability to ecclesiastical authority and to other members of the faithful. The canon explicitly refers to ecclesiastical goods and to both clerical and lay administrators of ecclesiastical goods which have not been exempted from the power of governance of the diocesan bishop. The juxtaposition of the references to lay administrators and to goods subject to the power of governance of the diocesan bishop has unavoidable implications for the meaning of lay cooperation in the exercise of the power of governance (see c. 129; see also commentary on c. 1273). While religious institutes of pontifical right are subject to the diocesan bishop in works of the apostolate (c. 678, §1), the bishop's power of governance does not extend to temporal goods owned by a religious institute; no report need be made to the local ordinary by such religious in regard to the administration of the institute's assets.[125]

Receiving an annual report is one of the elements of an ordinary's supervision of the administration of goods belonging to public juridic persons subject to him (see commentary on c. 1276). Transmission of the report to the finance council serves the values of having the details of financial administration examined by those whose expertise qualifies them to discern and call to the local ordinary's attention both commendable and troublesome aspects, and of freeing the local ordinary from having to take time from other duties to make such an examination himself. The reprobation of contrary customs has the canonical effect of rendering such customs unreasonable and, hence, incapable of obtaining the force of law (c. 24, §2).

The second paragraph of canon 1287 remits to norms of particular law the rendering of an account to the faithful concerning offerings made by the faithful to a public juridic person (the specialized meaning given by c. 1258 to the word "church" as used in Book V). It is not just the manner of reporting, but the very rendering of a report at all that is left up to particular law.[126] Accordingly, paragraph two does not speak of an annual report as does paragraph one.

During the revision process, unsuccessful efforts were made to expand the scope of this report

[123] GS 68. See also John XXIII, Mater et Magistra, AAS 53 (1961) 425–426; John Paul II, Laborem Exercens, n. 20, AAS 73 (1981) 629–632; NCCB, Economic Justice for All, n. 353.

[124] See Hermann, 190–193; CLSA, "Canonical Standards," 557–563.

[125] A 1972 reply from SCRIS declared religious associations of pontifical right, and their provincial and individual houses, not subject to the reporting requirements of the 1917 code's less precisely worded parallel canon (CIC 1525). CLD 9 (1983) 911. Reference in c. 1287 to goods which are not "exempted from the power of governance of the diocesan bishop" is apparently designed to incorporate into the revised code the content of that reply.

[126] Rel 287.

to include an account not just of offerings from the faithful but of all the financial holdings of the public juridic person, including returns on investments, sales of property, and other sources of income. Such a broad scope, while considered praiseworthy in certain circumstances, was judged to be unwise in circumstances where the faithful may not be sufficiently educated in the propriety of the Church's possession of material goods.[127] A far less cynical view characterizes the broader accountability provisions in the fund-raising guidelines issued several years ago by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States (see commentary on c. 1262).

Lawsuits in Civil Courts

Canon 1288 — Administrators are neither to initiate nor to contest litigation in a civil forum in the name of a public juridic person unless they have obtained the written permission of their own ordinary.

Civil litigation involving church-related entities raises both problems and opportunities, not just for the entities involved but also for the particular church or institute of consecrated life of which the church-related litigant is a part, and, at times, for the Church itself at a national or international level. Litigation involving church-related entities is nearly always accompanied by publicity; the resolution of issues in one case often has implications for other situations not yet litigated; and in a common-law nation, such as the United States, the precedent-setting nature of court decisions can have long-range effects that transcend the interests of present litigants. These among other considerations underlie the wisdom of requiring permission of one's ordinary (diocesan or religious) before initiating or contesting litigation in civil court. The canon is explicitly applicable only to administrators of public juridic persons, consistent with the greater autonomy of private juridic persons, but, for the reasons just given, administrators of private juridic persons would evidence appropriate ecclesial sensitivity if they consulted their ordinaries before reaching a decision on a course of action involving civil litigation.

An earlier draft of canon 1288 had also required public juridic persons to obtain permission from the ordinary of the place where the litigation was to occur.[128] Such a provision seemed wise, especially from the point of view of the local publicity likely to be generated by the litigation, but the provision was dropped from the final text with no reason given in the published legislative history.[129]

Civil litigation does not give rise only to problems; it also affords the Church opportunities. Apart from the possibilities of vindicating rights and putting an end to discrimination and various forms of injustice, litigation affords the Church in common-law nations such as the United States the opportunity actively to participate in the making of the law of the land. Common law is primarily judicial in nature; the courts, not the legislatures, are the ultimate architects of the law. In the United States, enactments of legislatures are subject to the courts not only for definitive interpretation and application but also for ultimate determination of validity and constitutionality. To be true to its heritage of active participation in the forging of Church-State relationships, and in the development of value-oriented law, the Church in the United States belongs in the courts where the law is ultimately determined. The route to appellate courts is through trial courts, and ordinaries whose permission is sought in accord with canon 1288 would be well advised to consider the long-range benefits, and not just the short-term disadvantages, of involvement in civil litigation.

[127] Comm 12 (1980) 421.

[128] Comm 5 (1973) 99; 12 (1980) 421.

[129] Comm 12 (1980) 421. The parallel canon in the 1917 code had required permission of the local ordinary or, in an urgent case, from the dean (CIC 1526).

Abandonment of Duty by Administrators

Canon 1289 — Even if not bound to administration by the title of an ecclesiastical office, administrators cannot relinquish their function on their own initiative; if the Church is harmed from an arbitrary withdrawal, moreover, they are bound to restitution.

Although for many public juridic persons (e.g., dioceses and parishes) administrators of temporal goods are designated by law and, for many others, by statute, lawful custom, or appointment by an ordinary (see c. 1279), there are instances where the functions of an administrator are fulfilled by persons not so designated who, either voluntarily or in response to a request from some office-holder, undertake such functions. The care of real estate, the maintenance of buildings, the keeping of accounts, managing investment portfolios, supervising the work of employees, and a host of other activities are often performed by such "unofficial" administrators who render invaluable service to church entities. Based on long experience, the Church seeks in canon 1289 to remind all administrators, including unofficial ones, that once they have undertaken to fulfill administrative responsibilities, they have an obligation not to abandon them suddenly without affording appropriate authorities ample opportunity to arrange for others to assume the responsibilities. Sudden interruption in the stewardship of temporal goods can result in grave harm, for which the canon holds responsible the administrator, even an unofficial one, upon whom reliance had justifiably been placed and whose arbitrary withdrawal occasioned the harm. The requirement of restitution in such a case is a specific application of the general norm of canon 128. In accord with canon 1258, use of the word "church" in this canon has the canonical effect of restricting its application to public juridic persons. The moral principle underlying the canon, however, would apply as well to private juridic persons.

TITLE III
CONTRACTS AND ESPECIALLY ALIENATION
[cc. 1290–1298]

Contracts play a large and important role in the financial life of the Church. This title begins with an extensive though not unlimited canonization of civil law in regard to contracts (c. 1290). Canonical limitations on the canonization of civil law occur chiefly in regard to contracts involving transfer of ownership, known canonically as alienation (cc. 1291–1294). Such limitations also occur in regard to transactions which pose risk of harm to the overall financial condition of a public juridic person (c. 1295), and in regard to leasing (c. 1297). Directives are given for handling situations where a canonically invalid alienation is civilly valid (c. 1296), and regarding the sale or lease of ecclesiastical goods to administrators or family members of administrators of such goods (c. 1298).

Limited Canonization of Civil Law

Canon 1290 — The general and particular provisions which the civil law in a territory has established for contracts and their disposition are to be observed with the same effects in canon law insofar as the matters are subject to the power of governance of the Church unless the provisions are contrary to divine law or canon law provides otherwise, and without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1547.

Stewardship of temporal goods often involves entering into and fulfilling the terms of contracts of various kinds. Some, like those for the routine payment of salaries, purchase of supplies, or maintenance of real estate, usually fall within the sphere of ordinary administration; others, not routine and involving larger sums of money, are often designated as acts of extraordinary administration (see cc. 1277, 1281); still others fall into the categories of alienation or related transactions (see cc. 1291, 1295).

Rather than enact its own norms regarding capacity to contract, mutuality of obligations, requisite formalities, and other aspects of contractual transactions, the Church elects to adopt (canonize) the provisions of civil law applicable in the territory, except where such provisions are contrary to divine law or canon law provides otherwise. Contracts involving church-related entities or institutions rarely contain provisions explicitly contrary to divine law but could do so implicitly, especially in areas such as health care and education where, in nations such as the United States, governmental regulatory provisions are required to be incorporated by reference into many contracts. Some regulatory provisions are designed to protect constitutionally protected but, according to the teaching of the Church, morally objectionable civil rights in such areas as medical procedures or services, or are designed to implement public policies which, according to church teaching, are violative of social justice or other moral requirements.[130] Contractual provisions which are explicitly or implicitly contrary to divine law are, of course, not canonized and are not enforceable in ecclesiastical tribunals.

Other exceptions to the canonization of secular contract law derive from express provisions of canon law, notably those which govern acts of extraordinary administration (see cc. 1277, 1281), alienation (cc. 1291–1294) and related transactions (c. 1295), and leasing (c. 1297). For the most part, the canons do not so much contradict provisions of civil law as they add requirements (e.g., consultation, consent, permission) to those of civil law; it is principally in that sense that they constitute exceptions to the canonization of the provisions of civil law.

In at least one regard, however, a canonical provision does contradict the civil law of many nations, and that is the directive in canon 1547, referred to in canon 1290, that in ecclesiastical tribunals proof by the testimony of witnesses, under the supervision of the judge, is always admissible. Civil laws, including those in the United States, often require documentary proof of the existence and terms of some kinds of contracts (e.g., the purchase and sale of real estate). Under the 1917 code, the question arose and remained a subject of controversy as to whether or not the canonization of the civil law of contracts included the procedural requirement of written proof where such a requirement existed in civil law. The 1983 code resolves the controversy by the explicit reference in canon 1290 to canon 1547 which allows proof by means of witnesses in all cases.[131]

The canonization of secular contract law in canon 1290 would seem to place upon professional canonists a responsibility to become reasonably familiar with the basics of the secular legal system under which they live, and in particular its approach to the law of contracts, in order more effectively to cooperate with civil attorneys representing dioceses, parishes, and church-related institutions. Conversely, it would seem to be in the best interests of such entities for their civil attorneys to become familiar with the canonical exceptions to the canonization of the civil law of contracts that are set forth in the following canons.

Restricted Alienation

Canon 1291 — The permission of the authority competent according to the norm of law is required for the valid alienation of goods which constitute by legitimate designation the stable patrimony of a public juridic person and whose value exceeds the sum defined by law.

The Latin verb alienare means "to make something another's." Alienation of temporal goods is the transfer of ownership. Ownership may be total (as in fee simple ownership of real estate) or partial (as in a life estate or a remainder interest in real estate); alienation is a transfer of either total [130] See W. Bassett, "A Note on the Law of Contracts and the Canonical Integrity of Public Benefit Religious Organizations," CLSAP 59 (1997) 63–67.

[131] See Comm 12 (1980) 427–428.

or partial ownership. It is effected nearly always by sale, gift, or exchange.[132]

As a juridic act, alienation differs radically from administration. Acts of administration, either ordinary or extraordinary, have as their purpose the preservation, proper use, improvement, or enhanced productivity of temporal goods; acts of alienation have as their purpose the termination of ownership. While many commentators on the 1917 code classified alienation as an act of extraordinary administration, they did so because of the particular wording of that code;[133] alienation in the 1983 code, which in this regard is worded more precisely, has been deliberately and appropriately categorized differently (see commentary on cc. 1254, §1; 1277)[134] and is governed by norms that differ from the norms that govern acts of extraordinary administration.

Since alienation is the transfer of ownership, there is no alienation if no transfer of ownership takes place. Mortgaging property is not an act of alienation. A mortgage gives rise to rights in regard to property, and creates the potential of a future loss of ownership in the event of default in payments on the loan for which the mortgage serves as collateral, but there is no immediate transfer of ownership and, hence, no alienation. The same is true of assuming a mortgage when purchasing property which already has a mortgage on it. Granting a right of way or an easement to come across or otherwise use one's land, since it does not involve a transfer of ownership, is not an act of alienation.[135] Nor is leasing, or granting an option to purchase one's property, or borrowing or loaning sums of money with or without collateral, or refusing a gift.

None of these transactions entails a transfer of ownership by the initiator of the action. Many of these transactions, however, may constitute acts of extraordinary administration and thereby be subject to the norms governing such acts (see cc. 638, §1; 1277; 1281); and, under certain circumstances, many may fall into the category of transactions which endanger the patrimonial condition of a public juridic person and, on that account, be subject, according to canon 1295, to the norms governing alienation, even though the actions themselves are not acts of alienation. Since canon 1295 transactions are required to conform to the laws governing alienation, some authors refer to such transactions as alienation "in the broad sense" and to transfers of ownership as alienation "in the strict sense." While a basis for such a distinction existed in the 1917 code,[136] no basis for such a distinction exists in the 1983 code and, consequently, continuing to speak of alienation "in the broad sense" can lead to confusion and to canonical errors (see commentary on c. 1295). Clarity and canonical accuracy are best served by [132] Alienation may also result from the decision in an arbitration proceeding or the settlement in a conciliation proceeding (see c. 1715).

[133] Whereas the 1983 code speaks of four essential elements of ownership, namely, acquisition, retention, administration, and alienation (see cc. 1254, §1; 1255), the 1917 code spoke of only three, namely, acquisition, retention, and administration (see CIC 1495). Accordingly, without a category of its own, alienation was considered to be an act of extraordinary administration. See, e.g., Vromant, 162, 210; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 835. Even among the commentators on the 1917 code, however, the view was expressed that alienation and administration are two distinct juridic acts. See Cappello, 2:573.

[134] De Paolis, De Bonis Ecclesiae, 98; idem, I Beni Temporali, 149–150; 179, n. 1; 183–184; López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 792. See Comm 12 (1980) 396.

[135] If the easement also includes the right to remove minerals, timber, or other natural resources from the land, then, of course, the easement would entail alienation of such resources.

[136] Canon 1533 of the 1917 code, the antecedent of canon 1295 of the present code, provided that the norms governing acts of alienation must be followed not only in an alienation properly so called (proprie dicta) but also in any transaction which could worsen the condition of the moral person. The latter transactions became known among commentators as alienation improprie dicta or alienation in the broad sense. The modifier proprie dicta has been deleted in the 1983 code, thereby removing the textual basis for the confusing distinction between alienation in the strict sense and alienation in the broad sense.

confining use of the term "alienation" to transfers of ownership.

Confusion has also been caused by authors who suggest that a transfer of ownership from one public juridic person in the Church to another public juridic person is not alienation because the property remains "church property"; it is still the property of a public juridic person, albeit a different one, such authors say, and so the amount of church property in the world has not lessened. The purpose of the Church's laws restricting alienation, however, is not to maintain a reservoir of property dedicated to the work of the Church, as if that were the meaning of "church property" (see c. 1258), but rather to protect the economic viability and stability of each public juridic person by guarding against imprudent loss of temporal goods by any individual public juridic person in the Church.

A minority view under the 1917 code held that a transfer of property from one province of a religious institute to another province of the same institute should not be considered alienation because members of the same religious family are supposed to help each other and, hence, such a transfer should not be subject to the laws governing restricted alienation.[137] This view was contrary not only to the views of the vast majority of canonists but also to the practice of the Roman Curia.[138] The view still finds occasional expression today, however, and at times is expanded to include transfers from parishes to the diocese, especially in areas where civil-law ownership of church property has been vested in one corporation sole.[139] The view appears to confuse having a just cause, which is required for every act of alienation (c. 1293, §1, 1°), with not being in the category of restricted alienation at all, as if only unjustified transfers of ownership were subject to the laws governing alienation. Such a view misunderstands the meaning of alienation and the purpose of the Church's laws governing it (see commentary on c. 1293, §1).

In addressing issues of alienation, it is important to keep in mind the true stance of the Church in regard to it. Contrary to the beliefs of some church administrators who go to great lengths to avoid having a transaction regarded as alienation as if it were a prohibited evil, the code does not view alienation as always undesirable. At times it is highly desirable, even encouraged. One of the principal purposes for the acquisition of material possessions by the Church is to use them for or give them to the poor and needy (c. 1254, §2). Accordingly, alienation for purposes of charity is recommended (see cc. 640, 1285). Though not prohibited, and though often encouraged, alienation is nevertheless restricted at times. As canon 1291 directs, it is restricted when the property to be alienated is part of the lawfully designated stable patrimony of a public juridic person and of a value in excess of a legitimately established minimum.

Stable patrimony is all property, real or personal, movable or immovable, tangible or intangible, that, either of its nature or by explicit designation, is destined to remain in the possession of its owner for a long or indefinite period of time to afford financial security for the future. It is the opposite of free or liquid capital which is intended to be used to meet operating expenses or otherwise disposed of within a reasonably short period of time (within one or, at most, two years).

There are four general categories of stable patrimony: (1) real estate (land, buildings); (2) nonfungible personalty (tangible movable property that is not consumed in its use, such as automobiles, furniture, books); (3) long-term (over two years) investments in securities (stocks, bonds, treasury notes); (4) restricted funds, that is, funds, even if comprised of cash or short-term securities, that have been set aside for a specific purpose, [137] E. Regatillo, Institutiones Iuris Canonici, 6th ed. (Santander: Sal Terrae, 1961) 2:230.

[138] This was acknowledged by Regatillo himself (ibid.). See also Cappello, 2:583; Vermeersch-Creusen, 2: 594–595; S. Sipos, Enchiridion Iuris Canonici, 7th ed. (Rome: Herder, 1960) 697.

[139] See F. Morrisey, "The Conveyance of Ecclesiastical Goods," CLSAP 38 (1976) 129; idem, "The Alienation of Temporal Goods in Contemporary Practice," Stud Can 29 (1995) 307. For a brief description of the corporation sole, see commentary on c. 1256.

such as pension funds or certain building or educational funds. As a general rule, these four categories of assets are intended to afford reliable security for the future, enabling a juridic person to continue to serve the purposes for which it was created.[140] They are said to be immobilized, stabilized, frozen; they are what is meant by "stable patrimony." Cash and its equivalents (e.g., checking and regular savings accounts, short-term certificates of deposit, securities to be held only for a short term), on the other hand, are considered to be liquid or free capital; it is intended that they be consumed in their use within a relatively short period of time (e.g., to meet operating expenses) and, hence, they are not stable patrimony.

Alienation is restricted, according to canon 1291, when the ecclesiastical goods to be alienated are part of the legitimately designated stable patrimony. "Legitimate designation" can be explicit or implicit. It is implicit when the property is of such a nature that ordinarily it is acquired with the intention of retaining it for a long or indefinite period of time; in such cases, the act of acquisition implicitly designates the property as part of the stable patrimony.[141] Classic examples of property implicitly designated as stable patrimony are parcels of land, buildings, books, and fine furniture. Rarely are such assets acquired by public juridic persons in the Church without an intention to retain ownership of them indefinitely. On occasion, however, such an asset, a parcel of land for example, could be acquired not to be held for future use or to be developed over a long period of time, but with a view toward a quick resale; in such a circumstance, the asset could be explicitly designated as not part of stable patrimony. Absent such an explicit designation, the parcel of land would implicitly be allocated to stable patrimony by virtue of the kind of asset it is.

When assets are acquired which of their nature are not usually retained indefinitely (e.g., cash, some categories of stocks or bonds), they become part of stable patrimony only by explicit designation by the administrator of the acquiring public juridic person as happens, for example, when such assets are allocated to pension funds or other restricted funds or portfolios.[142] Without such explicit designation, such assets would not be part of stable patrimony and, hence, not subject to the norms governing restricted alienation. Sound administration dictates that assets belonging to stable patrimony should be clearly identified in the up-to-date inventory required by canon 1283, 2°, 3°.[143]

Alienation, then, is restricted when the property to be alienated is the property of a public juridic person which, by legitimate designation either explicit or implicit, is stable patrimony, and the value of which exceeds a determined amount. In addition to delineating these prerequisites for restricted alienation, canon 1291 sets forth the first of the restrictions, namely, the invalidating requirement of permission of competent authority. Alienation is one of two instances in the code where permission, which ordinarily is required only for liceity, is said to be required for validity.[144] The reference to competent authority is in need of further specification, as is the determined amount above which permission is required for validity; both items receive further specification in the following canon.

Canon 1292 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 638, §3, when the value of the goods whose alienation is proposed falls within the min-

140 See Rovera, 277; Schouppe, 131; Aznar Gil, 408; J. Mantecón, in Com Ex IV/1, 154; Périsset, 199–200; De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 185–188.

141 See Schouppe, 132; De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 187.

142 Explicit designation to stable patrimony may be pursuant to the intention of founders or donors, or may be dictated by provisions in the statutes of a juridic person. Schouppe, 132; Mantecón, in Com Ex IV/1, 154; De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 187.

143 Périsset, 199, 200.

144 Canons requiring permission for the validity of alienation (and other transactions subject to the norms governing alienation) include, in addition to c. 1291, cc. 638, §3; 1190, §2; 1292, §2. The other instance where permission is said to be required for validity concerns the acceptance of a non-autonomous pious foundation (c. 1304, §1).

imum and maximum amounts to be defined by the conference of bishops for its own region, the competent authority is determined by the statutes of juridic persons if they are not subject to the diocesan bishop; otherwise, the competent authority is the diocesan bishop with the consent of the finance council, the college of consultors, and those concerned. The diocesan bishop himself also needs their consent to alienate the goods of the diocese.

§2. The permission of the Holy See is also required for the valid alienation of goods whose value exceeds the maximum amount, goods given to the Church by vow, or goods precious for artistic or historical reasons.

§3. If the asset to be alienated is divisible, the parts already alienated must be mentioned when seeking permission for the alienation; otherwise the permission is invalid.

§4. Those who by advice or consent must take part in alienating goods are not to offer advice or consent unless they have first been thoroughly informed both of the economic state of the juridic person whose goods are proposed for alienation and of previous alienations.

The first concern of canon 1292 is to afford some specification to the preceding canon's reference to a "sum defined by law." It does so by calling for a two-tiered sum, a minimum and a maximum, to be established according to the principle of subsidiarity by each episcopal conference and legitimately promulgated after having been reviewed by the Apostolic See (see c. 455, §2). For all religious institutes the maximum amount is to be determined by the Holy See (c. 638, §3); the minimum amount, however, since religious institutes are bound by the norms of Book V except where expressly provided otherwise (c. 635, §1), is that set by the episcopal conference for its region, there being no provision to the contrary for religious.[145]

The amounts promulgated for various nations may be found among their published complementary norms.[146] In the United States the current maximum amount, promulgated after review by the Holy See, is three million dollars.[147] Technically, no minimum amount has been promulgated after review by the Holy See but, as a matter of practice, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops regards $500,000 as the currently operative minimum amount.[148] In establishing the minimum amount, [145] De Paolis argues that canon 683, §3 leaves the determination of the minimum amount to the proper law of each religious institute (I Beni Temporali, 190). While his argumentation is interesting, it is difficult to reconcile his position with the wording of c. 638, §3 which, unlike c. 638, §1, makes no mention of proper law. Moreover, allowing proper law to determine the minimum would result in religious institutes within the same region having minimums that differ not only from each other but from other public juridic persons in the region, a result the Holy See appears not to favor in regard to the maximum since it is the practice of the Holy See to set the same maximum for religious as has been set by the episcopal conference for others. Also, allowing proper law to determine the minimum, rather than holding religious to the minimum set for each region by the episcopal conference, would result in international religious institutes being bound by one uniform minimum despite wide economic discrepancies between different regions of the world.

[146] See "Canon 1292. Particular Legislation: The Determination of Minimum and Maximum Amounts for Alienation," CLD 11, 308–314; "Complementary Norms to the Code Promulgated by English-Language Conferences of Bishops," in Pamplona ComEng, 1312, 1332, 1341, 1353, 1363, 1390, 1407, 1415; J. Martín de Agar, Legislazione delle Conferenze Episcopali Complementare al C.I.C., passim.

[147] NCCB, Decree of Promulgation, May 24, 1993. This decree was issued subsequent to the April 1991 publication of the volume of complementary norms by the NCCB. A brief history of earlier NCCB action in regard to canon 1292 may be found in the published volume, NCCB-CompNm 22–24. A fuller history may be found in RR (1982) 30–34 and RR (1986) 41–42.

[148] NCCB-CompNm 23. In 1985, the NCCB requested from the Holy See recognitio of a five-million-dollar maximum and a minimum of $500,000. The Holy See rejected the five-million-dollar maximum, insisting upon a maximum of one million dollars. In its reply the Holy See made no mention of the $500,000 minimum which had been requested in relation to the five-million-dollar maximum but simply stated that the minimum it is important for episcopal conferences to keep in mind that the minimum they set is not just for alienations of diocesan property by diocesan bishops, but also for alienations by parishes, religious institutes, and all other public juridic persons within the territory of the episcopal conference. Below the minimum, the Church's norms restricting alienation of stable patrimony by public juridic persons, such as parishes, do not apply. One may wonder if the episcopal conference in the United States had this in mind when approving a minimum as high as $500,000.[149]

Under certain circumstances, when several assets owned by the same public juridic person are alienated, their individual values coalesce for the purpose of reaching the minimum or maximum levels. Three circumstances give rise to such coalescence: intention, time, and purpose. When the intention at the time of alienating the first asset is to alienate several assets (e.g., separate lots of land, paintings), though at different times, the total value of all the assets to be alienated must be used to determine at the time of the first alienation whether the minimum or maximum levels will be reached.[150] So, too, when two or more assets are alienated within a short period of time (one month or less), apart from any initial intention to do so, the separate alienations are considered to be morally one; as soon as the cumulative value of the separate assets reaches the minimum or maximum level, the required authorizations must be obtained for the canonical validity of the remaining alienations, even though, standing alone, the value of each remaining individual alienation would be below the minimum.[151] When various items are alienated for the same purpose (e.g., to finance the construction of a new building), their value coalesces regardless of how much time has elapsed between alienations and notwithstanding the absence of any initial expectation of having to alienate multiple assets. Thus, after some holdings have been alienated in order to finance construction, if additional costs arise making a further alienation necessary, the entire outlay, united by purpose, coalesces and the required authorizations must be obtained for the additional alienation even though, standing alone, it is below the minimum.[152]

The second concern of canon 1292 is to afford specification to the preceding canon's reference to "the authority competent according to the norm of law." It does so, first, by acknowledging the provisions of canon 638, §3 which include designation of the authorities competent to grant permission for alienation in religious institutes. Canon 1292, §1 then distinguishes public juridic persons subject to the diocesan bishop (e.g., parishes, cer-may be established in accord with c. 1292, §1. See NCCB-CompNm 22–23; RR (1986) 42; Pamplona ComEng, 1419, n.18. This would require a vote of the NCCB, with subsequent submission of the agreed upon minimum to the Holy See for recognitio. No further action in regard to a minimum has been taken by the NCCB, even when requesting (and receiving) the new maximum of three million dollars in 1993.

[149] By particular law in many dioceses of the United States, pastors are forbidden, without the permission of the diocesan bishop, to alienate parochial property valued in excess of an amount far below the minimum of $500,000. Rarely, however, do such particular laws contain language expressly invalidating alienations contrary to the law; without such language, prohibited alienations, although illict, are canonically valid (see c. 10). In a few dioceses, alienations in excess of an amount far below the minimum of $500,000 have been designated as acts of extraordinary administration with the result that such alienations, without a faculty from the ordinary, are thereby rendered invalid (see c. 1281, §1). In such cases, however, as in all cases of prohibited alienations below the minimum established by the episcopal conference, the consultations (of finance council, college of consultors, and interested parties) required by c. 1292, §1 for restricted alienations above the minimum, since not required below the minimum, are often omitted. While some diocesan bishops may view as desirable the absence of an obligation to consult, the underlying concerns in the law of the Church for expert advice, shared responsibility, and the rights of interested parties may be thwarted when an episcopal conference sets an excessively high minimum.

[150] See CLD 2, 447–448; Vromant, 260; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 844.

[151] See CLD 1, 731; López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 803.

[152] See Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 844–845.

tain diocesan foundations) from those not so subject (e.g., supradiocesan entities such as regional seminaries or national universities). For the latter, canon 1292, §1 remits to their statutes the designation of authorities competent to authorize alienations above the minimum level. For public juridic persons subject to the diocesan bishop, canon 1292, §1 designates as the authority competent to authorize alienations above the minimum level the diocesan bishop with the consent of the diocesan finance council, the college of consultors, and "those concerned" (e.g., founders, donors, beneficiaries, and others whose rights might be affected by the proposed alienation). The same threefold consent is required for valid alienations by the diocesan bishop of stable patrimony of the diocese above the minimum level.

For alienations above the maximum level (as determined by the episcopal conference in accord with c. 1292, §1 or by the Holy See in accord with c. 638, §3) by any public juridic person, whether subject to the diocesan bishop or not, the permission of the Holy See is required in addition to the permissions already required for alienations above the minimum level.[153] Permission of the Holy See is also required, regardless of monetary value, for the canonically valid alienation of goods considered precious for artistic or historical reasons or given to a public juridic person (the specialized meaning accorded the word "church" in c. 1258) in fulfillment of a vow. Canonical tradition has long regarded goods given pursuant to a vow as somehow sharing in the sacredness of a vow as a religious act, and for that reason as being directly subject to the authority of the Holy See. A similar concern for the sacred underlies the reservation to the Holy See of permission to alienate significant relics or other relics or images which are the objects of great veneration (see c. 1190).

In addition to the invalidating law requiring permission of competent authority, there is an additional requirement for the validity of an act of restricted alienation when the property to be alienated is divisible, that is, of such a nature that portions of it can be alienated separately (e.g., a library, a collection of paintings, a tract of land capable of being divided into separate lots). Canon 1292, §3 requires disclosure of previously alienated parts of divisible property; in the absence of such disclosure, permission to alienate a subsequent portion is invalid. The invalidating clause in paragraph three is a specification of the general norm found in canon 63, §1. The concern of the legislator is to prevent the bit-by-bit dissipation of valuable assets without the knowledge and approval of proper ecclesiastical authority.

Canon 1292, §4 sets forth the sensible directive that all whose advice (where statutes call for it) or consent is required are not to offer their advice or consent unless they have been thoroughly informed both of the overall financial condition of the public juridic person involved and of previous alienations of the juridic person's stable patrimony. The law seeks informed, not pro forma, advice and consent, and therefore calls for accurate and thorough information to be given, among others, to finance councils, colleges of consultors, interested parties, diocesan bishops, and the Holy See. While the directive of paragraph four refers explicitly only to consultation on the occasion of proposed alienation, the principle of informed consultation and consent is a principle of sound governance applicable, by analogy, to all situations of consultation (see also c. 127, §3).[154]

[153] When the Holy See is involved, the competent congregations are CICLSAL for institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, and CFC for all others (PB 108, 98). The congregations are particularly interested in knowing if all required consultations have taken place, if all necessary informed consents have been obtained, and if all other procedural requirements both for validity and liceity have been fulfilled. The interest of the congregations in the merits of a proposed alienation focuses chiefly on just cause, the adequacy of compensation, the continuing Catholic identity of an institution whose assets are being alienated, and the potential effect upon the financial security and pastoral mission of the alienating public juridic person.

[154] T. Green, "Shepherding the Patrimony of the Poor: Diocesan and Parish Structures of Financial Administration," J 56 (1997) 712.

Canon 1293 — §1. The alienation of goods whose value exceeds the defined minimum amount also requires the following:

1° a just cause, such as urgent necessity, evident advantage, piety, charity, or some other grave pastoral reason;

2° a written appraisal by experts of the asset to be alienated.

§2. Other precautions prescribed by legitimate authority are also to be observed to avoid harm to the Church.

Canon 1294 — §1. An asset ordinarily must not be alienated for a price less than that indicated in the appraisal.

§2. The money received from the alienation is either to be invested carefully for the advantage of the Church or to be expended prudently according to the purposes of the alienation.

In addition to the requirements for the validity of an act of restricted alienation, the code also prescribes requirements for the liceity of such an act. Canons 1293 and 1294 together contain five such requirements: just cause, appraisal by experts, alienation ordinarily not below appraisal, restricted use of proceeds, and observance of additional precautions prescribed by legitimate authority. Failure to comply leaves the transaction valid[155] but contrary to the law of the Church and, hence, subjects those responsible for the noncompliance to possible reprisals, including having to make restitution to the public juridic person for any resulting harm.[156]

The first of these requirements is the presence of a just cause. Essentially this means that the gain to the public juridic person must outweigh the loss of the portion of stable patrimony to be alienated. Ordinarily the gain is to be assessed in financial terms, but not always. Canon 1293, §1, 1° includes as examples of just causes such nonfinancial considerations as piety, charity, and serious pastoral concerns. Illustrative of the latter would be the desire on the part of the sponsor of a Catholic hospital to maintain a Catholic presence in institutional health care in a given locality by entering into a form of partnering or networking with a secular institution that involves alienation of assets canonically owned by the sponsor; monetary return to the sponsor in such a situation may be minimal but intangible justification may be found not only in securing the effective continuation of Catholic presence but also in the corporate witness given by the sponsor to charity and poverty (see c. 640).

Confusion has resulted from the expressed view that whenever prudence dictates that ownership of a particular piece of property should be relinquished (as, for example, where it is heavily taxed because it is not presently being used for religious, educational, or charitable purposes, or where expenses of maintaining the property far outweigh the revenues it produces), the laws restricting alienation do not apply and, hence, there is no need to obtain the requisite permissions or fulfill any of the other requirements for restricted alienation.[157] Such a view seems to assume that the presence of a justifying reason removes a transfer of ownership from the category of restricted alienation. As canon 1293, §1, 1° makes clear, however, a just cause is always necessary for an act of restricted alienation; it is one of the first items consultative bodies and ecclesiastical authorities should look for in a proposed alienation. It is never a justification for omitting consultation and ignoring the need to obtain authorization. Alienation is not the unjustified transfer of ownership; it must always be justified, since otherwise the requisite authorization cannot licitly be given.

Canon 1293, §1, 2° prescribes the second of the requirements for licit alienation, namely, writ-

[155] Nothing in cc. 1293 or 1294 either explicitly or implicitly suggests that any of their provisions affect validity; consequently, they do not (see c. 10).

[156] See cc.128; 1281, §3; and, by analogy, cc.1289 and 1296.

[157] See Morrisey, "The Conveyance of Ecclesiastical Goods," 130; idem, "The Alienation of Temporal Goods in Contemporary Practice," 308.

ten appraisal by experts of the value of the asset to be alienated. Use of the plural makes clear that appraisals should be obtained from at least two experts. The concern of the legislator is that judgments of administrators, consultative bodies, interested parties, and ecclesiastical authorities be informed judgments based on data and advice of the highest quality (see commentary on c. 1292, §4). Even when there is to be no monetary return, as in cases of alienation motivated by charity or other intangible concerns as noted above, expert appraisals must still be obtained to form part of the basis upon which to judge the appropriateness of the proposed alienation. Caution should be exercised in utilizing governmental valuations of property made for the purpose of assessing real estate or personal property taxes, since such valuations are often out of date or otherwise not in accord with present market value.

The requirement to obtain appraisals gives rise to the correlative requirement that assets ordinarily not be alienated for less than the lowest appraised amount. Obviously, whenever charity or some other pastoral motivation provides the justification for an alienation, attaining the appraised value will not be a consideration. So, too, ecclesial values such as precluding unethical future use of alienated property may dictate the sale of property to a purchaser whose ethical commitments are in accord with those of the Church even though the price being offered is less than the appraised value which could be obtained from a less ethically committed purchaser. Such considerations are illustrative of those which led to the insertion of the word "ordinarily" into canon 1294, §1.[158]

The fourth requirement for licit acts of restricted alienation concerns the disposition of the proceeds realized from the alienation. Canon 1294, §2 requires that, to the extent the proceeds are not expended for the purpose of the alienation (as, for example, if the alienation yields more than needed for payment of a debt for which the alienation had been authorized), the money received is to be reinvested into some form of stable patrimony of the public juridic person (the specialized meaning of the word "church" according to c. 1258). The law restricts alienation in order to protect the stable patrimony of a public juridic person; accordingly, canon 1294, §2 requires that all proceeds not expended for the authorized purpose of the alienation be returned by legitimate designation to stable patrimony.

The final requirement for the liceity of an act of restricted alienation acknowledges the possibility that particular circumstances of time or place may suggest that additional precautions be prescribed by legitimate authority; canon 1293, §2 requires that all such precautions be observed. Requiring that a proposed sale of real estate receive a certain measure of publicity in order to attract suitable offers,[159] or requiring collateral to secure the payment of future installments,[160] or the insertion of invalidating clauses into civil documents to assure comparable civil invalidity in the event of canonical invalidity[161] are illustrative of such additional precautions.

Other Restricted Transactions

Canon 1295 — The requirements of cann. 1291–1294, to which the statutes of juridic persons must also conform, must be observed not only in alienation but also in any transaction which can worsen the patrimonial condition of a juridic person.

The first concern of this canon, expressed in the subordinate clause, is to mandate conformity between the statutes of public juridic persons and the provisions of canons 1291–1294. This means that the statutes must either include the provisions of canons 1291–1294 or incorporate them by reference. Seemingly a strange requirement, since public juridic persons are bound by canons 1291–1294 whether or not their statutes make reference

[158] See Comm 5 (1973) 100; 12 (1980) 426.

[159] Aznar Gil, 411.

[160] Mantecón, in Com Ex IV/1, 162.

[161] Ibid., 163.

to them, the expressed purpose of the requirement is to ensure that failure to fulfill any of the invalidating requirements will render an attempted alienation not only canonically invalid but civilly invalid as well.[162] The laudable intent is to preclude situations where a canonically invalid transfer of ownership is civilly valid, thereby creating serious problems for the public juridic person whose property has been wrongfully alienated (see c. 1296).[163] Notwithstanding the laudable intent, attainment of the desired goal presupposes that the statutes of the Church's public juridic persons are civilly recognized, a premise not verified in many nations including the United States. In such nations, it is necessary to have canons 1291–1294 incorporated by reference in the relevant civil documents (in the United States, these would chiefly be the by-laws of corporations or particular forms of trust agreements). The effect of such incorporation by reference is to put all persons dealing with the entity or institution on notice that the canonical requirements, as well as the civil, must be met in order to have a civilly binding transaction. It is incumbent upon ecclesiastical authorities responsible for approving the statutes of public juridic persons (see commentary on c. 117) to see to it that the statutes do conform to canons 1291–1294,[164] and, where necessary to achieve the purpose of such conformity, that the appropriate civil documents conform also.

Although the view has been expressed that canon 1295 applies to private as well as public juridic persons,[165] such a view seems untenable. Canon 1257, §2 is clear that private juridic persons are not bound by the canons of Book V unless expressly so provided. There is nothing in the wording of canon 1295 that either explicitly or implicitly expresses an intention to include private juridic persons within its scope. Moreover, canon 1291 makes clear that the norms governing alienation found in canons 1291–1294 apply only to the stable patrimony of public juridic persons, and it is the chief purpose of canon 1295 to apply canons 1291–1294 to transactions other than alienation. That would seem to make clear that canon 1295 is similarly limited to public juridic persons. It is also noteworthy that the modifier "public," absent in canon 1295, is also absent in canons 1292–1294, though there can be no doubt that those canons, forming a cluster with canon 1291, apply only to public juridic persons. Canon 1295, explicitly referring to canons 1291–1294, seems clearly to be part of the same cluster. To hold otherwise is effectively to undermine the distinction, so pivotal throughout Book V, between the temporal goods of public juridic persons and those of private juridic persons.[166]

The second and principal concern of canon 1295 is to place restrictions upon another category of financial transactions, distinct from acts of alienation, which are of considerable importance in the life of the Church. Canon 1295 embraces a variety of contracts and other financial transactions whose common characteristic is the risk they pose to the overall economic well-being of a public juridic person. From the canonical point of view, economic well-being is rooted in stable patrimony, namely, in all property destined to remain in the possession of its owner for a long or indefinite period of time and, hence, property on which the financial future of a public juridic person depends (see commentary on c. 1291). That is the meaning of the "patrimonial condition" referred to in canon 1295.

Mortgaging a parcel of real estate or pledging valuable items of personal property as collateral to secure the repayment of a loan are often given as examples of canon 1295 transactions, as are granting easements, licenses, liens, or options to purchase, contracting to pay annuities, making unsecured loans, acting as guarantor or surety, transferring operational control of one's assets while retaining ownership, and incurring debts even if unsecured by collateral. Such a listing can

[162] Comm 12 (1980) 426.

[163] Périsset, 215–216; De Paolis, De Bonis Ecclesiae, 107; idem, I Beni Temporali, 197.

[164] Périsset, 216.

[165] Aznar Gil, 427–429.

[166] Mantecón, in Com Ex IV/1, 167.

be misleading, however, since each of the examples may or may not be a canon 1295 transaction depending upon the potential impact upon the overall patrimonial condition of the public juridic person. The application of canon 1295 is necessarily relative, depending upon both the degree of risk involved and the economic condition of the public juridic person. A debt that so burdens the stable patrimony of an inner-city parish as to threaten the future financial security of the parish may pose little or no risk to the future security of an affluent suburban parish. In the case of the inner-city parish, contracting such a debt would be a canon 1295 transaction, whereas in the case of the affluent parish it would not. What is placed at risk must be viewed in light of the total value of the patrimony in general.[167] That is the clear import of canon 1295.

To take another example of the inherent relativity of canon 1295, a mortgage in the contemporary world of finance, so far from always risking harm to economic stability, often enhances rather than endangers an organization's financial condition. Instead of paying construction or other costs with available surplus funds, it frequently is more advantageous to "use someone else's money" by borrowing what is needed to cover costs, placing a mortgage on a building under construction or on a parcel of real estate as collateral for the loan, and investing one's available surplus in securities whose long-term growth will far surpass the total interest payments due on the loan and often will even surpass the value of the mortgaged property itself.

Hence, mortgages and other means of financing that at the time commentaries were written on the 1917 code were uniformly viewed negatively as risk-laden ventures that imperiled one's financial future are today viewed as among the fundamentals of sound, productive fiscal management. While it remains true that, under certain circumstances, placing a mortgage upon a parcel of valuable real estate might pose a risk to the general economic condition of a diocese, parish, religious institute, or other public juridic person, and therefore fall into the category of transactions governed by canon 1295, it is also true that in the contemporary world of finance such a transaction in other circumstances may pose little or no risk at all. It is surprising that many commentators on the 1983 code simply adopt carte blanche the pre-code list of transactions that were considered perilous under the 1917 code and assume, in apparent disregard of the evolutionary nature of modern finance and the inherent relativity of a norm of law that seeks to protect "patrimonial condition," that such transactions today always threaten the economic future of all public juridic persons. To suppose that transactions considered perilous in the early-twentieth-century world of finance remain so in all circumstances today seems as canonically unsophisticated as it is financially naive.

It is also surprising that a number of contemporary commentators cite Pastorale munus as an authoritative source for viewing individual acts of mortgaging, pledging, leasing, or contracting debts as acts that always risk harm to one's patrimonial condition and, hence, pursuant to canon 1295, are always subject to the norms governing acts of alienation.[168] It is true that, in 1963, Paul VI listed such transactions along with alienation when granting to residential bishops the faculty to grant permission up to a sum to be determined by a national or regional conference of bishops and approved by the Holy See.[169] It does not follow, however, that Paul VI considered such individual transactions in each and every case to risk harm to the overall financial condition and for that reason to be subject to the norms governing alienation in accord with canon 1533 of the 1917 code (the forerunner of c. 1295 of the present code). Unlike the 1983 code, the 1917 code, in addition to its canon 1533, contained separate restrictive provisions for individual acts of mortgaging (CIC 1538), pledging (CIC 1538), leasing (CIC 1541, 1542), and contracting debts (CIC 1538); each of these provisions required permission, depending upon the value of the property involved, of the same ecclesiastical authorities whose permission was required for acts of alienation. Pastorale munus equated such acts to acts of alienation for the purpose of obtaining prior permissions, not because such acts were always subject to the general provision of canon 1533 of the 1917 code, but because they were in each case subject to the specific restrictions of other canons which required the same or similar permissions. The deletion in the 1983 code of the separate provisions governing mortgages, pledges, and debts, and the total change of discipline regarding leasing (see c. 1297 and accompanying commentary), results in an entirely different juridic status for such transactions. They, like many of the transactions traditionally viewed as always constituting a risk to one's economic condition, would, under the 1983 code, likely be classified as acts of extraordinary administration because they are not routine and not financially insignificant, and therefore would be subject to the regulatory norms for acts of extraordinary administration (see cc. 1277, 1281); but such acts do not rise to the level of a canon 1295 transaction unless they realistically threaten to weaken the general patrimonial condition of the public juridic person.

[167] López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 805.

[168] See, e.g., López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 804–805; Mantecón, in Com Ex IV/1, 166; De Paolis, De Bonis Ecclesiae, 107; F. Salerno, in Urbaniana Com, 737.

[169] PM I: "Faculties which belong by right to a residential Bishop . . . 32. To grant permission, for a legitimate reason, to alienate, pledge, mortgage, rent out, or perpetually lease ecclesiastical property and to authorize ecclesiastical moral persons to contract debts to the sum of money determined by the National or Regional Conference of Bishops and approved by the Holy See."

In the framework of the 1983 code, canon 1295 transactions are the more important acts of extraordinary administration, analogous to the more important acts of ordinary administration referred to and specially regulated in canon 1277. Just as the latter cannot be determined in the abstract but only in light of the financial condition of each diocese (see c. 1277), so too a transaction cannot be determined to be one of the more important acts of extraordinary administration, and hence a canon 1295 transaction, except in the light of its likely impact on the overall financial condition of the relevant public juridic person. Nor is it sufficient that there be a purely theoretical possibility of harm; based on an examination of the proposed transaction in the concrete, it must appear to constitute a realistic danger of worsening the economic well-being of the public juridic person.[170] To suppose that canon 1295 restricts every non-routine financial transaction, subjecting them all to the cumbersome requirements of canons 1291–1294 without regard to the economic contexts in which they are placed, would mean that all acts of extraordinary administration are ipso facto also canon 1295 transactions, an interpretation which would render superfluous the norms enacted for acts of extraordinary administration and would blur the distinctions between such acts, canon 1295 transactions, and alienation.

While canon 1295 transactions are subject to the same norms that govern alienation, the wording of the canon makes clear that canon 1295 transactions are not acts of alienation. This is also evident from canon 1267, §2 which acknowledges the possibility that in some circumstances canon 1295 applies to the acceptance of offerings burdened by a condition or modal obligation; in such circumstances, canon 1295 applies to an act of acquisition of temporal goods, a matter far different from an act of alienation. Clarity and canonical precision are not well served by referring to canon 1295 transactions, as a number of authors do, as "alienation in the broad sense."[171]

Alienation is the transfer of ownership (see commentary on c. 1291). An act of alienation reduces, through sale or gift, the quantity of stable patrimony owned by a public juridic person or, where one asset is exchanged for another which by legitimate designation is to be part of stable patrimony, alters the identity of stable patrimony owned by a public juridic person. A canon 1295 transaction, on the other hand, leaves unchanged the quantity and identity of stable patrimony owned by a public juridic person, but nonetheless entails a risk to its future financial stability. Whereas the focus of the law restricting alienation is primarily on a specific asset proposed for sale or donation or exchange, the focus of the law restricting canon 1295 transactions is not primarily on the specific asset which is the subject of the transaction but on the "condition" of the public juridic person and, hence, on the potential of the transaction to weaken the future financial security of the public juridic person as a whole, which it is the purpose of stable patrimony to protect. An act of alienation is easy to recognize, since it involves a transfer of ownership; a canon 1295 transaction is less readily identified because it could be any of a great variety of actions (not involving a transfer of ownership) and in each case its categorization is contingent upon the degree of risk it poses to the overall patrimonial condition of the public juridic person involved. Assistance could be given to administrators in fulfilling their responsibility to identify canon 1295 transactions by carefully drawn and regularly updated statutes which, in the light of the patrimonial condition of each public juridic person, offer concrete criteria for determining when a proposed financial transaction should be judged to threaten the overall financial stability and future well-being of the juridic person. Such criteria cannot be offered in universal law or even in particular law; the complexities of contemporary finance preclude it. The inherent relativity of canon 1295, which defies antecedent juridical precision and certainty, well serves the flexibility and diversity needed in the administration of church property by church administrators in the modern world of finance.

[170] Schouppe, 136.

[171] Brief summaries of the views of several authors, followed by his own view, may be found in De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 212–221.

In the 1983 code, the administration of church property falls into one of five categories: acts of ordinary administration, acts of ordinary administration of greater importance (see c. 1277), acts of extraordinary administration (see cc. 1277, 1281), acts of alienation (see cc. 1291–1294), and acts of extraordinary administration of greater importance because of the risk of harm they pose to a public juridic person's overall economic condition (c. 1295 transactions). Each category has its own defining characteristics and is governed by its own canonical norms. Those who have been entrusted with the stewardship of church property need to be aware of the different categories, their defining characteristics, and the norms which govern them. Such awareness is an essential prerequisite for faithful fulfillment of the responsibilities of stewardship.

Civilly Valid but Canonically Invalid Alienations

Canon 1296 — Whenever ecclesiastical goods have been alienated without the required canonical formalities but the alienation is valid civilly, it is for the competent authority, after having considered everything thoroughly, to decide whether and what type of action, namely, personal or real, is to be instituted by whom and against whom in order to vindicate the rights of the Church.

This canon addresses situations where a civilly valid transfer of ownership is canonically invalid because of the failure to obtain the necessary permissions of ecclesiastical authorities or the necessary consents of those entitled to have been consulted, or because of the failure to disclose previously alienated parts of divisible assets. These are the invalidating requirements for an act of restricted alienation; they are what is meant by the expression "required canonical formalities [solemnitates]."[172] Canon 1296 speaks only of alienation; its wording does not include canon 1295 transactions, which the wording of canon 1295 makes clear are not alienation (see commentary on c. 1295). The possibilities of corrective action of which canon 1296 speaks, however, could by analogy be applied to many canon 1295 transactions as well.

[172] The preceding canon speaks more comprehensively of the "requirements" (requisita) of cc. 1291–1294, thereby including not only the invalidating formalities (solemnitates) but also the prescriptions for liceity. Less precise in this regard, the 1917 code used the term solemnitates in both c. 1533, the antecedent of c. 1295 of the 1983 code, and in c. 1534, the antecedent of c. 1296 of the 1983 code.

In situations of civil validity but canonical invalidity, canon 1296 calls for a decision to be made as to whether any action should be taken and, if so, whether it should be a real[173] or personal action, and by whom and against whom it should be brought, to vindicate the canonical rights of the public juridic person (the specialized meaning of "church" according to c. 1258) whose property has been civilly alienated. The law wisely refrains from mandating corrective action in all cases. Attempts to recover property the ownership of which has been validly transferred according to civil law are likely to succeed only in instances where the transferee of the property acknowledges the authority of canon law, and even in such cases, as in many others, such attempts can give rise to considerable ill will toward the Church. Moreover, at times canonically invalid alienations may in fact prove economically advantageous, suggesting that no steps should be taken to try to undo them; in certain circumstances, it may be more prudent to take no action and allow the canonical situation to heal by the passage of time through prescription (see commentary on cc. 1268–1270).[174]

While the view has been expressed that the competent authority referred to in canon 1296 is the authority whose permission was required for the alienation,[175] it would seem more appropriate for decisions about corrective action to be made by the immediate canonical superior of the person responsible for the canonically invalid alienation, since otherwise the decision-making process in regard to corrective action could involve several authorities, consultative bodies, and interested parties. Whether or not to institute administrative or judicial proceedings to recover the invalidly alienated property, or to seek damages from those who wrongfully transferred civil ownership, would seem best left to the judgment of local authorities in a position to evaluate all relevant circumstances rather than involving the complex authority structure appropriate for initially authorizing an act of restricted alienation. This interpretation would seem to be confirmed by the parallel canon in the more recently promulgated Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches:

> Whenever ecclesiastical goods are alienated contrary to the prescriptions of canon law, but the alienation is civilly valid, the authority superior to the one who carried out the alienation decides, after a thorough review of the situation, whether and what type of action is to be taken to vindicate the rights of the Church as well as by whom and against whom this action is to be taken.[176]

Leasing

Canon 1297 — Attentive to local circumstances, it is for the conference of bishops to establish norms for the leasing of Church goods, especially regarding the permission to be obtained from competent ecclesiastical authority.

Nowhere in Book V, and perhaps nowhere in the code, is the principle of subsidiarity more fully applied than it is in regard to the leasing of church property. Virtually the entire matter is remitted by canon 1297 to norms enacted by episcopal conferences. A lease, of course, is a contract, and is therefore governed by the civil law of contracts unless a particular provision of civil law is contrary to divine or canon law (see commentary on c. 1290). Except for canon 1298, which [173] A real action is one which has as its object a res, a particular piece of property as, for example, an action to recover possession of property invalidly alienated. A personal action has as its object a person against whom one has a claim for damages as, for example, an action to recover damages from an administrator who wrongfully alienated an asset of a public juridic person.

[174] Canonically invalid alienations cannot usually be sanated by ecclesiatical authority, since sanation cannot supply the missing consents of consultative bodies or individuals, often among the causes of canonical invalidity.

[175] Myers, in CLSA Com, 882.

[176] CCEO 1040.

prohibits leasing of ecclesiastical goods to their own administrators or members of their families, there are no laws in the code specifically applicable to leasing other than canon 1297, which does not itself constitute an exception to the canonization of civil law but simply calls for regulations to be enacted by episcopal conferences to supplement the regulations contained in civil law.

Leasing is not alienation because there is no transfer of ownership (see commentary on c. 1291). Were it not for canon 1297, some long-term leasing might qualify as a canon 1295 transaction because of the risk of harm to the overall financial condition of a public juridic person (e.g., by removing for lengthy periods of time the use of substantial portions of stable patrimony, by subjecting stable patrimony to the perils of cumulative wear and tear by long-term lessees, or by risking economic loss due to inflation in real estate values while bound to the terms of an ill-advised long-term lease). The effect of canon 1297, however, is to remove leasing from the ambit of canon 1295 by subjecting leasing to a separate discipline to be found in regulatory norms enacted by the episcopal conference in the light of local circumstances. That the entire matter of leasing is remitted to the episcopal conference is clear from the canon's explicit mention of conference norms regarding permission to be obtained from ecclesiastical authority. It is left to each episcopal conference to designate authorities competent to grant permission for different kinds or monetary levels of leasing. It is also left to episcopal conferences to determine if permission is to be required for validity or simply for liceity.[177]

Leasing also received separate treatment in the 1917 code where it was governed by a lengthy, complex canon[178] which commentators generally concluded had the effect of removing leasing from the category of what they called "alienation in the broad sense" (see commentary on cc. 1291, 1295).[179] Continuing the tradition of separate treatment for leasing, the 1983 code simplifies the matter by recognizing the inadvisability of attempting to legislate universally for leasing which is so heavily influenced by local circumstances, economics, and civil law.[180] Despite the separate treatment accorded leasing in both codes, and the view of leading commentators on the 1917 code that, precisely because of the separate treatment, leasing was not to be included among transactions which risk harm to the patrimonial condition so as to make applicable the norms governing alienation, several commentators on the 1983 code inexplicably include leasing among what they understand to be canon 1295 transactions, thereby subjecting at least some leasing to the norms of canons 1291–1294 governing alienation.

The episcopal conference in the United States, perhaps not realizing the extent of its responsibility to enact norms for the leasing of property belonging to public juridic persons throughout the territory of the conference, attempted to fulfill its responsibility under canon 1297 by issuing norms solely for the leasing of diocesan property by a diocesan bishop. Action taken by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops to implement canon 1297 reads simply:

> See canon 1277: Acts of Extraordinary Administration for reference to leasing of church property by the diocesan bishop.[181]

[177] Permission is ordinarily required only for liceity. In two instances, however, the code requires permission for validity: acts of restricted alienation (and other transactions subject to the norms governing alienation) and acceptance of a non-autonomous pious foundation. See note 144 above.

[178] CIC 1541. This canon contained detailed prescriptions regarding renting to the highest bidder, safeguarding the boundaries of rented property, care of the property, payment of rent, guarantees of the fulfillment of all terms, and various levels of requisite permissions depending upon the value of the property, amount of the rent, and length of the term.

[179] See, e.g., Cappello, 2:582; Vermeersch-Creusen, 2:594.

[180] See Comm 5 (1973) 101; 9 (1977) 272; De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 195; Aznar Gil, 433; Mantecón, in Com Ex IV/1, 170–171.

[181] NCCB-CompNm 25.

The reference is to the NCCB implementation of canon 1277 which requires episcopal conferences to determine what are to be regarded as acts of extraordinary administration by a diocesan bishop. The final two of such acts, as determined by the NCCB, concern the leasing of church property by the diocesan bishop (see commentary on c. 1277). The net effect of the NCCB action is to leave much of the Church in the United States without canonical norms governing the leasing of ecclesiastical goods.[182] Except for canon 1298, which prohibits leasing to administrators and their families, and canon 1547, which would allow in an ecclesiastical tribunal proof by witnesses alone of any lease regardless of civil-law requirements to the contrary,[183] the matter of leasing church property in the United States at the present time is, for most public juridic persons in the Church, governed solely by civil law. This includes leasing by religious institutes, provinces, and houses, all of which are governed by the canons of Book V except where express provision to the contrary has been made (c. 635, §1); there is no separate provision for leasing by religious institutes. In the absence of canonical norms enacted by the NCCB,[184] provisions regarding leasing could, of course, be included in the proper law of a religious institute or in the statutes of any other juridic person.[185]

[182] For norms issued by other episcopal conferences, see "Particular Legislation: Norms for Leasing Church Property," CLD 11, 315–317; "Complementary Norms to the Code Promulgated by English-Language Conferences of Bishops," in Pamplona ComEng, 1312, 1332–1333, 1353, 1408, 1415; J. Martín de Agar, Legislazione delle Conferenze Episcopali Complementare al C.I.C., passim.

[183] See commentary on c. 1290.

[184] The view has been expressed that continued absence of substantial implementation of c. 1297 in the United States gives rise to the impression that such legislation is not important, an impression that may be difficult to overcome if left uncorrected for long. See F. Morrisey, "Leasing of Goods," in CLSA Advisory Opinions 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 421.

[185] The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches contains no canon dealing with the leasing of ecclesiastical goods.

Avoiding Conflict of Interest

Canon 1298 — Unless an asset is of little value, ecclesiastical goods are not to be sold or leased to the administrators of these goods or to their relatives up to the fourth degree of consanguinity or affinity without the special written permission of competent authority.

The wisdom of this canon is self-evident.[186] It is simply a specification of the general obligation of all ecclesial administrators, not just those of public juridic persons, always to act in the best interests of the entity they have been appointed to serve, unmoved by selfish considerations, careful to avoid even the appearance of conflict of interest, and ever conscious that in financial matters the Church can lose a great deal more than money. Without the unyielding integrity of its administrators, the Church can lose credibility, and a witness without credibility is worthless.

TITLE IV
PIOUS WILLS IN GENERAL AND PIOUS FOUNDATIONS
[cc. 1299–1310]

The canons of this title make unmistakably clear, in principle and in disciplinary regulations, the Church's commitment to the faithful observance of the declared intentions of those who contribute temporal goods in service to the mission of the Church. After affirming the natural right of all persons so to contribute, and echoing the Church's claim of independence from civil law in such matters (c. 1299), the canons in this title require exact fulfillment of even the subsidiary intentions of donors (c. 1300), the exercise of vigilant supervision by ordinaries (c. 1301) especially in regard to trusts (c. 1302) and foundations (cc. 1303–1305), the taking of careful precautions to prevent long-term continuing obligations from being forgotten (cc. 1306–1307), and the fulfillment of stringent conditions as a prerequisite to any alteration by ecclesiastical authority of the designated intentions of donors (cc. 1308–1310). Interwoven through the canons of this title are the notions of pious cause, pious will, pious trust, and two categories of pious foundation, notions which, though unexpressed in the earlier titles of Book V, permeate those titles and are essential to a thorough understanding of the canonical norms they contain.

[186] For the determination of the degrees of consanguinity and affinity, see the commentary on cc. 108 and 109.

Pious Causes

Canon 1299 — §1. A person who by natural law and canon law is able freely to dispose of his or her goods can bestow goods for pious causes either through an act inter vivos or through an act mortis causa.

§2. In dispositions mortis causa for the good of the Church, the formalities of civil law are to be observed if possible; if they have been omitted, the heirs must be admonished regarding the obligation, to which they are bound, of fulfilling the intention of the testator.

Although the term "pious cause," found in canon 1299, §1, is used sparingly in the code,[187] the concept pervades not only this title but all of Book V. By "pious cause," is meant any endeavor undertaken for a supernatural motive.[188] Some such endeavors are recognizable by the very nature of the endeavor, such as acts of worship, preaching the gospel, or the pursuit of Christian perfection. Others are recognizable as works of a juridic person in the Church, for all such works must be oriented to piety, charity, or the apostolate (see c. 114, §2). Still others are less easily identified because, while at times certain works may be undertaken for a supernatural motive, at other times they may not, as is true of many humanitarian works which may or may not be motivated by love of God or supernatural love of neighbor. Purely philanthropic motivation is insufficient to constitute a pious cause.[189]

Canon 1299 proclaims the freedom of all persons who are naturally and canonically capable of disposing of their own assets to donate goods for pious causes. Since a pious cause is a work or endeavor, it is inappropriate to speak of goods being donated to a pious cause; ownership resides in persons, natural or juridic, not in works or endeavors. The revised CLSA translation, unlike the earlier CLSA translation, avoids the expression "to pious causes" and consistently uses the precise formulation "for pious causes."

Pious causes are undertaken by natural as well as juridic persons, and by private as well as public juridic persons. Donations for pious causes, therefore, may or may not become ecclesiastical goods (bona ecclesiastica), depending upon whether or not the goods have been bestowed on a public juridic person (see c. 1257, §1). So, too, notwithstanding their inevitable relationship to the mission of the Church, goods donated for pious causes may or may not constitute church property depending upon whether or not they have been bestowed on a public juridic person (see commentary on c. 1258). Accordingly, many of the canons in this title, unlike the canons in the preceding title governing alienation, are not restricted to bona ecclesiastica but apply also to temporal goods belonging to private juridic persons and to natural persons, individually or jointly.[190]

[187] The term occurs in cc. 325, §2; 956; 1299, §1; 1300; 1302, §§1, 3; 1310, §1; the cognate term "pious works" occurs in c. 1245.

[188] De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 224; idem, De Bonis Ecclesiae, 109–110. See also Vromant, 137; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 821; J. Abbo and J. Hannan, The Sacred Canons (St. Louis: B. Herder, 1960) 2:720, n. 45.

[189] De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 225, n.5; Vromant, 137; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 821.

[190] Since a non-autonomous foundation, defined in c. 1303, §1, 2°, involves only goods belonging to a public juridic person, canons referring only to non-autonomous foundations are limited in scope to bona ecclesiastica. Such canons include 1303, §2; 1304; 1305; 1306; and 1307.

Bestowal of goods for pious causes is said to be through an act inter vivos when the transfer of ownership takes effect during the life of the donor; bestowal is said to be through an act mortis causa when the transfer of ownership is effective only upon death. Inter vivos bestowal of goods is commonly referred to simply as a gift; mortis causa bestowal can be either of two kinds: a last will and testament or a gift in contemplation of death. The latter shares some of the characteristics of an inter vivos gift and some of the characteristics of a last will and testament.

Though not often thought of as such, an inter vivos gift is a contract,[191] requiring natural and canonical contractual capacity in the donor, delivery (actual or constructive) of the goods,[192] acceptance by the donee, and fulfillment of civil-law requirements (that are not contrary to divine or canon law) in accord with the canonization of the civil law of contracts (see c. 1290).[193] Each of these elements is essential; the absence of any one precludes the effective making of a gift. Natural contractual capacity requires the use of reason, sufficient maturity (commensurate with the nature of the gift), and physical and psychological freedom. Canonical capacity includes the canonized requirements of civil law as well as specific canonical exceptions to the capacity to dispose of one's goods, such as those applicable to members of religious institutes (see c. 668).

As noted above, acceptance by the donee is an essential element of a gift inter vivos. Not every gift should be accepted. Potential burdens of maintenance and repair, incompatibility with the mission or ecclesial nature of a particular donee, and burdensome conditions or modal obligations attached to some gifts are among the considerations that often argue against acceptance of a gift.[194] While a just cause is required for a gift to a juridic person to be refused (see c. 1267, §2), many such causes exist. Once accepted, however, an inter vivos gift effectively transfers ownership immediately and the transfer is irrevocable.

A last will and testament differs from an inter vivos gift in several respects. Unlike the making of a gift inter vivos, the making of a last will and testament entails no delivery of goods and requires no acceptance by the beneficiaries in order to be effective;[195] also unlike an inter vivos gift, a last will and testament is not effective to transfer ownership until death and, consequently, remains revocable, in whole or in part, until such time. These differences flow from the fact that, both canonically and civilly, a last will and testament, unlike an inter vivos gift, is not a contract.[196] This [191] De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 196–197; Périsset, 231; Aznar Gil, 202; Schouppe, 85–87. See also Vromant, 138; Cappello, 2:567; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 821.

[192] Delivery is said to be constructive when the nature of the property being transferred is such that an actual "handing over" of the property is impracticable or impossible and it is necessary to substitute some recognized symbol of delivery, such as a deed to real estate or documentary title to a motor vehicle.

The essentiality of delivery derives from the concerns to make vivid to the donor the loss of ownership that is taking place, to make unambiguous to witnesses the meaning of the transaction, and, by transferring possession to the donee, to give the donee prima facie evidence of the gift having been made.

[193] De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 196–197; Périsset, 231. See also Vromant, 138; Cappello, 2:569.

Since by definition an inter vivos gift is gratuitous, it is sometimes said to be a unilateral contract because of the absence of a quid pro quo. Use of such terminology, however, should not be allowed to obscure the mutuality of obligations on the part of both donor and donee to respect the transfer of ownership effected by a gift inter vivos.

[194] A public juridic person requires the permission of its ordinary to accept a gift to which has been attached a condition or modal obligation (c. 1267, §2) and may, in some circumstances, need additional consents and permissions as well (see c. 1295). For an explanation of modal obligation, see commentary on c. 1267, §2.

[195] A beneficiary may, of course, decline a bequest, thereby causing the object of the bequest to become part of the residuary estate of the decedent; but, absent a refusal, canonical ownership (or, according to some, the right to ownership) passes to the beneficiary immediately upon the death of the testator without the need for acceptance.

[196] See J. Hannan, The Canon Law of Wills, CanLawStud 86 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1934) 53; Aznar Gil, 203.

accounts for the inapplicability to last wills and testaments of the canonization of the civil law of contracts found in canon 1290; accordingly, although in order to minimize Church-State conflicts canon 1299, §2 urges the observance of the formalities required by civil law for a valid last will and testament, such observance is not necessary to give rise to the canonical obligation to fulfill the intention of the testator.

The difficulty with canon 1299, §2 is its apparent assumption that the formalities of civil law are unrelated to ascertaining the true intention of the testator; yet that is their very purpose. Testamentary formalities such as the simultaneous presence of a designated number of witnesses at the signing of a last will and testament, signing by the testator on each page and by the witnesses on the final page, explicit statement by the testator that the document being witnessed is a last will and testament, careful and precise dating of the document, explicit revocation of all previous wills and codicils, and other formalities are precisely designed both to make vivid to the testator what is transpiring and to afford ample proof of the true intention of the testator. In the absence of some or all civilly required formalities, it is incumbent upon ecclesiastical authorities to obtain adequate alternative proof of true intention before attempting to impose or enforce the obligation of canon 1299, §2.

Bestowal of temporal goods for pious causes may also be accomplished by a gift in contemplation of death (donatio mortis causa) which, as noted above, shares some of the characteristics of an inter vivos gift and some of the characteristics of a last will and testament. Of Roman origin,[197] the gift in contemplation of death transfers personal property in expectation of imminent death, with the understanding that if the donor survives the danger of death or revokes the gift, the property must be returned. If not revoked, ownership transfers at death. Like a gift inter vivos, a gift in contemplation of death is a contract and requires delivery of the goods and acceptance by the donee, but like a last will and testament it does not transfer ownership until death.[198] Not recognized in the civil law of some nations,[199] the gift in contemplation of death continues to be recognized in the United States[200] but would seem rarely to be used today as a means of donating temporal goods for pious causes.[201]

The expression "for the good of the Church" in canon 1299, §2 does not refer solely to public juridic persons according to the specialized meaning given to the word "church" in canon 1258, but refers more generally to all pious causes, whether undertaken by natural persons or by public or private juridic persons.[202] This is apparent both from the context and the nature of the matter, and was the opinion of the majority of canonists in interpreting the same wording in the parallel canon of the 1917 code (CIC 1513, §2).[203]

The parallel canon in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches[204] replaces the words "in dispositions mortis causa" with the words "in last wills" (in ultimis voluntatibus), the language used [197] R. Brown and W. Raushenbush, The Law of Personal Property, 3rd ed. (Chicago, Ill.: Callaghan, 1975) 130–132.

[198] See Aznar Gil, 203; Cappello, 2:567; Hannan, 42–47; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 822.

[199] See Vromant, 145, n. 5; Cappello, 2:567. Non-recognition in the civil laws of several nations may account for the absence of any reference to gifts in contemplation of death in some commentaries on the 1983 code.

[200] J. Kennel, "Gifts," in American Jurisprudence, 2nd ed. (n.p.: West Group, 1999) 38:707–711; Brown and Raushenbush, 130–145.

[201] Since a gift in contemplation of death is a contract subject to the provisions of c. 1299, §2, which applies not just to last wills and testaments but to all dispositions mortis causa, the gift in contemplation of death is an exception to the canonization of the civil law of contracts, as provided in c. 1290, since c. 1299, §2 merely urges rather than requires observance of the formalities of civil law.

[202] De Paolis, De Bonis Ecclesiae, 112; idem, I Beni Temporali, 228–229; Myers, in CLSA Com, 884.

[203] See, e.g., Vromant, 145; Regatillo, 2:215; Cappello, 2:569; Vermeersch-Creusen, 2:583, n.2; Hannan, 286–287.

[204] CCEO 1043, §2.

in the 1917 code (CIC 1513, §2). This should not be understood, however, as a narrowing of the scope of the canon to last wills and testaments, since in canonical tradition the expression "last wills" includes all acts by which one disposes of all or part of one's goods as of one's death, including a gift in contemplation of death (donatio mortis causa).[205]

Pious Wills

Canon 1300 — The legitimately accepted wills of the faithful who give or leave their resources for pious causes, whether through an act inter vivos or through an act mortis causa, are to be fulfilled most diligently even regarding the manner of administration and distribution of goods, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1301, §3.

The wording of this canon makes it clear that the term "will" in canonical parlance has a much broader scope than it has in the civil law of many nations, including the United States, where the term usually refers to the written instrument declaring one's intentions regarding the disposition to be made of one's estate upon death, and is often used as shorthand for the fuller expression "last will and testament." Canonically, the term "pious will" includes all dispositions of temporal goods (tangible or intangible), whether made inter vivos or mortis causa, for pious causes. Pious wills, therefore, include gifts, gifts in contemplation of death (see commentary on c. 1299), and last wills and testaments. Nor is the notion of a pious will restricted to bestowal of temporal goods upon a public juridic person resulting in bona ecclesiastica (see c. 1257, §1), but is all-inclusive of dispositions made for pious causes however undertaken.

Faithful fulfillment of pious wills is a cardinal principle of canon law, given expression not only in canon 1300 but frequently throughout the code.[206] Fidelity to the intentions of donors is rooted in the right of all natural persons to dispose of their temporal goods as they wish. To accept a gift or testamentary bequest and not to honor the expressed intentions of the donor in regard to its use or disposition is, therefore, a violation of justice. Canon 1300 makes it clear that diligent fulfillment of a pious will extends not just to its general purpose but also to detailed directives as to how the temporal goods which comprise the matter of the pious will are to be applied to the general purpose or distributed in accord with it.[207] Unwillingness to comply with such directives should lead to refusal of the gift or bequest unless, in the case of an inter vivos gift or a gift in contemplation of death, efforts can successfully be made to induce the donor to change the directives. Only in the rarest of circumstances does the law of the Church allow ecclesiastical authority to alter the terms of a pious will once accepted (see cc. 1308–1310).[208]

In recognition of the fact that a gift or bequest for a pious cause may at times be justifiably refused, canon 1300, unlike the parallel canon in the 1917 code,[209] adds the modification "legitimately accepted" to its reference to wills of the faithful which give rise to the obligation of faithful fulfillment. In this connection, it should be re-

[205] See De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 224; Aznar Gil, 203; Vermeersch-Creusen, 2:581–582; Regatillo, 2:214–215; Vromant, 138; Hannan, 51, 65.

[206] See cc. 121; 122; 123; 326, §2; 531; 616, §1; 706, 3°; 954; 1267, §3; 1284, §2, 3°, 4°; 1299, §2; 1303, §2; 1304, §1; 1307, §1; 1310, §2.

[207] For a brief historical summary of the roots of this canon in Roman, decretal, and post-Tridentine canon law, see J. Lahey, Faithful Fulfillment of the Pious Will: A Fundamental Principle of Church Law as Found in the 1983 Code of Canon Law, CanLawStud 521 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1987) 8–39; W. Doheny, Church Property: Modes of Acquisition, CanLawStud 41 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1927) 96–98.

[208] In this regard, the law of the Church is generally stricter than what is known in some civil laws, including those in the United States, as the cy pres doctrine which allows a more liberal substitution of alternative charitable dispositions where fulfillment of the original intent has become unduly burdensome or impractical.

[209] CIC 1514.

called that licit acceptance of some gifts requires permission of ecclesiastical authority (see c. 1267, §2); acceptance of such gifts without permission renders the acceptance illegitimate, thereby requiring the return of the gift or bequest and negating the obligation to fulfill the pious will.

The final clause in canon 1300 calls attention to an apparent exception, found in canon 1301, §3, to the firm canonical commitment to faithful fulfillment of the detailed directives of legitimately accepted pious wills. The exception is more apparent than real, however, as is explained in the commentary on the following canon.

Canon 1301 — §1. The ordinary is the executor of all pious wills whether mortis causa or inter vivos.

§2. By this right, the ordinary can and must exercise vigilance, even through visitation, so that pious wills are fulfilled, and other executors are bound to render him an account after they have performed their function.

§3. Stipulations contrary to this right of an ordinary attached to last wills and testaments are to be considered non-existent.

A reading of paragraph two of this canon is essential to a correct understanding of paragraph one, for it is paragraph two that makes it clear that the ordinary referred to in paragraph one as the executor of all pious wills is not the executor in the sense in which that term is generally used in the civil laws of many nations, including the United States. The ordinary does not have the primary responsibility to implement the terms of every pious will.[210] Primary responsibility belongs to the "other executors" referred to in paragraph two; it is they who have been designated by the donors or testators to fulfill the pious will.

In accord with canonical tradition, the term "executor" is applied to the ordinary in the sense of one who, as part of executive governance, has the right and duty to see that the laws of the Church are faithfully observed and, in regard to temporal goods, that no abuses enter into the management or distribution of resources which have been placed in the service of one or more of the goals proper to the Church (see cc. 392, 1276, 325).[211] The role of the ordinary is independent of the will of the benefactors; it derives not from their will but from the hierarchical structure of the Church.[212] As paragraph two makes clear, it is a role of vigilant supervision.

In the exercise of vigilance, ordinaries (diocesan or nondiocesan) have the right and responsibility to learn when and how pious wills within their jurisdiction are being fulfilled. Paragraph two mentions visitation and reporting as principal means of acquiring such information. Diocesan bishops can exercise their right to obtain relevant information either personally or indirectly through the diocesan finance officer (see c. 1278) or through a delegate; religious or other nondiocesan ordinaries can monitor the fulfillment of pious wills through finance officers or delegates. Only in the event of neglect by a designated executor, or if no executor had been named, would the ordinary have responsibility to implement, personally or through a delegate, the terms of a pious will.[213]

According to paragraph three, stipulations in a last will[214] that are contrary to the supervisory

[210] See Comm 12 (1980) 429.

[211] De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 230; Périsset, 234–235; Cappello, 2:570.

[212] Salerno, in Urbaniana Com, 740; Périsset, 235; Cappello, 2:570.

[213] See Comm 12 (1980) 429; Aznar-Gil, 221–222; Regatillo, 2:217.

[214] The Latin text of paragraph three, which refers to last wills (in ultimis voluntatibus) and hence includes gifts in contemplation of death as well as last wills and testaments (see note 205 above and accompanying text), is broader in scope than the English translation which limits the provision to last wills and testaments.

Differentiating last wills from gifts inter vivos is apparently based on the fact that, in instances of last wills, opportunity rarely (in the case of gifts in contemplation of death) and not at all (in the case of last wills and testaments) exists for altering the pious will to eliminate the unacceptable provision denying the supervisory right of the ordinary.

right of an ordinary are to be ignored. This provision can be thought of as an exception to the principle of faithful fulfillment, even as to the manner of administration, of the will of donors but it is also possible, and perhaps preferable, to interpret the principle of faithful fulfillment as applicable only to matters subject to the free choice and control of a donor or testator. Altering the hierarchically allocated responsibilities of ecclesiastical authority is not so subject. Moreover, the supervisory role of ordinaries is designed to assure the diligent fulfillment of donative intentions; to give effect to stipulations which would negate this supervision would be counterproductive to the faithful fulfillment of donative intent. It is for these reasons that the final clause in canon 1300 was said in the commentary above to point to an exception to the principle of faithful fulfillment of pious wills that is more apparent than real.

Pious Trusts

Canon 1302 — §1. A person who has accepted goods in trust for pious causes either through an act inter vivos or by a last will and testament must inform the ordinary of the trust and indicate to him all its movable and immovable goods with the obligations attached to them. If the donor has expressly and entirely prohibited this, however, the person is not to accept the trust.

§2. The ordinary must demand that goods held in trust are safeguarded and also exercise vigilance for the execution of the pious will according to the norm of can. 1301.

§3. When goods held in trust have been entrusted to a member of a religious institute or society of apostolic life and if the goods have also been designated for some place or diocese or for the assistance of their inhabitants or pious causes, the ordinary mentioned in §§1 and 2 is the local ordinary; otherwise, it is the major superior in a clerical institute of pontifical right and in clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right or the proper ordinary of the member in other religious institutes.

To the notions of pious cause and pious will this canon adds the notion of a pious trust. The three notions are interrelated. A pious trust is a pious will which requires ongoing administration; temporal goods are conveyed to a person (natural or juridic), called a trustee, to be managed over a period of time, with the income or principal or both being used to benefit one or more pious causes. A pious trust differs from other restricted gifts precisely in the need for ongoing investment, management of funds, and periodic distribution of principal or income. A gift which is immediately to be applied to a specific purpose without the need of ongoing administration is not a trust. Hence, not every executor of a pious will is a trustee.

Nor is the notion of trustee in canon 1302 to be confused with the meaning of the term in such expressions as "board of trustees" frequently used in the United States to designate the board of directors or governing body of a civilly incorporated university or hospital. Though the members of such a board have fiduciary responsibilities according to the governing documents (canonical and civil) of the institution, they do not in any sense own the temporal goods of the institution; civil ownership resides in the corporation, and canonical ownership resides in the canonical juridic person being served by the members of the board. A change in the composition of such a board is not a change in ownership.[215] The trustee of a pious trust, on the other hand, has received ownership of the temporal goods which form the corpus of the trust;[216] the ownership is qualified, of course, by the requirements of use and distribution imposed by the terms of the trust.

A pious trust can be created by an act inter vivos or by a last will and testament. It cannot be [215] See the discussion of the canonical status of church-related institutions following the commentary on cc. 113–123.

[216] Hannan, 1–2, 69–70, 468. Anglo-American law recognizes in such situations a form of split ownership; the trustee is said to be the legal owner while the intended beneficiaries of the trust are said to be the equitable or beneficial owners.

created by a gift in contemplation of death, which transfers revocable possession but not ownership (until death); creation of a trust requires a transfer of ownership. Accordingly, unlike canon 1301, §3, the Latin of canon 1302 does not use the broader term "last wills" which would include gifts in contemplation of death, but refers instead to trusts created by last will and testament (ex testamento).[217]

Since a pious trust is a pious will, fulfillment of the terms of the trust is subject, according to canon 1302, §2, to the supervision of the ordinary in accord with the provisions of canon 1301. This places upon trustees the obligation to inform the ordinary of the existence of the trust, the movable and immovable temporal goods which constitute the corpus of the trust, and the terms of the trust (c. 1302, §1), so that the ordinary can fulfill his obligation to exercise vigilance over the fulfillment of the trust. If a donor or testator prohibits this expressly and entirely (that is, so firmly as to make the prohibition a sine qua non of the gift[218]), the trust is not to be accepted (c. 1302, §1). While this provision is sensible and practical in the case of a trust to be established by an act inter vivos where, prior to acceptance, the donor may be persuaded to revise the terms of the trust so as to eliminate the ecclesially unacceptable prohibition, the provision has far less to commend it in the case of a trust established by last will and testament. As noted above, a last will and testament does not require acceptance to be effective (see commentary on c. 1299). Refusal to implement a trust established by last will and testament, therefore, amounts to repudiation of a pious will after the ownership (or, according to some, the right to ownership) of temporal goods has already been transferred, simply because the testator has included a directive attempting to impede the supervisory rights of the ordinary which derive from the hierarchical structure of the Church and are not dependent upon the free will of the testator (see commentary on c. 1301). Since those supervisory rights are precisely intended to secure the faithful fulfillment of the testator's donative intent, it would seem disingenuous to refuse fulfillment of that intent entirely simply because the testator sought ineffectively to negate a law of the Church designed to protect his or her intent. Since canon 1302, §2 makes specific mention of canon 1301, it would seem canonically more sound to confine the last clause of canon 1302, §1 to trusts established inter vivos[219] and, in instances of trusts established by last will and testament, to apply canon 1301, §3 to consider nonexistent the ecclesially unacceptable provision and sustain the supervisory rights of the ordinary.

If a member of a religious institute or society of apostolic life is chosen to be the trustee of a pious trust, the issue can arise as to which ordinary, the proper ordinary of the trustee or the ordinary of place where the trust is to be fulfilled, has the right and duty of supervising the fulfillment of the trust. Canon 1302, §3 resolves the issue in favor of the local ordinary whenever the temporal goods which form the corpus of the trust are to be used for the benefit of a diocese or other place or for its inhabitants or pious causes, and in favor of the proper ordinary of the trustee in other cases (as, for example, where the goods are to be used for the benefit of the religious institute or society of apostolic life). While that distinction will often suffice to resolve a doubt or controversy, it is likely that situations will arise where it will not be clear whether the purpose of a trust is primarily to benefit an apostolic work (such as education or health care) within a particular diocese or primarily to benefit the members of the institute or society who are engaged in the work. In such situations, determination of which ordinary will fulfill the responsibility of supervision would seem best made collaboratively by the ordinaries involved.

[217] The same precision in the use of terminology was found in the 1917 code (compare CIC 1516, §1 with CIC 1513, §2 and 1515, §3).

[218] Vromant, 152.

[219] In this connection, it is noteworthy that the final clause of c. 1302, §1 speaks only of a donor (donator) and not also of a testator (the term used in both Latin and English in c. 1299, §2).

Pious Foundations

Canon 1303 — §1. In law, the term pious foundations includes:

1° autonomous pious foundations, that is, aggregates of things (universitates rerum) destined for the purposes mentioned in can. 114, §2 and erected as a juridic person by competent ecclesiastical authority;

2° non-autonomous pious foundations, that is, temporal goods given in some way to a public juridic person with the obligation for a long time, to be determined by particular law, of celebrating Masses and performing other specified ecclesiastical functions or of otherwise pursuing the purposes mentioned in can. 114, §2, from the annual revenues.

§2. If the goods of a non-autonomous pious foundation have been entrusted to a juridic person subject to a diocesan bishop, they must be remanded to the institute mentioned in can. 1274, §1 when the time is completed unless some other intention of the founder had been expressly manifested; otherwise, they accrue to the juridic person itself.

The law of the Church provides for two markedly different kinds of pious foundation. An autonomous foundation is a juridic person which has as its substratum temporal goods which have been set aside for one or more pious causes. It can be either a public or private juridic person. The term "autonomous foundation," therefore, is synonymous with universitas rerum when the latter is used to designate one of the two principal categories of juridic person, namely, those which have as their substratum goods rather than people (see c. 115, §3). Since a juridic person is an artificial person, a singular subject of rights and obligations, and not a collectivity or aggregate (see commentary on cc. 113, 115), it is unfortunate that the CLSA translation of canon 1303, §1, 1° renders universitates rerum as "aggregates of things." Autonomous pious foundations are not aggregates; they are individual juridic persons whose substratum, or basis in reality, is an aggregate of goods.[220]

Creation of an autonomous pious foundation requires the establishment of a fund or other substratum of goods, the approval of statutes, and the conferral of either public or private personality by decree of competent ecclesiastical authority (see commentary on cc. 114, 116, 117).[221] The management of an autonomous foundation is governed by its statutes and the laws of the Church governing juridic persons (see cc. 117–123). Like all juridic persons, the autonomous pious foundation is of its nature perpetual but can, under certain circumstances, be terminated (c. 120). The distribution of its assets upon consolidation, division, or extinction is governed by canons 121–123.

A non-autonomous foundation is not a juridic person. It is a long-term pious trust, with a public juridic person as trustee, according to the terms of which the annual income (but not the principal) is to be used for a pious cause. The code leaves to particular law the determination of how long such a trust must be intended to last in order to qualify as a non-autonomous foundation, and for how long a time it may last.[222]

[220] The code occasionally uses the term universitas rerum to refer to an aggregate or accumulation of temporal goods prior to the creation of a juridic person (see, e.g., cc. 114, §3; 117); in these instances, translation of universitas rerum as "aggregate of things" is appropriate (see commentary on cc. 115, 117).

[221] Although the code provides for conferral of juridic personality by law (c. 114, §1), no law of the Church confers juridic personality on any universitas rerum.

[222] The present code speaks only of long-term, not perpetual, obligations in recognition of contemporary economic conditions which do not lend themselves to guaranteeing the perpetual availability of sufficient income to fulfill obligations in perpetuum. Comm 12 (1980) 431. It was apparently not the intention of the revisers of the code, however, to prohibit perpetual obligations, but simply to acknowledge modern economic reality by not supposing such obligations to be undertaken frequently enough to warrant mention in universal law, and by leaving to particular law the enactment of whatever relevant regulations may be thought advisable. See Comm 9 (1977) 273.

Prior to prescribing norms for the creation and governance of non-autonomous foundations (cc. 1304–1307), the code, in canon 1303, §2, addresses the issue of what is to happen to the principal of such a foundation upon expiration of its term. Unless expressly provided otherwise in the terms of the foundation, the principal of a non-autonomous foundation entrusted to a public juridic person subject to the diocesan bishop is to be distributed to the diocesan institute prescribed in canon 1274, §1 for the support of clergy serving the diocese. The existence of such an institute, however, is contingent upon the absence of other ways to support the clergy; in many nations, including the United States, clergy are supported from other sources, making unnecessary the establishment of a canon 1274, §1 institute and thereby exposing a lacuna in the law governing the distribution of the principal of a non-autonomous foundation.

Even more problematic is the fact that the category of public juridic persons subject to the diocesan bishop includes a number of juridic persons, such as institutes of women religious of diocesan right or lay societies of apostolic life of diocesan right, whose members, not being clerics, would, under this provision, derive no benefit from distribution of the principal of a foundation which the juridic person had administered for a long period of time. Such an outcome would undoubtedly be contrary to the intention of many founders, which makes it imperative that in the documentation establishing a non-autonomous foundation there be a clear expression of the founder's intent regarding the distribution of the principal upon the expiration of the term of the foundation.

Acceptance of Non-autonomous Foundations

Canon 1304 — §1. For a juridic person to be able to accept a foundation validly, the written permission of the ordinary is required. He is not to grant this permission before he has legitimately determined that the juridic person can satisfy both the new obligation to be undertaken and those already undertaken; most especially he is to be on guard so that the revenues completely respond to the attached obligations, according to the practice of each place or region.

§2. Particular law is to define additional conditions for the establishment and acceptance of foundations.

Although the wording of this canon speaks of "juridic person" and "foundation" without, in either case, a modifier, the content of the canon makes clear that it is speaking only of public juridic persons and only of non-autonomous foundations, for the canon concerns the acceptance of a foundation by a juridic person. Only a non-autonomous foundation is accepted by a juridic person; an autonomous foundation is a juridic person in its own right (c. 1303, §1, 1°). And, by definition, a non-autonomous foundation is accepted only by a public juridic person (1303, §1, 2°).

For the valid acceptance of a non-autonomous foundation, canon 1304 requires the written permission of the proper ordinary. This is one of the few canons in the code where permission (licentia) is said to be required for validity.[223] Generally throughout the code, as in canonical tradition, permission is required only for liceity, not validity. Where validity is at stake, the code usually requires a faculty (facultas) or power (potestas).

That the permission be written, however, would seem to be required for proof, not validity, and hence only for liceity, as is generally true in canonical tradition.[224] The fact that the non-autonomous foundation itself can be established orally (see c. 1306, §1) reinforces the conclusion that the permission may also be given orally. This in no way diminishes the importance of committing the permission to writing as soon as possible, however, since proof that permission was in fact [223] All other instances have to do with alienation and other transactions subject to the norms governing alienation (see cc. 638, §3; 1190, §2; 1291; 1292, §2).

[224] See commentary on c. 1281, §1 and authors cited in note 104.

given will be necessary to sustain the validity of the acceptance of the foundation if it should be challenged.

Since a non-autonomous pious foundation is a form of pious trust (see c. 1303, §1, 2°), the ordinary referred to in canon 1304 is to be determined according to canon 1302, §3. Prior to giving permission, the proper ordinary must determine if the public juridic person is able, both in terms of available personnel and available resources, to fulfill the obligations of the non-autonomous foundation for the proposed length of time for which it is to exist. It is canonically and ethically reprehensible to accept, or approve the acceptance of, a non-autonomous foundation knowing in advance that it will be necessary to seek from competent ecclesiastical authority the reduction or commutation of the obligations of the foundation because of the impossibility of their being fulfilled.

Requiring a public juridic person to obtain authorization from the ordinary to accept a non-autonomous foundation echoes the general norm requiring public juridic persons to obtain permission when accepting any gift to which is attached a condition or modal obligation (c. 1267, §2)[225] and, since the authorization required by canon 1304 is for validity, in effect makes the acceptance of a non-autonomous foundation an act of extraordinary administration (see c. 1281, §1).

Evidencing an awareness of the multiplicity of factors and diversity of conditions that can affect the wisdom of accepting and the manner of establishing non-autonomous foundations, canon 1304, §2, in accord with the principle of subsidiarity, remits to particular law (which, in this instance, includes the proper law of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life) the enactment of additional requirements for the acceptance and establishment of non-autonomous foundations.[226]

Administration of Non-autonomous Foundations

Canon 1305 — Money and movable goods assigned to an endowment are to be deposited immediately in a safe place approved by the ordinary so that the money or value of the movable goods is protected; as soon as possible, these are to be invested cautiously and usefully for the benefit of the foundation, with express and specific mention made of the obligation; this investment is to be made according to the prudent judgment of the ordinary, after he has heard those concerned and his own finance council.

The distinctions between autonomous and non-autonomous foundations and between public and private juridic persons were not found in the 1917 code. The only foundation known to the 1917 code was the equivalent of a non-autonomous foundation in the present code, namely, temporal goods entrusted to a juridic person (called "moral person" in the 1917 code) with the obligation to use the income perpetually or for a long time for a designated pious cause or causes (CIC 1544, §1). Such foundations were regulated by canons 1545–1550 of the former code, the content of which was virtually identical to the content of canons 1305–1307 of the present code. This fact alone strongly suggests the limited application of these canons in the present code to non-autonomous foundations; autonomous foundations, as juridic persons in their own right, are governed by canons 116–123 and by their own statutes in such details as form the subject matter of canons 1305–1307. Moreover, the context and content of each of these can-[225] Aznar Gil, 236; Salerno, in Urbaniana Com, 743.

[226] Some authors are of the opinion that c. 1304, §2 applies also to autonomous foundations. See L. Chiappetta, Il Codice di Diritto Canonico: Commento Giuridico-Pastorale, 2nd ed. (Rome: Dehoniane, 1996) 2:574; J. M. Vázquez García-Peñuela, in Com Ex IV/1, 206. While particular law can indirectly affect the constitution of autonomous foundations by requiring the inclusion of certain provisions in the statutes, which must be approved by competent authority (c. 117), the context of c. 1304 (the acceptance of a foundation) would seem to confine the application of all its provisions to non-autonomous foundations. See De Paolis, I Beni Temporali, 234, n. 21; Schouppe, 104.

ons lends its own weight to the conclusion that they are intended to apply only to non-autonomous foundations.

The context of canon 1305 is the safeguarding and eventual investment of the endowment of foundations accepted according to canon 1304. The need for the ordinary's approval of the "safe place" in which to deposit the endowment pending its investment, and the need for additional approval of the investment itself, reinforce the conclusion that canon 1305 is speaking only of non-autonomous foundations. Such close supervision would be inconsistent with the autonomy of a private juridic person, which an autonomous foundation often is.

Sound administration of a non-autonomous foundation entails safeguarding the movable goods, including money, which form the principal (or part of the principal[227]) of the foundation prior to their being invested and, as soon as economically advisable,[228] carefully and prudently investing these goods so as to realize the income needed to fulfill the obligations of the foundation. By investment is here meant a long-term investment sufficient to make the goods part of the stable patrimony (see commentary on c. 1291) of the public juridic person to which the foundation belongs. Deposits in savings accounts in banks or in short-term certificates of deposit, while appropriate vehicles for safeguarding the principal of the foundation pending investment, are not themselves considered canonically to constitute an investment (see commentary on canon 1284, §2, 6°).

In accord with the general norm for administrators of public juridic persons, the investment is to be made with the approval of the ordinary (see c. 1284, §2, 6°).[229] Since a non-autonomous pious foundation is a form of pious trust (see c. 1303, §1, 2°), the ordinary referred to here is to be determined according to canon 1302, §3. Canon 1305 adds the requirement that, in judging the prudence of investments, the ordinary must consult interested parties (e.g., living donors, members of the families of deceased donors, beneficiaries of the foundation, and others who have an interest in seeing that appropriate investments will be made to assure the fulfillment of the purposes of the foundation) and the ordinary's own financial council. In the case of a local ordinary, the relevant council is the diocesan finance council; in the case of a religious ordinary (major superior of a clerical religious institute of pontifical right[230]) or ordinary of a society of apostolic life (major superior of a clerical society of apostolic life of pontifical right[231]) the relevant council is that which has been established pursuant to the directive of canon 1280 (which allows at least two advisors in lieu of a formal financial council) to which religious institutes and societies of apostolic life are subject (cc. 635, §1; 741, §1). In judging the prudence of investments, ordinaries must also keep in mind the obligation to honor, when fulfilling any pious will, the intentions of donors regarding even the manner of administration (c. 1300), which might include the inclusion or exclusion of certain kinds of investments.

Canon 1306 — §1. Foundations, even if made orally, are to be put in writing.

§2. One copy of the charter is to be preserved safely in the archive of the curia and another copy in the archive of the juridic person to which the foundation belongs.

[227] Nothing in either the nature of things or in the code precludes assigning immovable goods such as land or buildings to the endowment of a non-autonomous foundation.

[228] The immediate sale of goods, especially income-producing goods, in order to invest the proceeds may not be economically advisable given the nature of the goods or current market conditions. See López Alarcón, in Pamplona ComEng, 811–812.

[229] See commentary on c. 1284 for the reasons which support interpreting c. 1284 as applicable only to public juridic persons despite its apparently broad reference to "all" administrators.

[230] See c. 134, §1.

[231] Ibid.

Since an autonomous foundation, which is itself a juridic person (c. 1303, §1, 1°), comes into being only by decree of competent authority, there being no autonomous foundation established a iure (see c. 114, §1), and since a decree of its nature is to be in writing (see cc. 51, 55), only non-autonomous foundations can be established orally as, for example, by the acceptance of an inter vivos gift with the stipulation that it be invested and the income alone be used over a long period of time for a designated pious cause or causes. Canon 1306, then, like the two canons that immediately precede it and the canon that immediately follows it, is speaking of non-autonomous foundations. After acknowledging the possibility that some such foundations can be established orally, canon 1306, §1 sets forth the sensible requirement that such foundations be put in writing. By definition a non-autonomous foundation is long-term; its obligations (e.g., the offering of Masses, conducting of pilgrimages, works of charity) are to be fulfilled over a long period of time (c. 1303, §1, 2°). To assure fulfillment, it is imperative that those obligations be detailed in writing so that successive administrators of the public juridic person to which the foundation belongs will be aware of them.

The same concern underlies the provisions of canon 1306, §2 requiring two copies of the charter of the foundation, one to be kept in the archive of the curia of the ordinary who has the responsibility of supervising the non-autonomous foundation, the other to be kept in the archive of the juridic person to which the foundation belongs.

Canon 1307 — §1. A list of the obligations incumbent upon pious foundations is to be composed and displayed in an accessible place so that the obligations to be fulfilled are not forgotten; the prescripts of cann. 1300–1302 and 1287 are to be observed.

§2. In addition to the book mentioned in can. 958, §1, another book is to be maintained and kept by the pastor or rector in which the individual obligations, their fulfillment, and the offerings are noted.

Canon 1307 continues the sequence of directives begun in canon 1304 to assure the faithful fulfillment of the obligations of non-autonomous foundations. A list of all obligations (e.g., number and dates of Masses to be celebrated, liturgical functions to be conducted, meals to be served to the poor) is to be prepared and displayed in a readily accessible place so that those in a position to fulfill the obligations will be reminded to do so. For Masses and other liturgical functions, the proper place for displaying such a list would seem to be a sacristy; for other obligations, the office of the administrator or financial officer of the public juridic person to which the non-autonomous foundation belongs would seem appropriate.

Reference to canons 1300–1302 is intended to remind relevant administrators that non-autonomous pious foundations also share the nature of pious wills (cc. 1300, 1301) and pious trusts (c. 1302) and, as such, are also governed by the disciplinary regulations found in those canons. Moreover, in view of the fact that the temporal goods which comprise the principal of a non-autonomous foundation are ecclesiastical goods, since they have been entrusted to a public juridic person (see cc. 1303, §1, 2°; 1257, §1), the reporting requirements of canon 1287 are also applicable; clerical and lay administrators of non-autonomous foundations are reminded of their responsibilities to report to local ordinaries and to the faithful in accord with the norms set forth in canon 1287.

Concluding the sequence of directives designed to assure faithful fulfillment of the obligations of non-autonomous foundations is the requirement in canon 1307, §2 that a special book be kept, distinct from the book required by canon 958, §1 for the recording of the acceptance and fulfillment of individual Mass stipends, in which all the obligations of non-autonomous foundations (including Mass obligations) be recorded, along with their fulfillment and the offerings taken from the income of the foundation for their fulfillment. The careful maintaining of such a written record of fulfillment of obligations is itself an efficacious instrument of faithful fulfillment. The specific mention of pastors and rectors suggests that this provision is limited to non-autonomous foundations entrusted to parochial or other churches, or to seminaries, for the celebration of Masses or other liturgical functions. The wording of the provision makes clear that canon 1307 is not intended to apply to autonomous foundations, private or public, although the keeping of a similarly mandated written record, as well as the readily accessible display of obligations mandated in paragraph one, could appropriately be required in the statutes of such foundations.

ALTERATION OF PIOUS WILLS [cc. 1308–1310]

No amount of care in the articulation of a pious will of any kind, inter vivos or mortis causa, can eliminate all possibility of the need for some future modification in the terms of the will, especially if the will establishes a trust or foundation which is to last for a long time. Economic and other changes (such as revisions in the Church's liturgical practices) make the need for such modifications inevitable. The Church's commitment to faithful fulfillment of all pious wills, however, gives rise to strict norms governing any alterations. These norms are found in canons 1308–1310.

The first two of these canons pertain exclusively to the reduction of Mass obligations. The strictness of the Church's stance in this regard is foreshadowed by the exclusion of Mass stipends and obligations from prescription (c. 199, 5°) and in the several disciplinary norms governing the acceptance, timely fulfillment, transfer, and accurate recording of Mass stipends (cc. 947–958).

Canon 1308 — §1. A reduction of the obligations of Masses, to be made only for a just and necessary cause, is reserved to the Apostolic See, without prejudice to the following prescripts.

§2. If it is expressly provided for in the charters of the foundations, the ordinary is able to reduce the Mass obligations because of diminished revenues.

§3. With regard to Masses independently founded in legacies or in any other way, the diocesan bishop has the power, because of diminished revenues and for as long as the cause exists, to reduce the obligations to the level of offering legitimately established in the diocese, provided that there is no one obliged to increase the offering who can effectively be made to do so.

§4. The diocesan bishop also has the power to reduce the obligations or legacies of Masses binding an ecclesiastical institute if the revenue has become insufficient to pursue appropriately the proper purpose of the institute.

§5. The supreme moderator of a clerical religious institute of pontifical right possesses the same powers mentioned in §§3 and 4.

Canon 1309 — The authorities mentioned in can. 1308 also have the power to transfer, for an appropriate cause, the obligations of Masses to days, churches, or altars different from those determined in the foundations.

Canon 1308, §1 sets forth the general norm that reduction of Mass obligations is reserved to the Apostolic See,[232] the only exceptions being those found in the remaining provisions of canon 1308 and in canon 1309. Evidencing the seriousness with which the law views any such alteration is the requirement of a just and necessary cause in all cases, even when the reduction is made by the Apostolic See. Mere convenience is never a sufficient cause.[233]

[232] Four dicasteries of the Holy See are competent to deal with issues concerning Mass obligations, pious wills in general, and pious foundations in particular: CFC for the Latin church in general (PB 97, 2°), CICLSAL for such matters involving institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life or individual members thereof (PB 108, §1), ApPen for internal forum issues (PB 118), and CEC for the Eastern churches (PB 56, 58, §1).

[233] The expression "just and necessary cause" occurs only in cc. 1308 and 1310, both having to do with the alteration of pious wills. The expression would appear to require a greater justification than the more frequently occurring expressions "just cause," "just and reasonable cause," and Paragraph two affords the first of three mitigations of the reservation to the Holy See of the power to reduce Mass obligations. This first mitigation is limited, however, to Mass obligations attached to foundations (autonomous or non-autonomous, there being nothing to suggest restriction to one or the other category) and to reductions made necessary by diminished revenues (often due to economic inflation) which are no longer sufficient to provide stipends for the originally designated number of Masses. In such circumstances, the proper ordinary may reduce the number of Mass obligations if, but only if, express authorization to do so has been given in the governing document (charter) of the foundation.

Paragraph three affords a second mitigation, though more limited than the first. As in paragraph two, the mitigation in paragraph three affects only foundation Masses, whether the foundation be autonomous or non-autonomous,[234] and the reduction is restricted to the sole circumstance of diminished revenue. In paragraph three, however, reduction is further limited to the level of offering established in accord with canon 952, solely for as long as the income is diminished, and only if there is no one with an obligation to increase the offering who can be persuaded to do so in order to sustain the originally designated number of obligations.[235] Even in such circumstances, further restriction limits the power to reduce Mass obligations to diocesan bishops and to supreme moderators of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right (§5), rather than extending the power to all ordinaries as in paragraph two.

Paragraph four affords a third and final mitigation, authorizing a diocesan bishop (and, pursuant to §5, the supreme moderator of a clerical religious institute of pontifical right) to reduce Mass obligations binding an ecclesiastical institute (e.g., hospital, school, university) if the revenue has become insufficient to continue to sustain the work of the institute. Unlike the provisions in paragraphs two and three, this provision (taken from PM 12) does not refer to foundations, autonomous or non-autonomous, established for the sole purpose of providing for the celebration of Masses, but to situations where gifts or testamentary bequests have been made primarily to support the work of various institutions, with accompanying modal obligations (see commentary on c. 1267) to arrange for the celebration of a designated number of Masses for a specified intention (often for the living or deceased members of the donor's family).

even "grave cause." See Périsset, 258–259; Aznar Gil, 270; Myers, in CLSA Com, 888. Curiously, the Eastern code omits all reference to cause when referring to reduction of Divine Liturgy obligations by the Apostolic See (CCEO 1052, §1), but retains "just and necessary cause" when referring to the alteration of pious wills by a hierarch to whom such power has been expressly committed by the donor (CCEO 1054, §1).

[234] Paragraph three of c. 1308 is limited to Mass obligations "independently" founded in testamentary bequests (legacies) or in any other way, such as in inter vivos establishment of a foundation. The modifier "independently" translates quae sint per se stantia, a phrase taken from PM 11. The phrase has been variously translated as "perpetual" (CLD 6, 372), "autonomous" (Urbaniana Com; Pamplona ComEng), "solely for the purpose of Masses" (original British, Canadian, Australian translation), and "which are separately endowed" (CLSGBI Com). Prior to the promulgation of the 1983 code, the phrase was interpreted by some as referring only to Mass foundations established as distinct juridic persons (see Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 827), which would correspond only to the autonomous foundation under the 1983 code. Though the issue has not been addressed by many commentators on the 1983 code, the prevailing interpretation seems to be that the phrase refers to all foundation Masses, whether the foundation is autonomous or non-autonomous. See Aznar Gil, 275; Morrisey, in CLSGBI Com, 745. In both kinds of foundations, the goods set aside for the celebration of Masses are "independent" of all other goods and obligations.

[235] Rarely would a person have such an obligation; it would have to be imposed (e.g., on a member of the family) by the founder of the foundation or, in the rarest of circumstances, by ecclesiastical authority as a form of mandatory restitution for an injustice done either to the founder or to those for whom the foundation Masses are to be offered.

The 1977 draft of what was to become canon 1308 contained a provision limiting the diocesan bishop's delegation of the powers given in paragraphs three and four to coadjutors, auxiliary bishops, vicars general, and episcopal vicars, which had been the situation under Pastorale munus from which paragraphs three and four were derived. The provision was deleted on the ground that there is no sufficient reason to limit the bishop's power to delegate in this matter.[236] The parallel canon in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, however, does limit the eparchial bishop's power to delegate these powers to certain officials, and prohibits all subdelegation.[237]

It was suggested during the revision process that diocesan bishops be given general power to reduce the obligations of nonfoundation Masses (known under the 1917 code as manual Masses[238]), but it was thought preferable to refer such reductions to the Holy See in order to avoid abuses.[239]

As noted above, paragraph five extends to supreme moderators, but not to other major superiors, of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right the same powers accorded to diocesan bishops in paragraphs three and four. The decision not to extend the powers to the supreme moderators or other major superiors in clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right was deliberate,[240] even though they, like many major superiors in clerical religious institutes of pontifical right who are also excluded from these powers, may be ordinaries (see c. 134, §1). This may be seen as further evidence of the strictness of the law's approach to the reduction of Mass obligations.[241]

Distinct from the reduction in the number of Masses to be celebrated, which is the concern of canon 1308, is the alteration of what the law considers to be ancillary or secondary intentions regarding the celebration of Masses, namely, specifications of particular churches in which, or days or altars on which, Masses are to be offered. It is to these ancillary intentions that canon 1309 is directed, but only to such intentions as have been attached to foundation Masses. For an appropriate cause (which is less stringent, as befits an ancillary obligation, than the just and necessary cause required for reducing the number of Masses) the authorities mentioned in canon 1308 can transfer to other days or places the obligations of Masses. Reference to the authorities mentioned in canon 1308 is somewhat problematic. While paragraph one of that canon refers to the Apostolic See and paragraph two refers to ordinaries, paragraphs three, four, and five more narrowly refer only to the diocesan bishop and to supreme moderators of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right. Had the legislator intended to restrict the powers of canon 1309 to only some of the authorities mentioned in canon 1308, however, limited reference to one or another paragraph of canon 1308 would have been appropriate. In the absence of such a limited reference, canon 1309 should be interpreted as referring to any or all of the authorities mentioned in canon 1308, namely, to the Apostolic See and to all ordinaries.[242]

Canon 1310 — §1. The ordinary, only for a just and necessary cause, can reduce, moderate, or

[236] Comm 12 (1980) 433–434.

[237] CCEO 1052, §6.

[238] See CIC 826. Technically, it was the stipend that was called manual, but the practice soon developed of referring to manual Masses as distinct from foundation Masses, due perhaps to the wording of CIC 826, §3.

[239] Comm 12 (1980) 434.

[240] Rel 290; Comm 16 (1984) 37. A critique of this decision may be found in Périsset, 261–262, 268.

[241] The Eastern code, while stricter than the Latin code in regard to the delegatability of the power to reduce Mass obligations, is broader in its inclusion of superiors general of some societies of common life (CCEO 1052, §5).

[242] De Paolis expresses the same conclusion (I Beni Temporali, 237) but Aznar Gil, without explanation, restricts competent authorities to the Apostolic See, diocesan bishops, superiors general of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right, and superiors general of clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right, despite the fact that the latter have no authority under c. 1308 except under paragraph two which includes all ordinaries, not just those he lists (Aznar Gil, 276).

commute the wills of the faithful for pious causes if the founder has expressly entrusted this power to him.

§2. If through no fault of the administrators the fulfillment of the imposed obligations has become impossible because of diminished revenues or some other cause, the ordinary can equitably lessen these obligations, after having heard those concerned and his own finance council and with the intention of the founder preserved as much as possible; this does not hold for the reduction of Masses, which is governed by the prescripts of can. 1308.

§3. In other cases, recourse is to be made to the Apostolic See.

This canon concerns the alteration of pious wills other than those for the celebration of Masses. Paragraph one speaks of three different forms of alteration: reduction, moderation, and commutation. By reduction is meant lessening the number of obligations; by moderation is meant changing a secondary or ancillary aspect of an obligation, such as those spoken of in canon 1309; by commutation is meant the substitution of a different pious cause for the one provided for in the pious will (e.g., aiding the foreign missions in lieu of educating seminarians in one's own nation).[243]

Canon 1310, §1 authorizes an ordinary to reduce, moderate, or commute a pious will only for a just and necessary cause and only if the founder (in this case, the maker of any pious will, not just those which establish foundations[244]) has expressly entrusted such power to the ordinary. Paragraph two empowers an ordinary to alter the obligations (by reduction, moderation, or commutation), even in the absence of express authorization by the founder if, through no fault of the administrators, fulfillment of the designated obligations has become impossible. Such alteration, which should be made by decree,[245] is to preserve as much as possible of the founder's intention, is to be equitable, and is to take place only after the ordinary has consulted those concerned (e.g., the founder, family members of a deceased founder, intended beneficiaries) and his own finance council. Failure of the ordinary to consult would canonically invalidate the alteration of the pious will (see c. 127).

The depth of the Church's commitment to faithful fulfillment of pious wills, inter vivos or mortis causa, and the strong reluctance to allow modifications in those wills are amply evidenced by the reservation to the Apostolic See in paragraph three of canon 1310 of all alterations other than those sought in the rarely occurring circumstances delineated in paragraphs one and two.

[243] Vázquez García-Peñuela, in Com Ex IV/1, 218–219; Aznar Gil, 269; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 826–827.

[244] Use of the term "founder" (fundator) in paragraph one of this canon has lead some to conclude that the canon applies only to pious foundations. See, for example, P. Zielinski, "Pious Wills and Mass Stipends in Relation to Canons 1299–1310," Stud Can 19 (1985) 150–151. But, unless the text or context of a canon otherwise confines it to foundations, as is true, for example, of c. 1303, §2, there is no reason to limit the meaning of the word fundator in a canon to the founder of a pious foundation. The word is used with several other connotations in the code, such as founders of institutes of consecrated life (cc. 576; 578; 588, §§2, 3) or of other public juridic persons which are universitates personarum (cc. 121; 122; 123; 1284, §2, 3°, 4°). There is no compelling reason to interpret fundator in c. 1310 as referring only to the founder of a foundation, and ample reason, beginning with the wording of paragraph one itself, to understand c. 1310 as referring to all wills of the faithful for pious causes. See Aznar Gil, 268–272.

[245] Vázquez García-Peñuela, in Com Ex IV/1, 219.

Treatises

Aznar Gil, F. La Administracion de los Bienes Temporales de la Iglesia. 2nd rev. ed. Salamanca: Universidad de Salamanca, 1993.

De Paolis, V. De Bonis Ecclesiae Temporalibus: Adnotationes in Codicem, Liber V. Rome: Gregorian University, 1986.

———. I Beni Temporali della Chiesa. Bologna: Dehoniane, 1995.

Kealy, R. Diocesan Financial Support: Its History and Canonical Status. Rome: Gregorian University, 1986.

Périsset, J.-C. Les Biens Temporels de l'Église. Paris: Tardy, 1996.

Schouppe, J.-P. Elementi di Diritto Patrimoniale Canonico. Milan: Giuffrè, 1997.

Articles

Abbass, J. "The Temporal Goods of the Church: A Comparative Study of the Eastern and Latin Codes of Canon Law." P 83 (1994) 669–714.

Bassett, W. "A Note on the Law of Contracts and the Canonical Integrity of Public Benefit Religious Organizations." CLSAP 59 (1997) 61–86.

De Paolis, V. "Negozio Giuridico, 'quo condicio patrimonialis personae iuridicae peior fieri possit' (cf. c. 1295)." P 83 (1994) 493–528.

Farrelly, A. "The Diocesan Finance Council: Functions and Duties according to the Code of Canon Law." Stud Can 23 (1989) 149–166.

Frugé, D. "Diocesan Taxation of Parishes in the United States, Sign of Communio or Source of Tension?" CLSAP 60 (1998) 68–81.

Grant, T. "Social Justice in the 1983 Code of Canon Law: An Examination of Selected Canons." J 49 (1989) 112–145.

Green, T. "Shepherding the Patrimony of the Poor: Diocesan and Parish Structures of Financial Administration." J 56 (1996) 706–734.

Hermann, D. "The Code of Canon Law Provisions on Labor Relations." J 44 (1984) 153–193.

Hollenbach, D. "Corporate Investments, Ethics, and Evangelical Poverty: A Challenge to American Religious Orders." TS 34 (1973) 265–274.

Kealy, R. "Methods of Diocesan Incorporation." CLSAP 48 (1986) 163–177.

Kennedy, R. "McGrath, Maida, Michiels: Introduction to a Study of the Canonical and Civil-Law Status of Church-Related Institutions in the United States." J 50 (1990) 351–401.

———. "The Declaration on Religious Liberty Thirty Years Later: Challenges to the Church-State Relationship in the United States." J 55 (1995) 479–503.

Morrisey, F. "Ordinary and Extraordinary Administration: Canon 1277." J 48 (1988) 709–726.

———. "The Alienation of Temporal Goods in Contemporary Practice." Stud Can 29 (1995) 293–316.

———. "Acquiring Temporal Goods for the Church's Mission." J 56 (1996) 586–603.

Roche, G. "The Poor and Temporal Goods in Book V of the Code." J 55 (1995) 299–348.

Documents

CLSA. Canonical Standards in Labor-Management Relations: A Report. J 47 (1987) 545–575.

NCCB. Principles and Guidelines for Fund Raising in the United States by Arch/dioceses, Arch/diocesan Agencies and Religious Institutes. Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1977. CLD 8, 415–421.

BOOK VI
SANCTIONS IN THE CHURCH
[cc. 1311–1399]

INTRODUCTION

Thomas J. Green

During the post-1983 code period, the tragedy of clerical sexual abuse of minors among other things has highlighted the significance of a well-ordered and pastorally responsible ecclesiastical penal system. First of all the following introductory observations consider the phenomena of delicts, or offenses, against the Church's faith or order and its response in the form of penalties. The commentary will then briefly consider the 1917 code and its postconciliar revision to contextualize the subsequent reflections on Book VI.

While the Church is a graced community empowered by the Spirit, its members are sinners reflecting the limitations of the human condition.[1] Occasionally their attitudes are contrary to the faith (e.g., heresy) or their behavior contradicts the Christian way of life (e.g., clerical sexual abuse of minors). This disturbs the community of faith and brings such persons into conflict especially with those in authority whose responsibility is to foster the integrity of the community's faith, communion, and service.

Hence there needs to be a framework to restore ecclesial peace and order and reintegrate the offending party within the community. This challenge to resolve conflicts arising from breaches of public order is common to Church and State; hence there are certain similarities between ecclesiastical and civil penal law. However, the Church's salvific purpose gives its penal order a unique character which must constantly be remembered.

Delicts against the Community

The Church's penal order does not refer primarily to the individual's relationship with the Lord in conscience. This is largely inaccessible to church authority and hence beyond its competence. Rather, what is principally envisioned is a public act or omission adversely affecting the community. However, ecclesiastical penal law also deals with certain occult, or non-public, delicts known only to a few individuals, e.g., solicitation in confession. This is because such acts may significantly harm the community and hence are deemed matters of penal discipline.

Not every sin is an ecclesiastical delict warranting a penalty, yet every delict is a seriously sinful act or omission reflecting significant, if not full, freedom and knowledge. Certain factors notably impairing such freedom (e.g., fear) and knowledge (e.g., ignorance) may diminish or completely preclude imputability, or responsibility, for one's apparently criminal behavior.

Furthermore, not every canonical violation is a delict warranting a penalty. In fact, the violation of relatively few laws in the 1983 code constitutes a delict. Historically there have been different understandings of what patterns of thought or behavior so impair the Church's spiritual integrity as to require an ecclesiastical penalty, i.e., the deprivation of some spiritual or temporal good within the Church's control. The determination of such delicts has reflected at least an implicit hierarchy of values. Both such delicts and their corresponding penalties are historically conditioned.[2] Throughout the ages there has been a continuing effort to clarify the boundaries of ecclesial communion and specify those breaches of ecclesial values which the community cannot tolerate.

A significant historical factor affecting ecclesiastical penal discipline has been a change in Church-State relations. Until relatively recently, the Church occasionally had recourse to the secular arm to enforce its own discipline, and at times church authorities implemented distinctly civil

[1] The author is grateful to Rev. Ladislas Örsy, S.J., whose unpublished reflections entitled "Breach of Law and Punishment" were helpful in preparing these observations. See also A. Marzoa, in Com Ex, 222–245.

[2] For a brief overview of the evolution of ecclesiastical delicts and penalties, see G. Michiels, De Delictis et Poenis (Paris: Desclée, 1961) 1: 30–40.

discipline. Such close Church-State relations are largely a thing of the past today. There is now a clearer sense of the proper autonomy of ecclesiastical and civil penal orders.

This has facilitated the structuring of the Church's penal discipline according to primarily theological-pastoral considerations. Yet that discipline still reflects significant vestiges of a so-called perfect society ecclesiology. Such a view considered the Church from an unduly institutional perspective as a society comparable to the State but independent from it, with both the Church and State possessing all the institutional means necessary to achieve their respective purposes. Such an approach, however valid, does not do justice to the rich conciliar view of the Church as a sui generis hierarchical community of believers with its implications for penal law.[3]

The Reaction of the Community

If the peace of the community disturbed by the delict is to be responsibly restored, church authorities, rather than private individuals, should deal with those seriously violating community faith or order. The community can ill afford to be indifferent to such violations. Otherwise its identity as a sign of the union of God and human persons would be seriously jeopardized. While some types of diversity (e.g., theological, canonical, ascetical, liturgical) clearly enrich the Church, it cannot tolerate certain divergent patterns of thought and activity if it is to be faithful to its teaching, sanctifying, and serving mission. Clarifying the difference between the two types of diversity is a continuing task for believers.

The Church's penal activity will reflect its redemptive, healing character if it primarily affirms ecclesial unity through faith and charity rather than condemning individuals expressing heterodox positions or behaving in an ecclesially detrimental fashion. Church authorities should deal patiently and charitably with those violating community ideals even while being appropriately firm.

Actually, official penal action is not taken primarily at the initiative of church authorities. Rather, such action responds to the action of an individual breaking entirely with the Church or seriously disturbing his or her communion with it. The community must take notice of those whose conduct significantly impairs its mission. While most Latin Catholics[4] are theoretically subject to the code's penal discipline, in practice it generally affects only clerics and other significant leadership figures.

The official response to canonical violations has assumed different historical forms. The key ecclesiastical penalties have been censures, or so-called medicinal penalties (e.g., excommunication) and expiatory penalties (e.g., dismissal from the clerical state). The Church's penal order has various purposes: repairing scandal, restoring justice, and reforming the offender (c. 1341). One distinction among such penalties is their principal orientation. Censures strongly emphasize reconciling the offender with the community. Their operative force depends on the individual's dispositions vis-à-vis the community; hence, once the offender sincerely repents the canonical violation, the penalty must be remitted. This is not true for expiatory penalties, which more notably emphasize restoring community order, repairing scandal, and deterring would-be violators of ecclesiastical discipline. Such penalties (e.g., deprivation of office) may be operative even after the offender has fully repented.

The complex issue of penalties can hardly be explored adequately here.[5] Throughout history questions have been raised about the effectiveness of [3] For a review of contemporary discussions regarding a proper theological rationale for penal law and related issues, see T. Green, "The Future of Penal Law in the Church," J 35 (1975) 215–235.

[4] This commentary nearly exclusively focuses on the 1983 Latin code; however, occasional references will be made to the 1990 Eastern code. See T. Green, "Penal Law in the Code of Canon Law and in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches: Some Comparative Reflections," Stud Can 28 (1994) 407–451.

[5] For helpful discussions of such issues see the introduction to the Münster commentary; A. Borras, Les Sanctions dans l'Eglise (Paris: Tardy, 1990) 197–220; T. Green, in CLSA Com, 893–894.

various penalties and about the ecclesiastical penal system itself. At times a non-penal pastoral approach may lead an offender to a fuller life in Christ more effectively than penalties. Fullness of life in Christ is the ultimate rationale for penal as well as non-penal disciplinary measures in the Church.

Book V of the 1917 Code[6]

Despite some noteworthy differences, Book VI of the 1983 code (cc. 1311–1399) has much in common with Book V of the 1917 code (CIC 2195–2414). Hence some comments about that latter text are in order.

Book V of the 1917 Code was the first serious effort to systematize universal penal discipline. It was a complex of norms on establishing, applying, and remitting penalties. It articulated general principles on delicts (CIC 2195–2213) and penalties (CIC 2214–2240) and considered specific penalties such as censures and so-called vindictive penalties (CIC 2241–2313). A concluding section specified penalties for individual delicts organized according to certain fundamental ecclesial values (CIC 2314–2414).

While a few individual penalties were changed, the basic presuppositions of Book V were generally unchallenged during the preconciliar period.[7] The Church's penal system was reexamined seriously only during the postconciliar revision of the 1917 code.

Contemporary Penal Law Revision

Code Commission Penal Law Committee

After Vatican II a special coetus or committee of the Latin code commission was established to revise Book V of the 1917 code. This committee met nine times from November 1966 until January 1970 when a tentative schema, or draft, of canons was approved. A particularly significant event during the drafting process was the 1967 synod of bishops, which approved certain principles to guide contemporary Latin canonical reform.

Principle nine reaffirmed the continuing need for penal law since a certain coercive power is necessary in every society. Nevertheless, the number of penalties was to be reduced; and penal discipline was to be confined to the so-called external forum (public arena of church life). Ferendae sententiae, or imposed, penalties requiring official ecclesiastical intervention were to be the rule. Latae sententiae penalties, which are incurred because of a seriously imputable legal violation without such intervention, were to be limited to the most notable ecclesiastical delicts.

In December 1973 a somewhat shortened version of the aforementioned schema was sent for evaluation to the bishops of the world and other consultative organs.[8] Book VI of the 1983 code largely reflects the subsequent reworking of that schema by the aforementioned committee in light of that evaluation.[9]

The Basic Structure and Sources of Book VI

Book VI is divided into two parts, one on delicts and penalties in general (cc. 1311–1363) and the other on penalties for specific delicts (cc. 1364–1398). A concluding canon 1399 indicates the extraordinary conditions under which a penalty may be imposed even without an existing penal law.

The first part of Book VI contains six titles. Four deal with the establishment of penalties: the punishment of delicts in general (cc. 1311–1312), [6] Since the 1983 code is the primary focus of this commentary, 1917 code references will be less numerous than in the original CLSA commentary. See Green, in CLSA Com, 894–896.

[7] For post-1917 code preconciliar changes in penal law, see various editions of CLD under headings of CIC 2195–2414. Also J. O'Connor, "Trends in Canon Law: The Question of Penalties," Stud Can 3 (1969) 209–237.

[8] For critical reflections on this schema, see Green, "Future of Penal Law," 248–274.

[9] For an overview of penal law committee activities, see J. Fox, "A General Synthesis of the Work of the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law," J 48 (1988) 829–832.

penal law and penal precepts (cc. 1313–1320), those subject to penal sanctions, or imputability (cc. 1321–1330), and penalties and other punishments (cc. 1331–1340). One title governing the application of penalties (cc. 1341–1353) must be read in connection with norms on penal processes in Book VII (cc. 1717–1731). Finally, a single title considers the cessation of penalties (cc. 1354–1363).

The second part of Book VI also contains six principal titles, highlighting various types of delicts warranting similar treatment throughout the Church. These canons penalize delicts against religion and church unity (cc. 1364–1369), delicts against church authorities (cc. 1370–1377), delicts in exercising ecclesiastical functions (cc. 1378–1389), delicts involving falsehood (cc. 1390–1391), delicts involving violations of clerical and religious obligations (cc. 1392–1396), and delicts against human life, integrity, and freedom (cc. 1397–1398).

The 1983 code depends significantly on the canons of the 1917 code, occasionally modified in light of subsequent legal developments. Conciliar sources rarely seem to influence Book VI directly. However, certain conciliar themes indirectly shape it, e.g., an increased respect for human dignity and freedom and an emphasis on expanded legal-pastoral discretion for bishops and other ordinaries.[10]

Noteworthy Aspects of the 1983 Code

Certain universal norms are necessary for a proper application of penal law throughout the Latin church. However, the principle of subsidiarity calls for increased legislative competency for infra-universal church authorities such as diocesan bishops. This should facilitate the adaptation of penal discipline to differing pastoral circumstances. Hence, universal penal laws are notably reduced in number. Only those fundamental principles necessary for a basic framework of penal discipline are maintained in part one (cc. 1311–1363). Only those delicts so ecclesially detrimental as to require relatively uniform treatment everywhere are presumably included in part two (cc. 1364–1398). However, lest increased infra-universal penal discretion be arbitrary and pastorally counterproductive, the code encourages penal law uniformity in neighboring particular churches of a given region (c. 1316).

